- Dane, Perry, The Public, the Private, and the Sacred: Variations on a Theme of Nomos and Narrative, Cardozo Studies in Law and Literature 8 (1996): 15.
- Samansky, Allan J., Deductibility of Contributions to Religious Institutions, Virginia Tax Review 24 (2004): 65.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Larson v. Valente*, 456 U.S. 228 (1982)
- Walz v. Tax Commission*, 397 U.S. 664, 673 (1970)

See also Church of Scientology and Religious Liberty; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Lemon Test; Walz v. Tax Commission of City of New York, 397 U.S. 664, 673 (1970)

HERRERA v. COLLINS, 506 U.S. 390 (1993)

In Herrera, the Supreme Court held that neither the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment nor the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause bars the execution of a person convicted in a fair trial who later discovers new evidence to support his claim of innocence.

Ten years after Herrera was sentenced to death for killing two police officers, he discovered new evidence suggesting that his brother was actually the murderer. Since Herrera had completed his state court appeals, he attempted to present the new evidence in a habeas corpus proceeding. However, the federal court of appeals refused to stay his execution.

The U.S. Supreme Court refused to grant Herrera relief by a vote of six to three. The Court held that a criminal defendant must demonstrate a constitutional defect in his conviction in order to obtain habeas corpus relief and that the conviction and even the execution of an actually innocent defendant did not itself violate any constitutional provision. The Court observed that an innocent person in Herrera's position could request clemency from the governor. Finally, the Court concluded that Herrera's new evidence did not convincingly establish his innocence in any event.

As a result of Herrera, a convicted defendant who obtains new evidence of his or her innocence can obtain relief only if the state courts allow for the belated presentation of new evidence. Recent exonerations of defendants by DNA technology have created more pressure for state courts to allow defendants to present new evidence of innocence.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

- Bandes, Susan, Simple Murder: A Comment on the Legality of Executing the Innocent, Buffalo Law Review 44 (1996): 501.
- U.S. Department of Justice, National Institute of Justice. Convicted by Juries, Exonerated by Science: Case Studies on the Use of DNA Evidence to Establish Innocence After Trial. Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, 1996.

See also Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment; Habeas Corpus: Modern History

HESS v. INDIANA, 414 U.S. 105 (1973)

Where the line falls between protected and unprotected speech advocating lawless action depends on the factual context. In Hess v. Indiana, the Supreme Court sought to clarify where that line should be drawn.

While clearing a crowd at an antiwar demonstration, a sheriff heard Hess say either "We'll take the fucking street later" or "We'll take the fucking street again," and arrested him for disorderly conduct. Witnesses reported that Hess had stood facing the crowd without appearing to address anyone in particular, and that he had spoken no louder than any other person. The state courts rejected the argument that the First Amendment protected his speech.

The Supreme Court concluded that Hess's statement did not come within any of the narrow classes of unprotected speech. In the circumstances, his utterance could not be considered obscene; neither could it be construed as fighting words, given that he did not direct his statement at any one person. And the statement did not amount to a public nuisance, as Hess had invaded no substantial privacy interests.

Finally, the statement was not an incitement to violence: "[A]t worst," the Court concluded, "it amounted to nothing more than advocacy of illegal action at some indefinite future time." Relying on Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969), the court held that such advocacy falls outside the protections of the First Amendment only when, unlike this case, the speaker aims to produce imminent lawless action and the speech is likely to produce that action.

LAWRENCE FRIEDMAN

References and Further Reading

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen, 2002.
Sunstein, Cass R. Why Societies Need Dissent. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)

See also Brandenburg Incitement Test; Speech and Its Relation to Violence

HESTER v. UNITED STATES, 265 U.S. 445 (1924)

In this case, the plaintiff Hester claimed that his rights under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments were violated when he was convicted of illegally concealing distilled liquor. The two officers who made the arrest witnessed Hester exchanging jugs with another man. When pursued, Hester dropped his jug, and the officers determined that the jug contained moonshine whiskey. The officers then searched the house but did not find any whiskey inside the house. The plaintiff claimed that the evidence of the jug was inadmissible because the officers did not have a search warrant.

The opinion of the Court, written by Justice Holmes, held that there was no illegal search and seizure because Hester himself disclosed the jug when he dropped it in the field. Even though the examination of the jug took place on land owned by Hester's father, the Court ruled that the Fourth Amendment protection of "persons, houses, papers, and effects" did not extend to open fields. This became the "open fields" doctrine that has been a precedent for numerous cases involving searches on property outside the immediate surrounds of the home. Oliver v. United States (1984) relied on this precedent to conclude that a field where marijuana was growing was not a protected space under the Fourth Amendment.

LYNNE GARCIA

References and Further Reading

Cases that upheld the "open fields" doctrine: United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294 (1987); California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986); Florida v. Riley, 488 U.S. 445 (1989); California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988).
Landmark cases involving wire tapping that reference Hester v. United States: Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928); Katz v. United States 389 U.S. 347 (1967).
The Meaning of the Federal Rule on Evidence Illegally Obtained, Yale Law Journal 36 (1927): 36:536–42.
Murchinson, Kenneth M., Prohibition and the Fourth Amendment: A New Look at Some Old Cases. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 73 (1982): 2:471–532.

Case Studies and Statutes Cited

Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170 (1984)

See also Search (General Definition)

HIP-HOP AND RAP MUSIC

No genre of music has a deeper relationship with the law than hip-hop and rap music. No other genre of music, at least since the folk music of the 1960s, has been so explicitly aimed at prevailing social and legal conditions. And certainly no other genre of music has seen so many of its artists end up in legal battles. While it would be beyond the scope of this entry to explain how hip hop has impacted the law and vice versa, two aspects of the relationship deserve special focus.

Hip Hop and Copyright

One issue at the heart of hip hop's survival as a musical form is the relationship between rap music and the copyright laws. As Chuck D from Public Enemy once famously noted, rap is not actually music, it is rap over music. From the beginning, rappers have avoided making their own music, instead choosing to borrow music from other sources—known throughout the industry as “sampling.” The 1979 classic “Rapper’s Delight,” by the Sugar Hill Gang, contained music from Chic’s disco hit, “Good Times.” And the development of the musical instrumental digital interface (MIDI) in the early 1980s made sampling commercially feasible even for less affluent artists.

Yet the Copyright Act of 1976 poses a significant problem for sampling. It gives musical authors the exclusive rights to perform, display, distribute, and reproduce their work. (In sampling controversies, there can be two different copyrights at issue. The first is the copyright to the musical composition; the second is the copyright to the actual sound recording.) The act prevents unlicensed users from copying protected works to make substantially similar works.

Throughout hip hop’s early development, little attention was paid to copyright law. It was largely ignored by artists and recording companies, who took a catch-me-if-you-can approach to sampling. That, however, quickly changed. For in 1991, Biz Markie was successfully sued for using three words and a short keyboard riff from Gilbert O’Sullivan’s song “Alone Again (Naturally)” on his track “I Need a Haircut.” This decision shocked the hip-hop industry; it seemed to suggest that all digital sampling, no matter how short, was illegal. Since that point, an attitude of extreme caution has replaced the former attitude of utter abandon; hip-hop artists and their production teams now usually pay considerable figures for licenses for all material they use, no matter how short. Most digital sampling controversies are now settled quickly and out of court; the only real issue is what the purchase price of the sample will be.

And because cases have been so quick to settle, the legal questions surrounding sampling have gone largely unresolved. What exactly is the legal test for infringement? Do very minor samples (like arpeggiated chords) constitute infringement? Should the defenses of fair use and de minimis use be recognized—and, if so, to what extent? No dominant approach to these questions has yet emerged.

On a larger scale, the conflict between copyright law and the hip-hop industry reflects a growing uneasiness over copyright law more generally. Copyright was traditionally protected precisely because it was thought to encourage artistic and scientific development; the Constitution, for example, gives Congress the power to create copyright protection so as “to promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts.” Yet, increasingly copyright law is being seen as an obstacle—not a means—to creative freedom.

Sampling may be just another example. If sampling had been categorically considered illegal copyright infringement before 1991, many classic hip-hop albums might have never been made. Public Enemy once claimed that, after the flurry of lawsuits began in the early 1990s, it had to change its style significantly to avoid litigation. To many, this demonstrates how overbroad copyright laws can become inconsistent with free speech. (The Supreme Court, however, has held in Eldred v. Ashcroft [2003] that copyright laws will generally not be reviewed under the Free Speech Clause.)

Hip Hop and Censorship

Over the past twenty years, there has been significant controversy over hip-hop lyrics that have been perceived as promoting violence, racism, misogyny, drug use, and homophobia. The strongest objections to hip-hop lyrics have been against their proclivity toward violence. Early hip-hop albums reflected the socially conscious soul music of the 1970s from which they came, and so were not particularly inclined toward violence. But with the rise of artists like Ice-T and NWA (and, later, Tupac Shakur and Notorious B.I.G.), hip-hop lyrics began giving detailed, gritty descriptions of violence. Supporters claimed that these descriptions were merely vivid descriptions of the reality black youth faced; opponents claimed that they glorified and encouraged violence. Confrontations were rare but intense. After NWA released the track “Fuck the Police” on its 1989 album, Straight ‘Outta Compton, the FBI sent a warning letter to NWA’s record label. When C. DeLores Tucker, the chairwoman on the National Political Congress of Black Women, led a national campaign against violent lyrics in the 1990s, Tupac Shakur attacked her personally on several of the tracks on his critically acclaimed 1996 album, All Eyez on Me.

For much of the last decade, the focus has been on what the government should do to discourage violent lyrics. As the Constitution’s free speech clause likely prohibits direct prohibition, those who oppose violent lyrics have sought to impose restrictive labeling and marketing requirements. The regulation movement has supporters on both the political left and right; it was Joseph Lieberman and Hillary Clinton who, along with some Republican senators, introduced the failed Media Marketing Accountability Act of 2001, which would have directed the Federal Trade Commission to prosecute record companies selling offensive albums to minors. This issue, however, has largely now slipped into the background, as hip-hop album sales continue to rise and legislators' concerns have shifted to other matters.

Of course, there have been other objections to hip-hop lyricism. For a time, the nation's attention was focused on lyrics that were thought to be far too sexually explicit. In the early 1990s, a 2 Live Crew album was declared obscene by a federal district judge, although that decision was eventually reversed by the Court of Appeals. Later, the country's attention turned to lyrics that vilified gay people. Eminem's 2000 album The Marshall Mathers LP created a storm of controversy with its gay-disparaging lyrics—a storm that only began to subside after Eminem performed with Elton John, a notable gay performer, at the Grammy Awards. Indeed, it is fair to say that whenever this country has been concerned with the appropriateness of musical lyrics, it has first cast an eye (and a finger) at hip-hop culture. (Another prominent example of this came in 1992, when the presidential candidate Bill Clinton publicly attacked Sister Souljah, a one-time associate of Public Enemy, for having racist hip-hop lyrics.)

CHRISTOPHER C. LUND

References and Further Reading

- Garnett, Matthew S., The Downhill Battle to Copyright Sonic Ideas in Bridgeport Music, Vanderbilt Journal of Entertainment Law and Practice 7 (2005): 8:509–23.
- George, Nelson. Hip Hop America. New York: Penguin Books, 1999.
- Grand Upright Music v. Warner Bros. Records*, 780 F. Supp. 182 (S.D.N.Y. 1991).
- Kravis, Randy S., Does A Song By Any Other Name Still Sound As Sweet? Digital Sampling and Its Copyright Implications, American University Law Review 43 (1993): 4:231–75.
- Nimmer, Melville B., and David Nimmer. Nimmer on Copyright. New York: Matthew Bender, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Eldred v. Ashcroft*, 537 U.S. 186 (2003).
- Pub.L. 105-298, 1998 Copyright Term Extension Act (codified in scattered sections of 17 U.S.C.)

See also Civil Rights Laws and Freedom of Speech; Hate Speech; Political Correctness and Free Speech; Public Vulgarity and Free Speech

HISS, ALGER (1904–1996)

Alger Hiss was born in Baltimore, Maryland on November 11, 1904. Articulate, intelligent, and well-bred, Hiss became the celebrated target of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) in well-publicized hearings regarding communists in government in 1948. After earning a law degree at Harvard Law School, Hiss went to Washington, D.C. in 1933 as a “New Dealer,” one of a group of young idealistic attorneys who were attracted to government service in the heady, early days of the New Deal. During his tenure with the federal government, which lasted until the late 1940s, he served with the Departments of Agriculture, Justice, and State. He rose through the ranks, eventually serving as an advisor to Franklin D. Roosevelt at the Yalta Conference in 1944 and secretary-general of the United Nations organizing conference at San Francisco in 1947.

During the 1948 HUAC hearings, a disheveled, dumpy former TIME-Life editor, Whittaker Chambers accused Hiss of having been a member of the Communist Party and of engaging in espionage for the Soviets. Hiss responded immediately with stalwart declarations of his innocence. Hiss's testimony, however, became more and more muddled in subsequent appearances before the committee, including a face-to-face confrontation with Chambers. Chambers ultimately produced microfilm reels of stolen State Department documents that had been typed on Hiss's Woodstock typewriter. Hiss was ultimately convicted of perjury in 1951 and served almost four years in prison.

The melodramatic Hiss–Chambers hearings, the first ever televised, added to the growing pervasive fear of the domestic communist menace that gripped the United States in the years after 1945. The image of a civil servant and diplomat, as well-placed, well-educated, and well-respected as Hiss, serving as a Soviet agent magnified the public's sense of the danger that Communism held for U.S. institutions.

Hiss continued to maintain his innocence, carrying on a campaign for vindication until his death in 1996. Most contemporary scholarship, much of it based on the recently released VENONA decrypts of messages of Soviet agents in the United States, supports Chambers's allegations that Hiss was, in fact, a spy for the Soviets.

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

- Haynes, John Earl, and Harvey Klehr. VENONA: Decoding Soviet Espionage in America. New Haven, CT.: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Swan, Patrick A., ed. Alger Hiss, Whittaker Chambers, and the Schism in the American Soul. Wilmington, DE: Intercollegiate Studies Institute, 2003.
- Weinstein, Allen. Perjury: The Hiss-Chambers Case. New York: Knopf, 1978.
- White, G. Edward. Alger Hiss's Looking Glass Wars. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

HISTORY AND ITS ROLE IN SUPREME COURT DECISION MAKING ON RELIGION

“No provision of the Constitution is more closely tied to or given content by its generating history than the religious clause of the First Amendment,” wrote Justice Wiley Rutledge at the outset of the Supreme Court’s establishment clause jurisprudence, Everson v. Board of Education (1947). Since Everson, Supreme Court justices have continued to rely heavily on the history of the early republic to interpret both the establishment and free exercise clauses of the First Amendment. Those justices upholding strict separation and those favoring greater accommodation of religion have used history in markedly different ways, however. Their opinions in religion cases have thus carried on a sophisticated debate about the proper use of history in constitutional interpretation in general.

The Court has drawn on three main sources of historical documentation in interpreting the Religion Clauses: (1) the personal views of founding era statesmen regarding the relationship between the state and religion, (2) the practices of federal and state governments at the time of ratification of the First Amendment, and (3) the textual development of the clauses as reflected in their legislative histories and the common use of their terms in colonial charters and early state constitutions.

Personal Views of Early Statesmen

Following the first free exercise decision, Reynolds v. United States (1879), the Everson Court located the “generating history” of the religion clause in the Virginia Assessment Controversy of 1785–1786. But Everson went further, relying on the ideological expressions of selected statesmen involved to interpret the motivations behind the Religion Clause. Supporters of both strict separation and expansive accommodation have repeatedly returned to this episode, in part because it inspired a monumental treatise on religious freedom by the chief architect of the First Amendment—James Madison’s “Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments”—and in part because its temporal proximity to the Constitutional Convention seemed to give it greater relevance to constitutional interpretation. Protesting a bill to tax citizens for the support of a church of their choice or a general fund for clerical education, Madison articulated the sectarian churches’ position and called on the Virginia legislature to abandon all church taxes.

The legislature was convinced and adopted a “Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom,” based on an earlier draft by Thomas Jefferson, which soon led to the disestablishment of the state church.

Although the Everson Court ultimately ruled according to a theory of government neutrality toward religious institutions, both the majority and dissent enunciated a rationale for strict separation by expanding on Jefferson’s characterization of the establishment clause as a “wall of separation between church and state.” Jefferson had penned these words in a letter to the Danbury Baptist Association in 1802, but the Court believed the metaphor to be consistent with the result of the Virginia controversy. Noting that Madison and Jefferson “played such leading roles” in the “drafting and adoption” of the First Amendment, the Court offered citations from their writings as evidence for both the historical “context” and modern meaning of the religion clause.

Critics of Everson’s separationist theory, which gained ascendancy over the following generation, objected that historical evidence ought to be more rigorously tied to the ratification of the First Amendment or to the fact patterns of each particular case at hand. They pointed out that Jefferson’s opinions about the meaning of the First Amendment had only a tenuous relationship to constitutional interpretation because Jefferson himself did not take part in the drafting or adoption of the Bill of Rights. To the extent that Jefferson’s opinions were germane, the critics also questioned why his private correspondence should receive greater credence than his public comments or official acts that allowed for practices now banned by the Court’s “wall of separation.” Madison, on the other hand, was a central player in the passage of the First Amendment, but his own proposed wording for the religion clause did not secure Congress’s full approval. It therefore seemed presumptive to ascribe to the First Congress and the states’ ratifying chambers the views Madison had expressed during an earlier controversy in a single state.

Policies of Early Governments

Accommodationists argued that it would be more appropriate to reconstruct the import of the First Amendment by evaluating the official actions of founding leaders while they served in governmental positions. Implicit in this emphasis was a theory that official acts should be given greater interpretative weight because they represent not just the personal conviction of one individual, but the result of the entire government’s democratic deliberation. It also treated early office holders as interpreters of the Constitution, by which their acts, if legally unchallenged, could indicate “long-standing practice” or serve as instructive democratic precedents in the absence of judicial ones.

Justice Stanley Reed presented the first challenge to the separationists’ use of history in his dissent from McCollum v. Board of Education (1948), which barred public schools from offering “released time” for optional religious instruction. While Madison’s “Remonstrance” concerned taxation, a more precise inquiry into public school practices revealed that Jefferson himself had designed a similar program to facilitate student worship when he was rector of the University of Virginia and Madison was a trustee. In the succession of cases banning Bible reading and prayer at public school events, religious symbols on public property, and various forms of aid to religious schools, dissenters quoted many presidents calling the country to prayer in their inaugural ceremonies and Thanksgiving Day proclamations in order to demonstrate the longstanding place of religious commemorations in the civic life of the nation. They also provided evidence that the federal government regularly allocated funds in the nineteenth century to support church schools among the Native Americans.

Faced with these challenges, justices favoring stricter separation reached back further into history, conjuring up the religious strife and persecution of sectarians in Europe that brought many settlers to America’s shores. It was the overarching purpose of the First Amendment to avoid these social evils, they argued, in decisions such as Engle v. Vitale (1962) and Abington v. Schempp (1963). Thus, the religion clause was to be interpreted in light of possible discrimination in contemporary society, not merely in light of the nation’s early political consensus.

Accommodationists, however, insisted that historical anecdotes should only be instructive if they hew closely to the factual patterns under review. When Locke v. Davey (2004) permitted a state to exclude a student of theology from an otherwise unrestricted college scholarship program after citing Virginia’s resolution to the assessment controversy, Justice Scalia contested that the scope of Madison’s argument must be limited to the case that was at hand: Madison convinced the Virginia legislature to abandon a state support program specifically allocated for clerical education, but the Virginians still might have considered it a denial of free exercise to exclude only clergy from generally available state assistance.

Emphasis on governmental policies in the founding era also allowed the Court to take the practices of the states and federal government more systematically into its purview. Walz v. Tax Commission (1970), for example, declined to invalidate tax exemptions for religious groups after acknowledging that most states and the federal government had granted such exemptions as soon as they established tax codes.

Marsh v. Chambers (1983) rested its decision to allow legislative prayer on evidence that the Constitutional Convention and First Congress themselves convened with prayer, a practice emulated by the states. Because the First Congress passed a bill providing for chaplains to open all legislative sessions with prayer just three days before the House resolved the final wording for the First Amendment, the Court reasoned that the authors of the establishment clause could not have intended it to ban prayer from government assemblies.

Critics of this approach have claimed that even the First Congress and early presidents should not be trusted to have consistently abided by the constitutional clauses they authored. But for the Marsh majority, the close convergence of relevant legislation with the passage of the First Amendment created a moment when deference to the legislature’s capacity for constitutional interpretation ought to be at its height.

Legislative Histories and Textual Comparisons

More recently, several justices have advocated a thorough revision of the Court’s objective in religion cases after considering the legislative history of the First Amendment and the significance of its terms in other legal documents from the eighteenth century.

Although Madison had been characterized as an absolute separationist since Everson, the House report for the First Congress showed that his proposed language for the religion clause would have prohibited the establishment of only a “national religion.” An early Senate version, meanwhile, barred only the preference of one sect over another. At the state level, Virginia’s conclusions about the proper relation between church and state were not universally accepted. Three New England states maintained established state churches for decades after ratifying the First Amendment. Justice Rehnquist concluded from this evidence that those legislators who ratified the establishment clause understood it to bar only the federal government from officially advancing one church over another or from interfering with state church establishments. Insofar as the religion clause had been incorporated by the Fourteenth Amendment, he argued in his Wallace v. Jaffree (1985) dissent, all governments had the responsibility to refrain from advancing one religion over another, but they were not bound to remain neutral between religion and irreligion.

Defenders of the Court's "neutrality" jurisprudence countered this revisionist history of the establishment clause in Lee v. Weisman (1982) by arguing that since Congress did not settle on either Madison's or the Senate's version, the First Amendment must have been meant to prohibit governmental advancement of "religion" in general. But since the only documented reasons for rejecting Madison's language were even stronger reservations about protecting the prerogatives of the states, the Wallace dissenters maintained that Madison's intention was implicit in the final result.

Like Rehnquist's "non-preferentialism," the "non-coercion" standard that Justice Kennedy advanced in County of Allegheny v. ACLU (1989) would have abandoned attempts to divine a line between the secular and religious. Instead, guided by Madison's interpretation of the religion clause during the House debate, the Court would simply ensure that government not "compel men to worship God in any manner contrary to their conscience." When Justice Kennedy included peer pressure as a form of coercion to ban prayer at public school events, however, Justices Scalia and Thomas argued that a historically accurate conception of compulsion necessarily included the "force of law and the threat of penalty."

After Employment Division v. Smith (1990) limited the meaning of the free exercise clause to a protection against racial discrimination, proponents of greater accommodation called for reconsideration on the basis of a comparative reading of the First Amendment with "free exercise" clauses in colonial charters and state constitutions. Justice O'Connor's dissent in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997) marshaled the state provisions behind an argument that the state ratifying chambers and congressional representatives would have understood "free exercise" to exempt religiously motivated conduct or scruples from generally applicable laws. Noting that many state constitutions included provisos limiting free exercise when the conduct disturbed the "public peace or safety," the accommodationists reasoned that these provisos would have been unnecessary unless the concept of "free exercise" already embraced exemptions from generally applicable regulations. But the majority, basing its position on Reynolds, refused to consider that the state provisions could have determined the meaning of the term "free exercise" for the First Amendment. Justice Scalia, the author of Smith, contended that the states' free exercise clauses proved only that religious exemptions were permissible, not mandated.

Religion cases have inspired Supreme Court justices to apply more and more refined historical analyses to the constitutional questions that they have faced since Reynolds and Everson. It is apparent, however, that those opinions challenging the doctrine of Reynolds and Everson on historical grounds have rarely garnered a majority. Although the Court finds history a ready rhetorical aid for its decisions, history is seldom dispositive. When historical evidence from the Founding Era is in conflict with intervening judicial precedents, a persistent majority in religion cases has shown that the Court prefers to place authority in its own precedents, maintaining its freedom to adapt to contemporary situations.

HANS LEAMAN

References and Further Reading

- Hamburger, Philip, A Constitutional Right of Religious Exemption: An Historical Perspective, 60 George Washington Law Review 1992: 915–48.
 ———. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
 Howe, Mark DeWolfe. The Garden and the Wilderness: Religion and Government in American Constitutional History. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965.
 McConnell, Michael, The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, 103 Harvard Law Review (1990): 1409–517.
 Witte, John, Jr. Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment: Essential Rights and Liberties. 2nd ed. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abington Township School District v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
County of Allegheny v. A.C.L.U., 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Engle v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
Everson v. Board of Education of the Township of Ewing, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)
Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004)
Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)
Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1879)
Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)
Walz v. Tax Commission of the City of New York, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)

See also Concept of "Christian Nation" in American Jurisprudence; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Judicial Proceedings and References to the Deity; Religion in "Public Square" Debate; Religious Liberty under Eighteenth-Century State Constitutions

HOFFA v. UNITED STATES,
385 U.S. 293 (1966)

“The risk of being overheard by an eavesdropper or betrayed by an informer . . . is probably inherent in the conditions of human society. It is the kind of risk we necessarily assume whenever we speak.” Notorious union leader Jimmy Hoffa assumed that risk by telling another Teamsters official, Edward Partin, his plans to influence a federal criminal jury. Hoffa did not know that Partin was a paid government informant.

In a six-to-one decision, the Supreme Court held that criminal defendants have no constitutionally protected interest in a conversation with a secret government informant. Despite the government’s obtaining the same information that would otherwise be available through a “bug,” thus requiring a warrant, the Court found that one necessarily assumes the risk that friends may become traitors.

Dismissing Hoffa’s attack on the use of government informants generally, the Court noted that informants often provide essential evidence that otherwise may be difficult or impossible to obtain. Because this information is voluntarily given by suspects, the Court dismissed the idea that such statements are coerced. Additionally, although informants may have motives to lie (such as monetary rewards or promises of leniency in prosecution), vigorous cross-examination is an adequate remedy.

Hoffa paved the way for “surreptitious recording” of such conversations between government informants and suspects. If the informant can testify without a constitutional violation, then it follows that a recording of the conversation (more accurate than an informant’s memory) should also be admissible.

JIMMY LUKE

References and Further Reading

Kamin, Sam, The Private is Public: The Relevance of Private Actors in Defining the Fourth Amendment, 46 Boston College Law Review (2004): 83.

Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967).

United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745 (1971).

See also Electronic Surveillance, Technology Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; Wiretapping Laws

HOLLAND v. ILLINOIS,
493 U.S. 474 (1990)

The Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury in a criminal trial is a fundamental protection. An impartial jury has been interpreted by the courts as being comprised of a fair cross section of individuals from the community in which the crime occurred. A fair cross section is applied to the venire, not the jury. In Batson v. Kentucky (1986), the Supreme Court held that the prosecutor violated the Equal Protection Clause by using peremptory challenges to remove members of the defendant’s race from the venire.

During jury selection in Holland v. Illinois, the prosecutor, using peremptory challenges, struck two black venire members from the jury. Holland (a white man) objected to the peremptory challenges, claiming a Sixth Amendment violation on the basis of a systematic exclusion of jury members based on their race. The Court asserted that this case did not present an equal protection issue because Holland was not black, and his “claim would be just as strong if the object of the State’s exclusion of jurors had been . . . any other identifiable group.”

An impartial jury, not a representative jury, is assembled from a fair cross section venire. The defense argument, that the fair cross section requirement constitutes a representative jury, is an argument that the Constitution does not support. “[T]he constitutional goal of ‘an impartial jury’ would positively be obstructed by a petit jury fair-cross-section requirement, which would cripple the peremptory challenge device.”

PETER A. COLLINS

References and Further Reading

Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202 (1965).

Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)

See also Fourteenth Amendment

HOLMES, OLIVER WENDELL, JR.
(1841–1935)

Although he enjoys reputation as a great civil libertarian, primarily because of his position on free speech, Oliver Wendell Holmes’s overall posture in this area is somewhat mixed. The son of a prominent Boston family, Holmes went to Harvard College, served with distinction during the Civil War, and then attended Harvard Law School. He disliked legal practice, however, and managed to earn a living as an editor, writing essays on history and jurisprudence for the American Law Review and editing a new edition of James Kent’s Commentaries on American

Law. He made his name, however, with The Common Law (1881), which has remained one of the most influential treatises in Anglo-American law ever since. After a brief stint teaching at Harvard Law School, he accepted an appointment to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, and by 1901 sat as chief justice on that bench. The following year Theodore Roosevelt named him to the U.S. Supreme Court, where he served for thirty years.

During his two decades on the Massachusetts high court, Holmes earned a reputation as a mild progressive, primarily because he believed in judicial deference to legislative policymaking and because he did not share the antiunion sentiments of his colleagues. In one of the few civil liberties cases decided during his tenure, McAuliffe v. New Bedford (1892), Holmes upheld the right of a township to discharge a police officer for undesirable political activity. “The petitioner may have a constitutional right to talk politics,” Holmes wrote, “but he has no right to be a policeman.” In Commonwealth v. Davis (1895), the Court upheld a prohibition against unlicensed speech making on the Boston Common. For Holmes, “for the legislature absolutely or conditionally to forbid public speaking in a highway or public park is no more an infringement of the rights of a member of the public than for the owner of a private house to forbid it in his house.”

Once on the Supreme Court, Holmes gained some renown among progressives for insisting that in matters of economic policy, judges ought to defer to the legislature. In one of his most famous opinions, a dissent in Lochner v. New York (1905), he noted that the case had been decided by his colleagues “upon an economic theory which a large part of the country does not entertain.... The Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer’s Social Statics.” Throughout his career Holmes upheld the right of legislatures and not courts to determine policy, but he did so from the viewpoint of a skeptic. He did not care much about economic policy, believing that in the long run it made little difference. Every sensible man, he told a friend, “knows that the Sherman law is damned nonsense, but if my fellow citizens want to go to hell, I am here to help them—it’s my job.”

Holmes’s early opinions in civil liberties were mixed, and he was not part of the small group centered around Justice John Marshall Harlan that supported minority rights. In Bailey v. Alabama (1911), the Court invalidated a state peonage law that had reduced some African Americans practically to a state of slavery. Holmes saw no problem with the state providing criminal penalties for a breach of a labor contract, implying that black workers were shiftless and often disappeared after accepting an advance against wages. He reversed his position somewhat in United States v. Reynolds (1914), invalidating a comparable practice, the criminal surety arrangement where people could work off fines for minor offenses. Because this practice applied to minors and people with little intelligence, it went too far, but he did not join the Court’s opinion relying on the Thirteenth Amendment. Holmes also displayed little sympathy for the rights of aliens, insisting that they were in the United States at the sufferance of Congress, which had plenary power over immigration, and therefore Congress could impose any limits it wanted on aliens.

Holmes wrote his first speech opinion in Patterson v. Colorado (1907), Holmes took a traditional approach, relying as did all American courts at that time on the writings of Sir William Blackstone, who had argued in his Commentaries that the right of free speech precluded prior restraint (that is, the government could not stop a person from speaking or publishing ideas), but the law could punish speakers and writers if their expressions tended to harm the public welfare. In Patterson, Holmes followed Blackstone’s analysis. Thomas Patterson, a Democratic U.S. senator from Colorado and a newspaper publisher, had written a series of scathing editorials ridiculing the state supreme court for its role in overturning a referendum giving Denver home rule. The Republican state attorney general brought criminal contempt charges against Patterson on behalf of the court, which in turn fined him and his company $1,000, without allowing him to prove truth as a defense.

Patterson appealed, but Holmes, speaking for the Court, rejected all of his arguments. The First Amendment, Holmes wrote, “prevents all previous restraints upon publication,” but allows “the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare.” Holmes also dismissed the notion of truth as a defense, an idea that had supposedly been part of American jurisprudence ever since the Zenger case in colonial times. “The preliminary freedom extends to the false as to the true; the subsequent punishment may extend as well to the true as to the false.” In subsequent speech cases before and immediately after World War I, the Court adhered to the Blackstonian view as expounded by Holmes.

In the first postwar case, Schenck v. United States (1919), the secretary of the Philadelphia Socialist Party had been indicted for urging resistance to the draft. He had sent out circulars condemning conscription as despotic and unconstitutional and calling on draftees to assert their rights and refuse induction. Under the terms of the Espionage Act, Schenck had urged unlawful behavior; but did the Constitution’s guarantee of free speech protect him? Holmes attempted to develop a standard based on the common law rule of proximate causation, and he took a fairly traditional view of speech as a limited right. One could not, he pointed out, falsely shout “Fire!” in a theater. In a famous passage, Holmes attempted to define the limits of speech:

The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree. When a nation is at war, many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight and no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right.

The “clear and present danger” test became the starting point for all subsequent free speech cases, and within a week, the Court sustained two other convictions under this rule. In Frohwerk v. United States (1919), a German-language newspaper had run articles attacking the draft and challenging the constitutionality of the war, whereas in Debs v. United States (1919), Holmes accepted a jury finding that in a militant antiwar speech, Debs had intended interference with mobilization.

The three decisions, as well as the clear and present danger test, upset defenders of free speech, especially because they had come from a man they believed to be an ardent libertarian. Legal scholars such as Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Ernst Freund, and others attacked Holmes for his insensitivity to the larger implications of free speech. In an influential article (later expanded into a book), “Free Speech in the United States,” Chafee insisted that the framers of the First Amendment had more in mind than simple censorship. They intended to do away with the common law of sedition and make it impossible to prosecute criticism of the government in the absence of any incitement to law breaking. In none of these three cases could one argue that the defendants had been attempting to incite active law breaking.

Holmes, stung by this criticism, agreed to meet with Chafee. The Harvard professor convinced Holmes that free speech served broad social purposes and that the national interest would suffer more from restrictions on speech than from some alleged and vague dangers posed by unpopular thought. Moreover, through a clever, if somewhat inaccurate reading of history, Chafee convinced Holmes that his phrase “clear and present danger” had not only historical roots, but actually was very speech protective. Chafee’s missionary work bore fruit at the next term, when Holmes, along with Louis D. Brandeis, began reformulating the clear and present danger test.

In Abrams v. United States (1919), the defendants had distributed pamphlets in Yiddish and English criticizing the Wilson administration for sending troops to Russia in the summer of 1918. The government had no way to prove that such leaflets actually hindered the war with Germany, but a lower court judge found that they might have caused revolts and strikes and thereby diminished the number of troops available to fight the Germans. Seven members of the Court, led by Justice John H. Clarke, agreed that the government had provided sufficient proof to support this charge and that the conviction could be sustained under the Schenck test of clear and present danger.

Both Holmes and Brandeis disagreed, and in an eloquent dissent, Holmes limned one of the great defenses of free speech. The “silly leaflets” hardly posed a danger to society, and the fact that the ideas expressed were unpopular or even considered dangerous made no difference:

When men have realized that time has come to upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution. It is an experiment, as all life is an experiment.

Holmes’s dissent in the Abrams case is often seen as the beginning of the Court’s concern with free speech as a key right in democratic society, and it put forward the notion of democracy resting on a free marketplace of ideas. Some ideas might be unpopular, some might be unsettling, and some might be false. But in a democracy one had to give all ideas an equal chance to be heard, in the belief that the false, the ignoble, and the useless would be crowded out by the right ideas, the ones that would facilitate progress in a democratic manner. Only if society took the guaranty of the First Amendment seriously could that happen.

Holmes’s theory, often dubbed as “the marketplace of ideas,” is a negative view, and reflects the jurist’s basic skepticism. One did not know whether any one idea was true or false, good or bad, so let the people fight it out by words, and the best idea would win. Not until Brandeis’s opinion in Whitney v. California (1927) did someone come up with a positive view of First Amendment protection, namely, that free speech was an integral part of a citizen’s duty in a democratic society.

Holmes also receives high marks in the area of criminal justice. In Silverthorne Lumber Company v. United States (1920), two men had been arrested after indictment by a grand jury, and the Justice Department, without a warrant, then ransacked their office, removing books, papers, and other documents. Holmes, writing for the Court, branded the government's action an "outrage" and "without any shadow of authority," and blocked any use of the illegally seized documents by the prosecution. Holmes insistence that the materials "shall not be used at all" expanded the exclusionary rule that had first been enunciated in Weeks v. United States (1914).

The government's use of new technology, listening in on private telephone conversation through a tap to catch criminals, received the approval of a bare majority of the Court in Olmstead v. United States (1928). Holmes joined in the more famous dissent by Brandeis, in which Brandeis laid out the idea of a constitutionally protected right to privacy, but added his own short dissent to state how the practice disgusted him, calling wire tapping "a dirty business."

Holmes also had the satisfaction of seeing one of his dissents adopted by the Court during his tenure. At the time the federal courts exercised almost no supervision over the practices of state courts in criminal trials. The Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments were still held not to apply to the states. In Frank v. Mangum (1915), the Court, over a vigorous dissent by Holmes, refused to review the case of Leo Frank of Georgia, where a lynch mob stood outside the courtroom threatening the jury. In Moore v. Dempsey (1923), however, Holmes speaking for the Court overruled the earlier case, and held that federal courts should hear appeals of cases in which due process of law, which did apply to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, had been violated by mob violence or intimidation.

But the Holmes opinion that has darkened his reputation is his brief and almost brutal approval of forced sterilization in Buck v. Bell (1927). The eugenics movement had gained enormous popularity in the country, and a number of states had passed laws requiring the sterilization of mental incompetents in an effort to "improve" the race. The test case arose from Virginia, and involved eighteen-year-old Carrie Buck, who had become pregnant after a rape. The family she lived with had committed her to a state institution, and its director decided to use Buck to test the constitutionality of the law. At the trial, the state presented witnesses to prove Carrie's feeble-mindedness, and one person described the family as part of the "shiftless, ignorant and worthless class of anti-social whites." Neither Carrie, her mother Emma, nor her daughter Vivien were, according to the charges "normal."

Speaking for an eight-to-one Court (only Justice Pierce Butler dissented), Holmes made short shrift of the defense argument. He dismissed the equal protection claim as "the usual last resort of constitutional arguments," and cited only one case in support of upholding the sterilization law, Jacobson v. Massachusetts (1905), which endorsed compulsory vaccination of school children. He wrote:

We have seen more than once that the public welfare may call upon the best citizens for their lives. It would be strange indeed if it could not call upon those who already sap the strength of the State for these lesser sacrifices. . . . Three generations of imbeciles are enough.

Although Holmes became the darling of eugenics supporters for this opinion, the movement faded with the rise of Nazism in the 1930s, and the case has had a bad odor about it ever since. Critics of Holmes constantly point to this opinion as a "true" indicator of his so-called liberalism, and Catholic scholars in particular have attacked him for falling into the error of abandoning natural law for positivism. But the worst aspect of the case is that years later it turned out that there never had been three generations of imbeciles. The Buck women had been shy and abused, but had normal intelligence.

Holmes continues to be one of the most written about members of the Court, as much if not more for his colorful life and elegant writing style than for his jurisprudence. Although we remember such phrases as "clear and present danger," "fire in a crowded theater," and "a dirty business," these epigrams did little to guide lower courts in explicating issues arising from the Bill of Rights. Holmes caught the popular imagination, but is rarely cited today. Brandeis actually worked out usable theories of free speech and privacy, and these theories helped shaped the jurisprudence of the twentieth century.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Bickel, Alexander M., and Benno C. Schmidt, Jr. History of the Supreme Court of the United States: The Judiciary and Responsible Government, 1910–1921. New York: Macmillan, 1984.
- Chafee, Zechariah, Jr. Free Speech in the United States. New York: Atheneum, 1969.
- Frankfurter, Felix. Mr. Justice Holmes and the Supreme Court. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1938.
- Holmes, Oliver Wendell. The Mind and Faith of Justice Holmes: His Speeches, Essays, Letters, and Judicial Opinions, selected and edited, with a new preface and afterword by Max Lerner. 2nd ed. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books, 1988.

Polenberg, Richard. Fighting Faiths: The Abrams Case, The Supreme Court, and Free Speech. New York: Viking, 1987.

White, G. Edward. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes: Law and the Inner Self. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)

Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U.S. 219 (1911)

Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)

Commonwealth v. Davis, 162 Mass. 510 (1895)

Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919)

Frank v. Mangum, 237 U.S. 309 (1915)

Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204 (1919)

Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905)

Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)

McAuliffe v. New Bedford, 155 Mass. 216 (1892)

Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86 (1923)

Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)

Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454 (1907)

Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

Silverthorne Lumber Company v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920)

United States v. Reynolds, 235 U.S. 133 (1914)

Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)

Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

HOMOSEXUALITY AND IMMIGRATION

Like many areas of American law, immigration law has witnessed a transformation over time from being less to more protective of the rights of sexual minorities as our conception of what constitutes a legitimate reason to deny a person entry into our country has evolved. Ever since the first federal immigration law was enacted in 1875, the United States has based its decisions on whether to admit or expel noncitizens on whether it views such individuals as fit to be included within American society. Hence, foreigners convicted of particularly heinous crimes have always been deemed “undesirable” under our immigration law. Beyond criminality, psychological infirmity has also long been a factor rendering some ineligible for admission, in part because of its relationship to criminal behavior. Thus, noncitizens who admitted engaging in same-gender sexual relations were excluded under our immigration law because they were viewed as suffering from a mental disorder rendering them unfit for admission to our polity, which the 1967 Supreme Court affirmed in Boutilier v. Immigration and Naturalization Service. When modern science removed homosexuality from its roster of psychological ills, the immigration bar against gays and lesbians was effectively lifted; no longer could they be barred solely based on their sexual orientation.

Since then, gay and lesbian noncitizens have sought and gained protection through two primary channels involving favorable readings of existing law: first, by being admitted as refugees under our asylum law, which is designed to protect noncitizens from political persecution by their home governments; and second, by being allowed to accompany their same-gender partners who have been admitted as nonimmigrants. In 1990, the Board of Immigration Appeals in In re Toboso-Alfonso recognized that homosexuals could constitute a “particular social group” worthy of asylum status to protect them from official persecution in their homeland. In addition, gay partners of nonimmigrants have been allowed to accompany them, which was reaffirmed in 2001 by a State Department directive reminding U.S. consular posts abroad of this option.

These two specific protections for homosexual noncitizens, however, have not led to a more general acceptance of gays and lesbians under our immigration law. Notwithstanding the narrow admissibility granted same-gender partners of nonimmigrants, same-gender foreign couples, as well as partners of U.S. citizens, are prohibited from immigrating to the United States in the way that heterosexual spouses are, even if another country legally recognizes same-gender marriages. In its 1982 ruling in Adams v. Howerton, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the traditional reading given to the definition of “spouse” as applying to heterosexual unions only. Congress effectively codified the Adams decision by passing the federal Defense of Marriage Act of 1996, which specifically defines “marriage” as the union between a man and a woman, in turn similarly restricting the immigration law’s definition of “spouse.” Time will tell whether recent state and local initiatives to expand the definition of marriage to include unions between same-gender partners translates into a similar liberalization of federal laws, including U.S. immigration law.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

Murdoch, Joyce, and Price, Deb. Courting Justice: Gay Men and Lesbians v. the Supreme Court. New York: Basic Books, 2001.

Romero, Victor C., The Selective Deportation of Same-Gender Partners: In Search of the Rara Avis. University of Miami Law Review 56 (2002): 537–600.

Scaperlanda, Michael A., Kulturkampf in the Backwaters: Homosexuality and Immigration Law, Widener Journal of Public Law 11 (2002): 475–514.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Adams v. Howerton, 673 F.2d 1036 (9th Cir. 1982)
Boutillier v. Immigration and Naturalization Service,
387 U.S. 118 (1967)
In re Toboso-Alfonso, 20 I. & N. Dec. 819 (B.I.A. 1990)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Sex and Immigration

HOOVER, J. EDGAR (1895–1972)

J. Edgar Hoover, first head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), is recognized for the creation of the first nationally organized federal crime bureau, begun in 1924. Since his death in 1972, Hoover's actions with regard to civil rights and liberties have come under greater scrutiny. But many scholars have come to believe that despite his questionable reputation, Hoover's actions reflect more of who he was and his own personal principles than any kind of malevolent or vindictive motive-driven man that his public may have seen him to be. Nevertheless, whatever his motivations, as director of the FBI he often had very little regard for the civil liberties of American citizens.

Hoover's career began during World War I, when he was hired by the Justice Department's Enemy Alien Bureau to help process the arrest of enemy aliens. After the war, Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer put Hoover in charge of investigating radicals. He was a key player in the red scare and the Palmer raids of 1919–1920, which led to the arrest of thousands of socialists, labor organizers, aliens, radicals, and social reformers. Subsequently, Palmer and the Justice Department were discredited because of their massive violations of civil liberties, and the Radical Division of the Justice Department was shut down. Hoover, however, stayed in the Department and moved to the Bureau of Investigation in 1922. Attorney General Harry Daugherty appointed Hoover assistant to the director of this new bureau. Daugherty, friend and ally to then-President Harding, was impressed by Hoover's knowledge of the president's political opponents, and his use of this information to gain favor and advance his position. Hoover introduced to Daugherty his knowledge of communist infiltration in America, of which Daugherty was unaware at the time. By impressing government officials with his foresight and expertise in international intelligence, Hoover was able to gain continual attention within the department that would increase in status and power.

Hoover's rigid character and stringent principles set the pace and standards for a then less than upstanding Justice Department. Staff included Jess Smith, Edward McClean, and Gaston B. Means who were each involved in private dealings and illegal practices that included payoffs by underground alcohol distilleries and drug traffickers. Deception ran rampant throughout the department, including special agents with questionable loyalties to both Germany and Great Britain.

Hoover's first task was to rid the department of questionable characters, who he reasoned were a detriment and liability to the bureau's work and reputation. Hoover's talents of persuasion and tact enabled him to successfully rid the office of dubious characters like Means, who in addition also posed a threat to his own position within the bureau.

Hoover's first recognizable accomplishment and service to the department was the arrest of Edward Kleagle Young Clark, the person responsible for the organization and success of the Klu Klux Klan in Louisiana. Hoover had received word from journalist John M. Parker of a secret visit in 1922 from New Orleans Mayor Paul Wooton to Attorney General Daugherty with a note pleading for protection from the Klan. Daugherty had dismissed Wooton's repeated calls. With the growing threat from white supremacists and little support from the local police force, domestic violence and murder increased through out New Orleans, and Wooton was desperate for help. At least six individuals from the police force had been identified as being members of the Klu Klux Klan. Citizens were being forced to vacate their homes under the premise of racial cleansing; individuals were being beaten, whipped, and brutally murdered; and the number of KKK members was growing. Hoover was anxious to increase his authority and expand investigations. Allegations against the Klan included violating authority and law. In addition, Hoover was intent on putting an end to the contempt he saw from law enforcers. Interestingly enough, Hoover himself was not opposed to the idea of white supremacy. He was, however, outraged by the challenge to authority that he saw taking place among the organized leadership and members of the Klan.

On May 10, 1924, Hoover was promoted to the position of acting director of the Bureau of Investigation. From this point on, Hoover would reorganize the department into a national crime-fighting organization. Early successes would include the arrest of high-profile criminals like Charles "Pretty Boy" Floyd, "Machine Gun" Kelly, and Robert "Big Bob" Brady. Hoover deftly made the bureau's agents into heroes as they sought out famous criminals. As an example, bureau agents were hired to kill John Dillinger on a street in Chicago in July 1934. In 1935, the Bureau was renamed the Federal Bureau of Investigation with Hoover as its director. From the 1930s on, Hoover worked especially well with the media—including the movie industry and later television—to "sell" the FBI to the American people as the protector of American values and culture. Films included James Cagney's The G-Men (1935), the Jimmy Stewart film The FBI Story (1959), and the television series The FBI (1965–1974), starring Efrem Zimbalist, Jr., which all served to make Hoover's organization seem to be above politics and incorruptible. In fact, of course, Hoover was always deeply involved in politics, leveraging his information to gain power within the federal government, and using his agency to suppress those he feared or hated, whether they were communists, Nazis, or civil rights leaders like Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Hoover's principles and work ethic stood out as unsurpassed in stringency and severity, demanding from his staff a rigid compliance with bureau regulations. Hoover's orders to his agents elicited both a fear and certain control that had never before existed in the bureau. Agents with questionable backgrounds were immediately dismissed, new candidates were required to have degrees in law or accounting, and members of the Bureau with associations to those who posed any threat to Hoover's position were investigated. Work was conducted like clockwork. Memos and correspondence were triple checked for accuracy. Field offices in other states were modeled on the Washington hub, with parallel routine and conduct down to the physical appearance of each office. Hoover was systematic. Orders were carried out without question and the outcomes were beyond comparison to any federal investigative agency that had existed thus far.

Hoover's own personal character was reflected through his work conduct. He expected nothing less from his staff than that which he required of himself. Hoover's belief in authoritative control reflected what would soon brand him to be a hero. America was indebted to him for ridding the country of hoodlums, mobsters, and bandits. Hoover brought to the bureau a new perspective in undercover detective work.

The economic and political climate of the 1930s brought with it uncertainty and distrust. Fascist infiltration became an increasing concern in the minds of Americans who worried about an attack on the heartland. Hoover targeted Nazi groups that were developing bases of support in America, particularly the Bund, under investigation for possible espionage and trading of American intelligence secrets with Nazi Germany. Hoover immediately took action, wire tapping phone lines and positioning secret agents to sever and dismember the party. Hoover proclaimed fascism to be an even greater concern than that of communism, saying that it targeted the very foundation upon which this country was built. Hoover's actions led to the eventual deportation of members of the Bund, including German-born Americans. This action was subsequently shown to be questionable and without legitimate evidence. Backed by President Roosevelt's growing paranoia over enemy invasion, Hoover was free to exercise whatever tactics he believed necessary to address the issue and alleviate the country's growing concerns.

With the onslaught of the Depression and the decline of the economy, the United States was in a state of near collapse. The crime rate increased while the reality of war and Germany's attacks on Poland, Great Britain, Czechoslovakia, France, Belgium, Holland, Norway, and Denmark ensued. Although the federal law passed in 1934 made wire tapping a felony, Hoover reasoned that its usefulness in uncovering international espionage made it legitimate. President Roosevelt reaffirmed Hoover's decision, sending him a memo expressing his gratitude and appreciation for the bureau's continued efforts and support in protecting America's interests. Subsequently, Hoover was praised for raising an estimated $3,488,000 to continue the Bureau's investigations of international intelligence, sabotage, and the uncovering of German and Japanese spies.

December 7, 1941, marked a national date of infamy for Americans. On that day Pearl Harbor was attacked, and the United States declared war against Japan and Germany. In the 1930s, Hoover and the FBI investigated Nazis as well as communists and leftist radicals. He gathered information of the arrest of Axis sympathizers, and helped secure arrests immediately after the United States entered World War II. Although notorious for his lack of sensitivity to civil liberties or the rights of minorities, Hoover opposed the Japanese internment on the grounds that the FBI had already arrested or neutralized any potential Japanese saboteurs or spies. Thus, Hoover felt that the relocation and internment camps were unnecessary. However, he did encourage illegal wire tapping inside the relocation centers, and supported secret agents to uncover possible harbored information.

By this time, Hoover had gained a public reputation for his encroachment of civilian privacy, and for good reason. During Roosevelt's administration, in 1942, Hoover suspected First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt of having communist ties. His distrust for her led to an investigation. She was alleged to be having an illicit affair with the charismatic radical Joseph Lash. While on a trip to Chicago, Eleanor's hotel room phone line was tapped. The fabricated evidence, planted recordings of Lash and Eleanor, was revealed and was dismissed by the president. However, Hoover's aggressive tactics continued, and in January 1942 he authorized what came to be known as "black bag jobs." This tactic, of allowing agents to break into homes legally and conduct surveillance, intruded on the privacy of citizens under the auspices of federal business.

The 1950s held much tension across America as racial segregation and civil rights were brought to the forefront. On December 1, 1955, in Montgomery, Alabama, Rosa Parks, an African-American woman was arrested for refusing to ride in the back of the bus. A seamstress and one-time secretary to the president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), her actions precipitated a boycott of the Montgomery bus system. This led to one of the first major movements that Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. would lead for civil rights.

Hoover was reluctant to accept racial equality and made known his feelings to FBI staff members. Hoover was concerned over the growing power of African Americans across the country. He was decidedly against racial intermarriage; holding to his own standards and biases, he sided with whites who were intent on continuing the practice of segregation.

The United States was in a period of high anxiety, in part due to the growing hostilities with Russia, fear of communism, and the danger of a nuclear attack. The country was on high alert and every effort to pursue those suspected of involvement with communism was taken. Hoover also saw this as an opportunity to discredit the civil rights movement and African-American leader Martin Luther King Jr. by tying him to the threat of communism. Hoover used King's close association with Stanley Levison and Levison's hiring of Jack O'Dell to tie him to communism. Hoover's investigation found that O'Dell had ties to the Communist Party; King was then portrayed as a threat to national security.

Obsessed with tying King to communism, Hoover became enraged by Dr. King's questioning of bureau's misconduct and behavior. As King told reporters: "One of the great problems we face with the FBI is that the agents are white southerners.... To maintain their status ... they have to be friendly to the local police and people who are supporting and promoting racial segregation."

Wanting to rectify the situation, and prevent further information from leaking to the press, Hoover phoned King. The African-American leader was reluctant to respond and did not answer phone calls. Enraged by the lack of respect to authority that King exhibited toward Hoover, this slight encouraged the director to pursue King and his followers using tactics and threats harmful to both his reputation as a religious leader and activist. In Hoover's eyes, King needed to be brought to justice for the communistic influence and lies and deceit he was spreading to Americans.

Hoover was successful at influencing Attorney General Robert Kennedy and the president about the potential ties to communism that King had through O'Dell. Both Kennedy and the president tried persuading King to stop communications with O'Dell, but without success. Hoover ordered King's and Levison's phones tapped; many conversations were recorded.

On August 28, 1963, King delivered his speech on Capitol Hill to a quarter million people. The success of King's declaration was nationwide. Millions of Americans across the country listened while King called for equality, uniting citizens with the fundamental understanding of King's vision. In an attempt to soothe Hoover's wrath, Assistant Director Sullivan wrote a memo to the director stating: "We were completely wrong.... I believe in the light of King's powerful demagogic speech yesterday.... We must mark him now ... as the most powerful Negro in the nation." On October 10, 1963, Attorney General Robert Kennedy gave Hoover the permission to tap King's private home. Throughout the following years, Hoover would continue to tie King with communism, and would use whatever methods available to him, illegal or otherwise. Hoover also tried to smear and destroy King's reputation by taping his private moments, including his extramarital relations. For Hoover, King was an enemy of America, like the communists or the Nazis, and thus he was prepared to use any means, fair or foul, to destroy his reputation. This is some evidence that Hoover was going to threaten King with making this evidence public, in order to force King to commit suicide.

By this time, Hoover's reputation was in sharp decline. With the media publicly denouncing his actions toward Reverend King, and Hoover's reputation for privacy encroachment, Hoover was struggling for balance. As Time Magazine wrote: "J. Edgar Hoover has many old foes ... has made many new ones.... [U]ndoubtedly there will be pressure on the White House to boot the old fellow out of his job."

The 1960s and early 1970s brought new voices and issues, ranging from Black pride and the Black Panther Party, to young militants in the antiwar and civil rights movements, and the Watergate break-in, all of which the FBI targeted for investigations, among other activities. Hoover's reputation had fallen from grace with attendant cover-ups, sabotage, political blackmail, illegal surveillance, and invasion of privacy, and blatant deception. On May 2, 1972, America's "watchdog" was dead. Hoover's private secretary had fulfilled her last instructions by the director and destroyed all personal files containing dark secrets ranging from black bag jobs and hired killings to itemized reports on royalties and paid vacations.

Later material began to resurface, and Hoover's activities were reexamined; disturbing facts still concern historians today.

Despite his flawed reputation, Hoover wanted to create a Justice Department that would protect the American citizens from what he viewed as criminal activities. Many scholars have come to believe that his obsessions corrupted an otherwise respectable law enforcer. Hoover's flaws and greed for power cannot be denied, yet his performance for ridding the department of disloyal staff and carrying out government orders was stellar. He has been commended on several occasions by various presidents, and his greatest legacy to the United States is the FBI.

MARIA STILSON

References and Further Reading

- Gentry, Curt. J. Edgar Hoover: The Man and the Secrets. New York: W.W. Norton & Company, 1991.
- Hack, Richard. Puppetmaster: The Secret Life of J. Edgar Hoover. Beverly Hills, CA: New Millenium Press, 2004.
- Summers, Anthony. Official and Confidential: The Secret Life of J. Edgar Hoover. New York: G.P. Putnam, 1993.

HOPT v. UTAH, 110 U.S. 574 (1884)

The nineteenth-century Supreme Court rarely decided criminal procedure issues because it lacked appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases until the end of the century. An exception existed for writs of error to territorial courts, as in Hopt v. Utah, a significant early case addressing a number of rights of the accused.

Hopt's first-degree murder conviction in the Utah Territory was overturned during the 1881 October term. After a second conviction, the Supreme Court again reversed. The unanimous Court, in an opinion by Justice John Marshall Harlan I, identified three grounds for reversal, including improper admission of hearsay and flawed jury instructions. Most significantly, the Court held that the trial court erred in excluding Hopt from voir dire challenges to several jurors, declaring that criminal defendants could not waive the right to be present at every stage of the proceedings when substantial rights might be affected. This sweeping dicta has been rejected in subsequent cases, including Illinois v. Allen (1970).

Hopt was also the Court's first confession case. In dicta, the Court adopted the common-law voluntariness doctrine, which renders inadmissible confessions induced by threats or promises sufficient to overcome a defendant's free will. Thirteen years later, in Brams v. United States (1897), the Court would provide this right with a constitutional basis in the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination.

Hopt is also cited for holding that a change in Utah law, enacted after the murder, that made convicted felons competent witnesses did not violate the ex post facto clause.

EMERY G. LEE, III

References and Further Reading

- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bram v. United States*, 168 U.S. 532 (1897)
- Illinois v. Allen*, 397 U.S. 337 (1970)

See also Coerced Confession/Police Interrogation; Ex Post Facto Clause; Jury Trial Right

HOSTILE ENVIRONMENT AND EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION ISSUES AND FREE SPEECH

Definition

Employers are liable for allowing conduct and speech that seriously offends employees based on race, religion, and sex. A similar theory is also applicable to speech at universities, places of public accommodation, and apartment buildings and condominium complexes. When, if ever, does such liability violate the First Amendment?

Under hostile environment harassment law, employers are liable to offended employees:

1. if they fail to stop conduct or speech (by managers, coworkers, or patrons) that
2. is severe or pervasive enough
3. to create a hostile, abusive, or offensive work environment
4. based on race, religion, sex, national origin, age, disability, or—depending on the jurisdiction—sexual orientation, political affiliation, or other categories protected by antidiscrimination law
5. for the plaintiff
6. and for a reasonable person.

This can cover conduct, such as physical abuse. It can cover traditionally unprotected categories of speech, such as threats, fighting words, and obscenity. And it can cover speech that is generally constitutionally protected: racist, sexist, or antireligious political commentary; religious proselytizing; sexually themed humor; and the posting of sexually themed materials, whether pornography or “art.” (Note that the First Amendment applies to civil liability rules as well as criminal laws.)

Similar rules obligate university and K-12 educators, owners of restaurants and other public places, and landlords and condominium associations to prevent (when possible) offensive speech and conduct by employees, students, patrons, and tenants. Hostile environment harassment law is not the same as “quid pro quo” harassment law, which bans sexual extortion (“sleep with me or I’ll fire you”). It’s also unrelated to criminal telephone harassment laws and stalking laws.

Origin

Hostile environment harassment law was largely developed by courts from federal and state statutes that ban discrimination based on race, religion, sex, and other attributes in (among other things) the “terms and conditions” of employment. Courts have held that the work environment is one such condition, so an employer can be held liable for tolerating an environment that is especially offensive for members of a certain group.

Practical Effect

Hostile environment harassment law generally imposes liability only for multiple, “pervasive” statements; it does not punish isolated statements unless they are “severe.” But the law deters individual statements, even when they are not themselves enough to create an offensive environment.

Reasonable employers realize they can be sued for the aggregate of many employees’ statements—for instance, sexual jokes emailed by some employees, sexist statements said in the lunchroom by others, and sexually themed material visible on the computers of others. To prevent such liability, employers cannot simply order employees, “Don’t say things that, when aggregated with others’ statements, are severe or pervasive enough to create an offensive environment based on race, religion, or sex.” Such a policy would not tell employees what to do, because (1) each employee may not know what others are saying, and (2) the terms are too vague.

Instead, the employer must ban individual statements, and define the forbidden statements with specificity. The result is policies that ban even isolated politically offensive statements, sexually themed jokes or art, and the like.

First Amendment Analysis

The Supreme Court has not decided when harassment law may constitutionally impose liability for otherwise protected speech; lower courts have gone both ways.

Hostile environment harassment law is a government-imposed speech restriction: it uses government power to pressure universities, places of public accommodation, landlords, and private employers to restrict speech.

Moreover, the law restricts speech, not just conduct, and covers speech because of its content (and sometimes its viewpoint). Content-neutral restrictions, for instance, on excessive noise, are generally upheld; but harassment law is not content neutral.

Hostile work environment law is generally limited to workplaces, and is thus less severe than a total ban on speech (although it cannot be labeled a “time, place, and manner restriction,” since that label is reserved for content-neutral restraints).

On the other hand, nearly every place is someone’s workplace. Hostile work environment law thus restricts speech even in universities, libraries, television writers’ offices, art schools, and public buildings. Also, most employees spend a third of their waking hours at work. Government-coerced restrictions on expression at work (whether a university or a law office) thus substantially restrict people’s freedom to speak.

A stronger argument in favor of harassment law’s constitutionality is that speech should be more restrictable when listeners are a “captive audience” that is practically unable to avoid the speech. The Court has suggested that some content-based restrictions aimed at protecting captive audiences are constitutional, although it has rarely upheld such restrictions.

It is hard to tell whether the Court will ultimately accept this “captive audience doctrine,” given how often people are “captives” to speech they dislike, at least in the sense of having to hear it every week or month. (Statements may be “pervasive” under harassment law even if they are heard only several times a year.) Because employees are ubiquitous, there will probably be such a “captive” in most places. Moreover, labor picketing—which sometimes includes offensive comments—also targets a captive audience: Employees may have to see the picket line twice a day or more.

Another defense of harassment law is that the law serves a “compelling government interest” in preserving equal access to work, education, public accommodation, and housing, and that this interest trumps the speaker’s First Amendment rights. Again, the Court has sometimes endorsed such a “compelling interest” argument, but rarely used it to uphold content-based speech restrictions.

It is unclear how willing the Court will be to allow free speech rights to be trumped this way. There are many compelling interests that backers of various restrictions have asserted—promoting a war effort, preventing violence against police officers, and more. Many such interests, like the interest in equality, echo explicit constitutional provisions (the war power, the right to life, and so on). If a future Court decides that such interests should trump speech rights, it may uphold a wide range of restrictions, including harassment law. But if the Court generally thinks that free speech rights trump even really important government interests, then it may be reluctant to carve out an exception for racially, religiously, or sexually offensive speech.

EUGENE VOLOKH

References and Further Reading

- Balkin, Jack, Free Speech and Hostile Environments, 99 Columbia Law Review (1999): 2295 (mostly taking a similar view to Epstein’s).
- Browne, Kingsley R., Title VII as Censorship: Hostile Environment Harassment and the First Amendment, Ohio State Law Journal 52 (1991): 481 (taking the view that hostile work environment harassment law is unconstitutional as to virtually all otherwise protected speech).
- Epstein, Deborah, Can a “Dumb Ass Woman” Achieve Equality in the Workplace? Running the Gauntlet of Hostile Environment Harassing Speech, Georgetown Law Journal 84 (1996): 399 (taking the opposite view from Browne’s).
- Estlund, Cynthia, Freedom of Speech in the Workplace and the Problem of Discriminatory Harassment, Texas Law Review 75 (1997): 687 (taking an intermediate position).
- Volokh, Eugene, Freedom of Speech and Workplace Harassment, UCLA Law Review 39 (1992): 1791, republished in updated form at <http://www.law.ucla.edu/volokh/harass> (likewise takes an intermediate position).
- , What Speech Does “Hostile Work Environment” Harassment Law Restrict?, Georgetown Law Journal 85 (1997): 627, republished in updated form at <http://www.law.ucla.edu/volokh/harass/breadth.htm> (focusing only on what workplace harassment law covers).
- , Freedom of Speech, Cyberspace, Harassment Law, and the Clinton Administration, Law and Contemporary Problems 63 (2000): 299, parts III–V, <http://www.law.ucla.edu/volokh/harass/cyberspa.htm> (focusing on what hostile educational environment harassment law and hostile public accommodations environment harassment law cover).

HOUCHINS v. KQED, INC., 438 U.S. 1 (1978)

In Houchins v. KQED, Inc., the U.S. Supreme Court in a plurality decision ruled that the First Amendment does not require the right of access to government information or sources of information within the government’s control.

Radio and television broadcaster KQED, Inc., contended that its First Amendment right to gather the news implicitly included a right of access to the Santa Rita county jail to investigate horrid prison conditions that allegedly caused one prisoner to commit suicide and contributed to prisoner mental illness. The Supreme Court disagreed, and decided that the restrictions imposed by the county sheriff permitting the media to join other members of the public in monthly tours of the jail, but prohibiting the press from bringing cameras and tape recorders and interviewing the prisoners, were permissible under the First Amendment. While acknowledging the public importance of prison conditions and the media’s role in publicizing those conditions, the Supreme Court emphatically eschewed any First Amendment guarantee of access to sources of information within government control beyond that afforded the public generally.

The decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in Houchins is important for two reasons. First, the decision clarifies the reach of the First Amendment by expressly protecting the right of the press to gather and disseminate news, but excluding any corollary obligation by the government to supply or grant access to information. Second, Houchins rejects the notion that the press has special status under the First Amendment; rather, the right of the press to promote free discussion of ideas and exchange opinions is neither different from nor greater than the right of the public generally.

EDWARD J. SCHOEN

References and Further Reading

- Collins, Tom A., The Press Clause Construed in Context: The Journalists’ Right of Access to Places, Missouri Law Review (1987): 773–84.
- Pell v. Procunier*, 417 U.S. 817 (1974).
- Saxbe v. Washington Post Co.*, 417 U.S. 843 (1974).
- Schwartz, Bernard, Is There a Press Right of Access to News That Allows Television of Executions?, Tulsa Law Journal (1994): 313–9.
- The Supreme Court, 1977 Term*, Harvard Law Review (1978): 174–84.

HOUSE UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES COMMITTEE

The House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) was formed on May 26, 1938. Reorganized from its previous incarnations as the Fish Committee and the McCormack-Dickstein Committee, the HUAC, was established under the chairmanship of Martin Dies Jr. (D-Tex.). It was a committee of the U.S. House of Representatives, created to investigate disloyalty and subversive organizations. Relying on its subpoena power, the HUAC used the Smith Act to compel suspected communists to appear and interrogated them regarding their relationships to communist organizations and about the political activities of any and all friends and acquaintances.

In prewar years and during World War II it was known as the Dies Committee. Its work was supposed to be aimed mostly at German-American involvement in Nazi and Ku Klux Klan activities. Instead of the Klan, the HUAC concentrated on investigating the possibility that the American Communist Party had infiltrated the Works Progress Administration, including the Federal Theater Project. The HUAC became a standing committee in 1946. Under the mandate of Public Law 601, passed by the Seventy-ninth Congress, the committee of nine representatives investigated suspected threats of subversion or propaganda that "attacks the form of government guaranteed by our Constitution."

In 1947, the HUAC began an investigation into the Hollywood Motion Picture Industry. The committee's methods included pressure on witnesses to name former associates, vague and sweeping accusations against individuals, and the assumption of an individual's guilt because of association with a suspect organization. Witnesses who refused to answer were cited for contempt of Congress. A highly publicized 1947 investigation of the entertainment industry led to prison sentences for contempt for a group of recalcitrant witnesses who became known as the Hollywood Ten. The Hollywood Ten consisted of notable actors, writers, and directors who refused to cooperate with HUAC's investigations of communist ties of their Hollywood colleagues under the protection of the First Amendment. There were also witnesses who refused to testify on the grounds of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. This, however, was perceived in some circles to be a tacit admission of guilt, and these witnesses were labeled "Fifth Amendment Communists."

In 1948, Whittaker Chambers made sensational accusations of Soviet espionage against former State Department official Alger Hiss; those hearings provided the first national exposure for committee member Richard Nixon. The high-profile conviction of Alger Hiss for perjuring himself before HUAC while answering questions about his alleged espionage, was followed in 1951 by the convictions of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg for conspiring to pass United States atomic secrets to the Soviet Union.

The Supreme Court generally upheld the actions of the HUAC. In Dennis v. United States (1951), the Court upheld the Smith Act convictions of eleven Communist Party leaders. In Barsky v. Board of Regents (1954), it upheld New York's termination of a college professor who had refused to cooperate with HUAC. However, in a series of cases in 1956 and 1957, climaxing on what opponents referred to as "Red Monday," four decisions were issued June 17, 1957, which reined in the scope of the HUAC. These decisions had the Court siding with parties challenging anticommunist policies. In Watkins v. United States (1957), the Court overturned the contempt conviction of an uncooperative HUAC witness. However, after severe criticism the justices upheld the prison sentence of a Smith Act defendant in 1961. After 1962, the Court, through its decisions indicated that it no longer would tolerate prosecutions based on an individual's refusal to testify to legislative committees regarding communist associations.

The committee, renamed the House Internal Security Committee in 1969, was abolished in 1975, and its functions were transferred to the House Judiciary Committee.

G. L. TYLER

References and Further Reading

- Borson, Michael. Red Scared! The Commie Menace in Propaganda and Popular Culture. San Francisco: Chronicle Books, 2001.
- Fried, Albert. McCarthyism, The Great American Red Scare: A Documentary History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Navasky, S. Victor. Naming Names. New York: Hill and Wang, 2003.
- O'Reilly, Kenneth. Hoover and the Un-Americans: The FBI, HUAC, and the Red Menace. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1983.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barsky v. Board of Regents*, 347 U.S. 442 (1954)
- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
- Watkins v. United States*, 354 U.S. 178 (1957)

HOYT v. MINNESOTA,
399 U.S. 524 (1970)

See Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967)

HUDSON v. LOUISIANA,
450 U.S. 40 (1981)

Tracy Lee Hudson was convicted of murder by a Louisiana jury. Although the trial judge questioned the sufficiency of the evidence supporting the jury's verdict, under Louisiana law he could neither direct a verdict nor acquit the defendant. Hudson's only means of challenging the sufficiency of the evidence was to move for a new trial. The trial judge granted Hudson's motion, saying: "I heard the same evidence the jury did[;] I'm convinced that there was no evidence, certainly not evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, to sustain the verdict of the homicide committed by this defendant of this particular victim." The new trial resulted in a conviction. Hudson claimed that the second trial constituted double jeopardy.

Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr. wrote the unanimous opinion, clarifying the meaning of double jeopardy and articulating the rule that protection against a second trial attaches when the first trial concludes with a judicial finding of insufficient evidence.

Louisiana claimed that an earlier decision, Burks v. United States (1978), applied when a reviewing court found there was no evidence to support a conviction, but not when there was insufficient evidence. The state also argued Hudson's case was distinct from Burks because it was the trial judge who found a failure of evidence, rather than the reviewing court. The Supreme Court rejected Louisiana's arguments, quoting the judge's statement to show he had not merely acted as a "13th juror."

Hudson establishes that a defendant cannot be retried after a trial judge finds the first conviction to be unsupported by evidence.

SARA FAHERTY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978)

See also Double Jeopardy

HUDSON v. PALMER,
468 U.S. 517 (1984)

In Hudson v. Palmer, the Supreme Court held that a prisoner has no Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures of his or her prison cell. The prisoner plaintiff alleged that a guard had conducted a "shakedown" search of his cell to harass him, and "intentionally destroyed certain of his noncontraband personal property." The Court unanimously agreed that no procedural due process right arises from unauthorized intentional deprivations if there is a meaningful postdeprivation remedy. It split five to four, however, on the question of whether prisoners retain "any residuum of privacy or possessory rights" (Stevens, J., dissenting).

Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Burger posited that although a prisoner may have a subjective expectation of privacy, society did not recognize it as reasonable in light of institutional security concerns. Accordingly, the Court held that "the Fourth Amendment proscription against unreasonable searches does not apply within the confines of the prison cell," reasoning that affording prisoners a privacy right in their cells would defeat effective, safe prison administration.

In his dissenting opinion, Justice Stevens questioned whether "society" would divest prisoners of all privacy interests in their cells. He eloquently described the practical importance of these interests and the basis for their protection in the Fourteenth, Eighth and First Amendments: "Personal letters, snapshots of family members, a souvenir . . . may enable a prisoner to maintain contact with some part of his past and an eye to the possibility of a better future."

DONNA H. LEE

References and Further Reading

Hall, Kermit L., et al., eds. The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Boston, John, and Daniel E. Manville. Prisoners' Self-Help Litigation Manual. 3rd ed. New York: Oceana Publications, 1995.

Junker, John M., The Structure of the Fourth Amendment: The Scope of the Protection, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 79 (1989): 1105:1163–6.

Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967).

Parratt v. Taylor, 451 U.S. 527 (1981).

See also Prisoners and Free Speech

HUGHES COURT (1930–1941)

"We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is," noted Governor Charles Evans Hughes of New York, circa 1906. Lochner v. New York (1905) had enshrined "freedom of contract" into the Constitution. The Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause guarded only

Mr. Lochner's liberty of sweatshop. Adkins v. Children's Hospital carried this laissez faire constitutionalism forward in 1923. Government regulation was anathema to Justices Van Devanter, McReynolds, Sutherland, and Butler. All of this would change in the generation that came of age during the years of Chief Justice Hughes's Court, 1930 to 1941. The Great Depression confounded the judges, as did Franklin Roosevelt and his Court-packing plan. How much these externals influenced the judges is debated among scholars. However, there should be no doubt of the place of the Hughes Court as a bulwark of modern civil liberties. William O. Douglas, a judge of the new generation of Roosevelt appointees, was asked which Supreme Court justice had the greatest influence on him. His answer: "I think probably one of our greatest judges in all history is Charles Evans Hughes, who was Chief Justice when I came on the Court. He was a very bold, courageous judge who saw clearly when it came to human rights, civil rights, the rights of minorities." From Near v. Minnesota's (1931) condemnation of prior restraints of speech and press, through Chief Justice Hughes's resounding opinion in Mitchell v. United States (1941), shortly before he retired, the torch of civil liberties burned brightly. Mitchell reversed the Interstate Commerce Commission and condemned the "essentially unjust" discrimination against a member of Congress on an interstate train "based solely upon the fact that he was a Negro." In Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada (1938), Hughes wrote: "Lloyd Gaines is entitled to admission to Missouri's Law School without respect to color." This was a precursor of things to come. The Hughes Court coldly resisted the "haste of the mob." It insisted on the right to counsel, condemned race discrimination in jury selection, and outlawed coerced confessions. It is in the field of civil liberties, the Hughes Court proves, that judicial supremacy finds its enduring justification in American constitutionalism.

Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes's "clear and present danger" test, announced in the Schenck v. United States (1919) case, was regularly applied by the Hughes Court to protect the citizen's right to talk, to peaceably assemble, to distribute religious pamphlets, to engage in labor picketing, to practice one's religious beliefs, and to fuss at the government. "Therein lies the security of the Republic, the very foundation of constitutional government," wrote Chief Justice Hughes. When a young woman of nineteen named Stromberg raised the flag of Soviet Russia at a Communist League summer camp, California put her in jail. But there was no incitement to riot; there was no imminent danger. The Hughes Court set her free. Liberty and the First Amendment embrace the flag as a symbol of protest. Sixty years later, the Supreme Court would extend Stromberg v. California (1931) beyond the Hughes Court to protect those who would burn the U.S. flag as a symbol of protest.

Justice Owen Roberts, a central figure on the Hughes Court, reached out to protect Jesse Cantwell, a Jehovah's Witness, from censorship of religion: "In every case the power to regulate must be so exercised as not, in attaining a permissible end, unduly to infringe the protected freedom." The same Justice Roberts who in the past condemned New Deal economic regulation as unreasonable, now weighed legislative restrictions upon freedom of speech, press, religion, and found them wanting.

After the Court-packing crisis quieted down, Justices Hugo Black, William O. Douglas, and Frank Murphy joined a reconstituted Hughes Court. All were zealous bulwarks of civil liberties. They put civil rights first, and John D. Rockefeller's property second. The same is true for Justice Louis D. Brandeis, a progressive of Woodrow Wilson's era, and Harlan Fiske Stone, sometime dean of the Columbia Law School. Both men sat on the Hughes Court. Justice Stone's dissent in United States v. Butler in 1936 shook the very foundation of the Supreme Court's assault on Congress: "The only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint." But in the field of civil liberties, writing for the Hughes Court, Stone insisted that the government must carry the burden of proving a compelling justification for any restriction of civil liberties, and the government must use the least restrictive means available. Harvard Law School Professor Felix Frankfurter joined the Hughes Court in 1939. Frankfurter's view of the judicial role was narrower. In Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940), he wrote: "Lillian Gobitis must recite the pledge of alliance and salute the national flag notwithstanding her sincere religious convictions, or be expelled from public school." Justice Frankfurter's opinion in the First Flag Salute Case baffled Mrs. Roosevelt. Why would Frankfurter, who keenly supported civil rights as a professor, turn his back on religious conscience? The answer lies in Frankfurter's insistence on judicial restraint: to sustain Gobitis's claim "would in effect make us the school board for the country. That authority has not been given to this Court, nor should we assume it." Justice Stone dissented, alone. Three years later, Justices Black and Douglas switched their votes. This time, Justice Robert H. Jackson's ringing opinion in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943) saved the First Amendment from the Court itself and put freedom of conscience back into the Bill of Rights.

On Lincoln's birthday in 1940, the Hughes Court reversed the death sentences of four "ignorant young colored tenant farmers” based on coerced confessions, in Chambers v. Florida.

Due process of law, preserved for all by our Constitution, commands that no such practice as that disclosed by this record shall send any accused to his death. No higher duty, no more solemn responsibility, rests upon this Court, than that of translating this constitutional shield deliberately planned and inscribed for the benefit of every human being subject to our Constitution—of whatever race, creed or persuasion.

Chief Justice Hughes wrote on a proof copy of Justice Black’s Chambers opinion: “Clear as a bell.”

PAUL R. BAIER

References and Further Reading

- Freund, Paul A., Charles Evans Hughes as Chief Justice, Harvard Law Review 81 (1967): 1:4–43.
 Hendel, Samuel. Charles Evans Hughes and the Supreme Court. New York: Columbia University Press, 1951.
 Jackson, Robert H. The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy. New York: Knopf, 1941.
 Parrish, Michael. “The Hughes Court, the Great Depression, and the Historians.” The Historian 40, no. 2 (1978): 286–308.
 ———. The Hughes Court. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.
 Pusey, Merlo J. Charles Evans Hughes. New York: Macmillan, 1951.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adkins v. Children’s Hospital*, 261 U.S. 525 (1923)
Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227 (1940)
Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 337 (1938)
Mitchell v. United States, 313 U.S. 80 (1941)
Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931)
United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1 (1936)
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)
- See also Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Brown v. Mississippi, 279 U.S. 278 (1936); Butler, Pierce; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940); Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227 (1940); Clear and Present Danger Test; Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation; De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353 (1937); Douglas, William Orville; Flag Salute Cases; Flag Burning; Frankfurter, Felix; Freedom of Contract; Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939); Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Hughes, Charles Evans; Jackson, Robert H.; Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905); McReynolds, James C.; Murphy, Frank; Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931); New Deal and Civil Liberties;

Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932); Prior Restraints; Right to Counsel; Roberts, Owen Josephus; Roosevelt, Franklin Delano; Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919); Scottsboro Trials; Stone, Harlan Fiske; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

HUGHES, CHARLES EVANS (1862–1948)

Lawyer, reformer, governor, secretary of state, presidential candidate, and twice a member of the U.S. Supreme Court—once as an associate justice and once as chief justice—Charles Evans Hughes played a major role in twentieth-century American jurisprudence. Remembered primarily as the man who led the Court through the constitutional crisis of 1937, Hughes was not a profound thinker, but he was extremely systematic in his thought. While economically conservative, Hughes nonetheless had a deep sympathy for the oppressed and for civil liberties.

Two main themes marked Hughes’s jurisprudence. First, he believed in enhancing the power of state and national governments to deal with the economy. Although in the 1930s he occasionally voted against this belief, over the course of his two different tenures on the Court it remained a consistent motif. Second, he wanted to give substance to the restraints imposed by the Constitution in order to protect the rights of individuals.

During his first term on the Court (1910–1916), he wrote the opinion in Bailey v. Alabama (1911) striking down the South’s peonage system, by which blacks could be condemned to a near slave-like bondage through manipulation of debt laws. His solicitude for personal rights also manifested it self in Truax v. Raich (1915), in which he spoke for the Court in voiding an Arizona statute limiting the number of aliens a single employer could hire. Although he normally deferred to the legislature in matters of economic regulation, in this case he found the law a blatant form of discrimination against aliens, depriving them of the constitutional “right to work for a living.”

Hughes wrote one of the earliest decisions retreating from the Court’s endorsement of segregation in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896). He wrote for a bare majority of the Court in declaring unconstitutional an Oklahoma statute that provided for luxury cars for whites, but none for people of color. Even if only one Negro wanted such an accommodation, Hughes wrote, the railroad had to provide it; if the Plessy formula were to be kept, the accommodations, while separate, had to be equal (McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. [1914]).

Hughes left the Court to run unsuccessfully for president on the Republican ticket in 1916, and then returned to New York to open a private law practice. His concern for civil liberties remained, and in 1920, on his own initiative, he volunteered his services on behalf of five elected New York assemblymen who had been denied their seats because they were Socialists. Although unsuccessful in the atmosphere of the red scare hysteria, the gesture nonetheless would be counted an important step in helping to build a civil liberties consciousness in the country.

Named by Herbert Hoover to be chief justice in 1930, Hughes's record on civil liberties is mixed, although for the most part the pro-liberties opinions contributed greatly to a new jurisprudence of rights that would emerge in the 1950s and 1960s. In fact, his appointment to replace Taft reversed a five-to-four majority in a pending case, and established an important doctrine in press clause jurisprudence.

The Minnesota legislature had authorized suppression of "malicious, scandalous and defamatory" newspapers, and Jay Near, the editor of the Saturday Press, had challenged the law as a violation of his press freedom. Taft had been willing to uphold the law, but when Hughes took over he voted with the four dissenters, and in his opinion in Near v. Minnesota (1931), established two basic principles. First, the press clause of the First Amendment applied to the states through incorporation by the Fourteenth Amendment, and second, there could be no prior restraint by the state on what newspapers published.

That same year, in Stromberg v. California (1931), Hughes wrote the Court's opinion voiding a state law prohibiting the flying of so-called provocative flags or symbols. Harry Kalven, Jr. called the decision "the first case in the history of the Court in which there was an explicit victory for free speech."

A majority of the Court, however, continued to regard governmental power superior to individual rights in a number of areas. In 1934, with Hughes dissenting, the majority rejected the appeal of a religious conscientious objector who had been denied citizenship because his pacifism would not allow him to swear that he would take up arms for his new country (United States v. Macintosh [1931]). A few years later a unanimous Court upheld the right of the state to require compulsory officers training among male students at state universities (Hamilton v. University of California Regents [1934]).

In the mid-1930s, Hughes and the Court were embroiled in the conflict between Congress and the President on the one hand trying to enact reform legislation, and the five-man conservative majority on the Court voting to nullify such legislation, all leading up to the Court-packing plan and constitutional crisis of 1937. After that the battle had been won, and the Court no longer struck down economic regulation.

In his last years as chief justice, Hughes and the Court began to pay more attention to the questions of civil rights and liberties that would constitute the bulk of the Court's agenda for the next three decades. In an otherwise obscure case, United States v. Carolene Products Co. (1938), Justice Stone, in an opinion joined by Hughes, put forward the notion that courts had to apply a stricter scrutiny to matters involving rights and/or minorities. In De Jonge v. Oregon (1937), the Court unanimously overturned the conviction of a man for doing no more than attending a Communist Party meeting. In Herndon v. Lowry (1938), the Court for the first time overturned a conviction for allegedly illicit speech, claiming that the nature of the speech did not constitute a clear and present danger.

In the 1930s, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) began its campaign to eliminate segregation, and made a deliberate decision that the only way it could be successful would be by attacking racial prejudice through the courts. In the first major case to reach the Court, Chief Justice Hughes startled the South by insisting that if it wanted to keep segregated schools, then it would have to make them equal as well (Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada [1938])—an echo of what he had written nearly a quarter-century earlier in the McCabe case.

All told, for a man whose reputation is tied primarily to the constitutional crisis of 1937 and who is seen, properly, as a conservative, Charles Evans Hughes record on civil rights and liberties is important, not only for the decisions themselves, but also for the basis they laid in expanding civil liberties after his tenure.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Danelski, David J., and Joseph S. Tulchin, eds. The Autobiographical Notes of Charles Evans Hughes. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973.
- Paul A. Freund, Charles Evans Hughes as Chief Justice, Harvard Law Review 81 (1967): 4.
- Hendel, Samuel. Charles Evans Hughes and the Supreme Court. New York: King's Crown Press, 1951.
- Pusey, Merlo J. Charles Evans Hughes. 2 vols. New York: Macmillan, 1952.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bailey v. Alabama*, 219 U.S. 219 (1911)
- De Jonge v. Oregon*, 299 U.S. 353 (1937)

Hamilton v. University of California Regents, 293 U.S. 245 (1934)
Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 444 (1938)
McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., 235 U.S. 151 (1914)
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 339 (1938)
Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931)
Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33 (1915)
United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
United States v. Macintosh, 238 U.S. 605 (1931)

HUNT v. MCNAIR, 413 U.S. 734 (1973)

In Hunt v. McNair, the Supreme Court rejected an Establishment Clause challenge to the South Carolina Educational Facilities Authority Act. The act established an Authority to issue revenue bonds to finance construction of facilities at higher education institutions—as long as the facilities would not be used for religious instruction or worship. None of the state’s general revenues were used to support the Authority; however, the interest on the revenue bonds was tax-exempt under both federal and South Carolina law, so the bonds could be marketed to schools at a lower interest rate than if they secured private financing. In January 1970, the Authority preliminarily approved the Baptist College at Charleston’s application for $3.5 million of revenue bonds for capital improvements.

The South Carolina Supreme Court upheld the act. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, vacated the state court’s judgment and remanded it for reconsideration in light of Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971) and Tilton v. Richardson (1971), which articulated a new establishment clause test and distinguished between state aid to sectarian K-12 schools (more likely to promote religious indoctrination) and state aid to sectarian higher education institutions (more likely to promote secular ends). On remand, the South Carolina Supreme Court adhered to its earlier decision.

The Supreme Court’s six-to-three decision, authored by Justice Lewis Powell, applied the three-prong establishment clause test adopted in Lemon. The act survived the first prong because the Court concluded that it had a secular purpose—public, private, secular, and religious schools alike can promote higher education. The act survived the second prong because the Court found that the primary effect of the law did not promote religion. The Court allowed that state aid to a church-affiliated school was permissible under the second prong as long as the school was not “pervasively sectarian.” Finally, the act survived the third prong because the Court held that the inspections necessary to ensure that the constructed facilities were not used for religious purposes would not cause impermissible entanglement between the state and the college. In contrast to the church-related elementary schools in Lemon that failed this final prong because religious indoctrination was a substantial activity in the schools, the Court concluded that religious indoctrination was not any more significant at the Baptist College than it was at the college in Tilton. The Court conceded that the constitutionality of the statute would be a closer question if the Authority were to become involved in the college’s daily financial and policy decisions, but it left that question for another day.

In dissent, Justices Brennan, Douglas, and Marshall argued that the act violated the entanglement prong of the Lemon test because it required the state to police the everyday affairs of the college for the duration of the revenue bonds. The dissenters contended that the establishment clause prohibits both indirect aid to religious institutions, like the act’s financing scheme, and direct financial support to such entities.

The Court’s more recent establishment clause cases, in particular Agostini v. Felton (1997), call into question the Hunt Court’s assertion that government aid to pervasively sectarian institutions is impermissible.

DENISE C. MORGAN

References and Further Reading

Levy, Leonard Williams. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
 Collier, Trent, Revenue Bonds and Religious Education: The Constitutionality of Conduit Financing Involving Pervasively Sectarian Institutions, Michigan Law Review 100 (2002): 5:1108–55.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
Tilton v. Roemer, 403 U.S. 672 (1971)

HURLEY v. IRISH-AMERICAN GAY, LESBIAN, AND BISEXUAL GROUP OF BOSTON, 515 U.S. 557 (1995)

March 17 in Boston is St. Patrick’s Day and Evacuation Day, marking Washington’s military victory over the British in 1776 and their departure from South Boston. Until 1947, the city formally sponsored the St. Patrick’s Day-Evacuation Day parade; the city then officially turned sponsorship over to an informal group, the South Boston Allied War Veterans Council, although through 1992 the city also allowed the group to use the official city seal and provided direct monetary support for the parade.

In 1992, the Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston (GLIB) was formed to march in the parade. GLIB's members sought.

to express pride in their Irish heritage as openly gay, lesbian, and bisexual individuals, to demonstrate that there are such men and women among those so descended, and to express their solidarity with like individuals who sought to march in New York's St. Patrick's Day Parade.

Although rejected by the Council, GLIB marched peacefully under their own banner pursuant to a court order, but the Council again rejected their application to march the next year.

GLIB again filed suit against the Council and John J. "Wacko" Hurley, a representative of the Council whom the trial court found made the decisions as to who would march. The court concluded that the parade, a huge event attracting up to a million observers and as many as 20,000 marchers, was a place of public accommodation within the meaning of Massachusetts antidiscrimination statutes, and that the defendants had unlawfully excluded GLIB on the basis of its members' sexual orientation. The state supreme court affirmed, rejecting the defendants' argument that forcing it to accept GLIB violated its rights to free speech or expressive association under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The defendants sought review of this decision from the U.S. Supreme Court, which unanimously reversed, holding that applying the state public accommodations law to the parade violated the Council's First Amendment rights. Because GLIB did not challenge the trial court's conclusion that there was insufficient government involvement to count as "state action" and trigger GLIB's own rights under the U.S. Constitution, the only issue was whether the statute as applied violated the parade organizers' First Amendment rights.

The U.S. Supreme Court held that it did. Independently reviewing the factual record because First Amendment rights were at stake, the Court held that parades such as the South Boston St. Patrick's Day-Evacuation Day parade were inherently expressive. It did not matter that the organizers could not show a precise message with which GLIB's participation as a unit would conflict; "a narrow, succinctly articulable message is not a condition of constitutional protection." As coordinators of the parade's message or messages, the Council were in effect the "editors" of the parade, with a First Amendment right to choose to include only those messages of which they approved. The Council would let GLIB's members march with other units; it was only GLIB's efforts to march under their own message or banner that the Council resisted, and that choice was constitutionally protected. This notion of editorial or speaker autonomy was supported by precedent, and in turn was controversially extended in Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (2000).

DAVID B. CRUZ

References and Further Reading

- Hutchinson, Darren Lenard, Accommodating Outness: Hurley, Free Speech, and Gay and Lesbian Equality, University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law 1 (1998): 85.
- Madigan, James P., Questioning the Coercive Effect of Self-Identifying Speech, Iowa Law Review 87 (2001): 75.
- Sunder, Madhavi, Authorship and Autonomy as Rites of Exclusion: The Intellectual Propertyization of Free Speech in Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, Stanford Law Review 49 (1996): 143.
- Yackle, Larry W., Parading Ourselves: Freedom of Speech at the Feast of St. Patrick, Boston University Law Review 73 (1993): 791.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)

See also First Amendment and PACs

HURTADO v. CALIFORNIA, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)

Hurtado was the first major U.S. Supreme Court case in which a right protected in the U.S. Constitution was not extended to the states. The right in question was the right to indictment by a grand jury, on appeal from the Supreme Court of California. The basis was laid in the Slaughterhouse Cases (1873), when the Supreme Court reached a decision by selecting one narrow right among many, without finding that the intent of the Fourteenth Amendment had been to extend such protection to all such rights. This gave practical effect to the incorporation doctrine, which holds that the Fourteenth Amendment does not extend all rights to the states.

The decision reflects the advent in the latter nineteenth century of the position of public prosecutor, often called a district attorney, as a full-time official. When the United States was founded, criminal prosecutions were conducted by private lawyers or even by nonlawyers, sometimes compensated from a public fund, but more often pro bono or compensated by victims of a crime or by public subscription. Elected public prosecutors developed a preference for filing an “information” as an alternative to seeking an indictment from a grand jury. This saves time and money, but risks the prosecution of persons who are innocent, especially by elected prosecutors with ambitions for higher office, who may be careless about making sure that they have the right person.

Most states still use grand juries, many having the right in their state constitutions. California still uses grand juries; at present they are seldom used for indictments but rather to investigate the operations of government, a function that the grand juries of other states lack the time to address.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- Hurtado v. California*, 110 U.S. 516 (1884). Opinion by Justice Matthews (<http://www.constitution.org/ussc/110-516a.htm>), dissent by Justice Harlan (<http://www.constitution.org/ussc/110-516b.htm>).
- Roland, Jon. “Intent of the Fourteenth Amendment Was to Protect All Rights.” Constitution Society, September 2000. http://www.constitution.org/col/intent_14th.htm.
- Tooke, John Horne. Address on Libels, Case of John Horne, 1777. Constitution Society. <http://www.constitution.org/jury/cmt/took1777/took1777.htm>. (Criticism of indictment by information, rather than by grand jury. May have contributed to requirement for grand juries in U.S. Bill of Rights.)

Cases and Statutes Cited

Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1873)

See also Grand Jury

HUSTLER MAGAZINE v. FALWELL, 485 U.S. 46 (1988)

The landmark First Amendment decision in Hustler Magazine v. Falwell arose from a battle between Larry Flynt, colorful publisher of the pornography magazine Hustler, and the popular conservative televangelist, Reverend Jerry Falwell. Larry Flynt and Hustler ran an “advertisement parody” in which Jerry Falwell was depicted as endorsing Campari liqueur. The mock advertisement in crude language depicted Jerry Falwell as having had his first sexual experience with his mother in an outhouse in Lynchburg, Virginia. Falwell and his mother were made out to be drunken, incestuous hypocrites. The ad was labeled “ad-parody—not to be taken seriously,” and was indexed in the table of contents as “Fiction—Ad and Personality Parody.” Falwell sued Flynt in federal district court in Virginia for appropriation of his name and likeness, defamation, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. At the trial, the jury found that no reasonable person could have understood the ad as meant to describe actual facts about Reverend Falwell, and since the ad would not be understood as making actual factual allegations, it could not be “libel” within the traditional legal meaning of that term. The trial judge also dismissed the claim for appropriation of Falwell’s name or likeness, on the grounds that the appropriation was not done for “commercial purposes.” But the jury did return a victory for Falwell under a different legal theory, “intentional infliction of emotional distress,” awarding Falwell $100,000 in compensatory damages and $100,000 in punitive damages.

The case reached the U.S. Supreme Court. In an opinion written by Chief Justice Rehnquist, the Court struck down the jury verdict, holding that the crude parody was expression protected by the First Amendment. Chief Justice Rehnquist began his analysis with an essay on the purposes of the First Amendment. “At the heart of the First Amendment,” he wrote, “is the recognition of the fundamental importance of the free flow of ideas and opinions on matters of public interest and concern.” He then recognized the two principal functions of free speech, the self-fulfillment of the individual speaker, and the broader social search for enlightenment, observing that “the freedom to speak one’s mind is not only an aspect of individual liberty—and thus a good unto itself—but also is essential to the common quest for truth and the vitality of society as a whole.” The Court has been particularly vigilant, he observed, to ensure that ideas remain free from governmentally imposed sanctions, because the “First Amendment recognizes no such thing as a ‘false’ idea.” Chief Justice Rehnquist capped off his introductory remarks by invoking one of the most sacred passages in the First Amendment tradition, the haunting appeal for tolerance by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in his dissent in Abrams v. United States (1919): “When men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by a free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market.”

If the marketplace of ideas was to be robust and wide open, the Supreme Court reasoned, it had to provide space for even the outrageous antics of characters such as Larry Flynt. The Court noted that in America the prevailing ethos is not to encourage people to enter the public arena by guaranteeing them shelter from caustic and virulent attack; it is rather to require as a cost of entering the public arena a certain toughening of the hide. Good but sensitive people may be discouraged in America from stepping forward into public life, but that is part of the price of an open society and a spirited democracy. In this nation, a public figure must be able to take as well as give. Public figures, observed Chief Justice Rehnquist, have a substantial capacity to shape events. One of the prerogatives of American citizenship is the right to criticize public persons and measures. And in this country, such criticism will not always be reasoned and moderate. Quoting from Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy (1971), Chief Justice Rehnquist made a point that seemed aimed personally at Jerry Falwell: “‘The candidate who vaunts his spotless record and sterling integrity cannot convincingly cry ‘Foul!’ when an opponent or an industrious reporter attempts to demonstrate the contrary.’” This seemed a diplomatic way of stating to the Reverend Falwell that moralists must expect attacks on their morality. This does not mean, cautioned Chief Justice Rehnquist, that any speech about a public figure is immune from sanction in the form of damages. Speech that is libelous in the conventional sense—speech that contains genuine misstatements of fact and that injures reputation—may be penalized in some circumstances. But even here, Chief Justice Rehnquist admonished, the Constitution requires that the rules of libel be fashioned to provide sufficient breathing space for free speech. Public figures such as Reverend Falwell could not recover civil damages for defamation absent proof that the material was published with knowledge of its falsity or reckless disregard for the truth. Because Flynt’s attack on Falwell was not “false” in the sense required by the law of libel, it was by definition not published with reckless or knowing falsity.

RODNEY A. SMOLLA

References and Further Reading

Smolla, Rodney. Jerry Falwell v. Larry Flynt: The First Amendment on Trial. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 256 (1971)

HUTCHINSON v. PROXMIRE, 443 U.S. 111 (1979)

In 1975, Senator William Proxmire introduced the “Golden Fleece of the Month Award” for organizations squandering federal funds. Early honors went to agencies sponsoring Ronald Hutchinson, a behavioral scientist studying monkey jaw clenching. Proxmire publicized the “award” in a congressional speech, a press release, and newsletters issued to constituents and people outside his home state. Where Hutchinson sued Proxmire for defaming his professional reputation, the senator argued the Constitution’s speech and debate clause protected the publications as legislative activity and the First Amendment guaranteed his right to criticize public figures.

The U.S. Supreme Court clarified that the Speech and Debate Clause preserved legislative independence, but did not throw a blanket over all activities outside Congress’s walls. Chief Justice Warren Burger ruled that the Constitution shielded Proxmire’s Senate speech, but did not immunize the newsletters and press release because informing the public was not essential to internal legislative and deliberative processes. Furthermore, the district court erred in summarily dismissing Hutchinson’s claims under the First Amendment, holding that he was a public figure who failed to show that the defendants acted with actual malice. “Actual malice” questions, Burger noted, require examining a defendant’s state of mind, which “does not readily lend itself to summary disposition.” Moreover, Hutchinson was not a public figure because his research position wielded little public influence and he only had limited access to mainstream media. Reversing the lower federal court rulings, the Supreme Court circumscribed the speech and debate clause’s protections to congressional members’ essential legislative functions on Capitol Hill.

RODNEY A. SMOLLA

See also Defamation and Free Speech; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Government Speech; Legislators’ Freedom of Speech; Public Officials; Speech of Government Employees

I

IDEOLOGICAL AND SECURITY-BASED EXCLUSION AND DEPORTATION

Antidiscrimination and National Security

Immediately after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, hundreds of noncitizens were detained for immigration violations and minor crimes under the rationale of antiterrorism. The administration was criticized for not providing basic information about the whereabouts and exact number of these detainees and worse for not providing basic due process and practicing racial profiling in its antiterrorism efforts.

Historically, the U.S. government has excluded noncitizens on the basis of their membership in certain organizations deemed to pose a threat to national security. This practice implicates freedom of association and First Amendment rights. The Supreme Court's Brandenburg holding of 1969 held that the government may not "proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action" (Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447, 1969). The immigration statutory scheme enacted after September 11, 2001, provides the federal government with unprecedented powers, of which ideological exclusion, after a period of being out of favor, has been resurrected.

Legal outcomes in terms of who should be excluded or deported are closely affected by the ideological nature of citizenship rights, an area of study that has traditionally fallen within the purview of citizenship theory rather than the law. On the other hand, the law makes the determination of who does or does not belong in the United States through a balancing of interests. These competing interests are on the one hand the civil rights protections for individuals and on the other the interests of society as a whole. But, the law's process of interpreting these interests has historically been subject to the popular ideology within mainstream politics, culture, and society and to the law's peculiar jurisprudential methods of determining what groups are excludable or includable.

In the post-September 11 era, the concern over global terrorism has resulted in the enactment of a statutory regime in the United States that has pushed (some say exceeded) the boundaries of the traditional balance of interests between individual rights and those of society (here national security) to the edge. Critics of this new statutory scheme, in particular the USA PATRIOT Act, Pub.L. 107-56, 115 Stat. 272 (2001), have argued that aspects of it practice racial profiling and are discriminatory by nature. These changes have had far reaching effects on the immigration controls regulated by administrative agencies and the courts. As in the past, this new national security paradigm's approach to exclusion and deportation has implicated American society's views on race and national origins.

In the aftermath of the September 11 terrorist attacks there was a large increase in the reported number of hate crimes perpetrated against Middle Easterners and those misidentified as being such. Is this rise in hate crimes a consequence of the federal government's endorsement and practice of racially profiling Middle Easterners? This essay compares some important historic examples of the convergence between popular attitudes towards outsider groups as un-American and the law's role in creating categorizations of these groups as beyond the protections of the law and thus excludable.

The determination that a particular group should be excluded or deported is the tail end of a longer process in which popular and elite ideological views converge with legal processes to identify that group as a threat. The outcome of this determination is that members of such groups are accorded noncitizen status socially (regardless of their actual immigration status) and are at risk of being determined noncitizens legally. The selection of what persons or groups are excluded from the United States depends upon a matrix of factors that include domestic and international conflicts and pre-existing views on immigration, race, and class.

These ideological perspectives have historically played a large role in the law's treatment of different groups in the United States. Therefore, legal frameworks for exclusion and deportation trigger questions of equality and antidiscrimination principles and law. These practices are controlled through statutory schemes and the federal institutions that interpret and apply the laws to individuals and groups on a daily basis. Historically, these institutions have used exclusion and deportation for mixed purposes of short-term political ends, demographic control, and national security. Each of these political and social objectives is subject to ideological views and biases specific to its historical moment.

David Cole cautions that in times of crisis, such as the current era of the "War on Terrorism," the groups that have suffered most when the law has deemed that certain civil liberties should be curtailed for the benefit of improved national security has been noncitizens, a result he defines as a double standard. In the current era, practices such as racial profiling, which normally would be viewed with much scrutiny, are viewed as necessary evils. Cole argues that such shifts in fact harm society as a whole. What we allow our government to do to noncitizens has consequences on how it treats citizens. For example, the Enemy Alien Act of 1798 remains on the books. This act authorizes the president during wartime to detain, deport, or otherwise restrict the liberties of any citizen over fourteen years of age of a country with which the United States is at war, without any individualized showing of disloyalty, criminal conduct, or even suspicion. The internment of Japanese (two-thirds of whom were citizens) during World War II was an extension of this logic.

Critics have argued that one example of the double standard of treatment is John Walker Lindh, a U.S. citizen of Caucasian descent, coined the "American Taliban," who was taken into custody at Mazar-el Shariff in Afghanistan for fighting on the side of the Taliban against U.S. troops. President Bush opted not to have Lindh tried in a military tribunal—a venue lacking many of the procedural protections of a civilian criminal court. Bush limited military tribunals to noncitizens although there is no such constitutional bar and citizens have been tried in such venues and the Supreme Court has upheld this.

Recent History of Exclusion and Deportation

A broad interpretation of what constitutes "security-based" concerns is necessary to understand the role that race and national origins have played in exclusion and deportation. The important early instances of legal exclusion were based on fears of threat to the domestic labor market by what were deemed inassimilable outsiders. The view that such groups were inassimilable was based on the assumption that the cultural and social practices of these groups, their racial bloodlines, and thus their ability to be a proper part of the American polity posed a threat to American political and cultural sovereignty. Therefore, such groups could not be trusted with full-citizenship status.

The most notorious example of exclusion through the denial of citizenship rights is the U.S. Supreme Court's pre-Civil War case Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S., 393 (1857). Dred Scott is not traditionally categorized under the rubric of national security-based exclusion, but it reveals the close jurisprudential and ideological connection between views on race and citizenship rights that are important factors in cases categorized thusly. Therefore, in order to understand the basis of some of the current critiques of the USA PATRIOT Act as practicing racial profiling, it is necessary to understand cases such as Dred Scott and other cases involving racial prerequisites and immigration restrictions as part of having similar ideological and legal histories.

Dred Scott upheld the property rights of slaveholders, thus denying African Americans citizenship rights. The plaintiff, Dred Scott, was a slave who escaped to a non-slave-holding state. The Taney Court's rationale was that even a "free Negro" whose ancestors were slaves could not be considered a citizen within the meaning of the Constitution and therefore lacked standing to sue. Taney balanced the interests of African Americans in being recognized as citizens rather than chattel against what he viewed as broader social interests in the status quo and the stability it implied, finding for the status quo.

The Chinese Exclusion Case

Although Dred Scott was roundly criticized, even in its time, there are a series of legal statutory and court decisions after it that exercised the balancing principle and found against the interests of outsider groups on the basis of race and national origin. In the mid-nineteenth century, the multiracial environment in California resulted in competition between European ethnic groups and Asians, Mexicans, Native Americans and blacks. In this environment, ideological views of nonwhite groups as outsiders played an important role in the consolidation of power by European ethnic groups around a white identity. By default, this white identity became established as the norm in terms of who was an American citizen.

On the other hand, groups such as Chinese Americans came to be identified as inassimilable outsiders who posed a threat to free white labor and American democratic ideals. What followed were a series of exclusionary laws and related cases that solidified and sanctioned the popular view that Chinese immigrants posed a threat to democratic ideals of free labor. These legal outcomes were driven by labor competition with labor that had already coalesced around white identity; integral to this was a model of what constituted an appropriate American and the Chinese did not satisfy this. Those that did not fall within the paradigm of American identity were inassimilable and thus were more likely to be perceived as national security threats.

In what has since been categorized as the “Chinese Exclusion Case,” a Chinese American plaintiff argued for the right to re-enter this country. This case is the progeny of The Chinese Exclusion Act. Passed by the U.S. Congress in 1882, the treaty suspended immigration of Chinese laborers for ten years and was renewed through 1952. The act allowed for the departure and return of Chinese laborers already in the United States, requiring that they carry certificates of identity. But six years later, Congress passed a statute that prohibited the re-entry of laborers who had left the United States relying upon the current law and possessing the certificates of identity. In 1888, Chinese laborer Chae Chan Ping, who left for a visit to China before the subsequent passage of the act denying re-entry, was denied re-entry to the United States.

Terrorism and Racial Profiling

The internment of Japanese Americans during World War II represents a moment when important civil liberties such as due process and equal rights were set aside for citizens and noncitizens alike, due to concerns over national security. As with today’s War on Terrorism, the concern then was how to balance individual rights vs. those of society. The case of Japanese internment is relevant to the post-September 11 context since it involved the assumption that Japanese Americans as a racial group were potential enemy aliens regardless of citizenship status. Critics have charged that the detention of noncitizens of Middle Eastern background parallels the internment of Japanese Americans during the Second World War.

Through a similar process in which mainstream ideological views and the law interacted to construct an identity of Asian Americans as inassimilable outsiders who posed a national security threat, people of Middle Eastern descent in the post-September 11 era have become reconstructed as “terrorists.” Leti Volpp describes a process in which, after September 11, 2001, ideology, law, and politics converged with the resulting consolidation of a new identity category grouping together persons who appear “Middle Eastern, Arab, or Muslim.” This consolidation reflects a racialization in which members of this group are identified as terrorists and are thus not identified as citizens regardless of their official citizenship status.

The USA PATRIOT Act’s provisions have allowed indefinite detention of noncitizens, thus providing the attorney general unprecedented power to detain aliens without a hearing and without a showing that they pose a threat to national security or are a flight risk. Given that the Immigration and Naturalization Act (INA) now broadly construes membership in designated “terrorist organizations” and lawful activity in support of such organizations as illegal, the attorney general may indefinitely detain such persons.

The broad INA definitions would result today in the designation of noncitizen supporters of the African National Congress (South African President Nelson Mandela’s organization) as deportable had they been in effect in the 1980s. In addition, the USA PATRIOT Act now allows for the ideological exclusion on grounds of pure speech. It bars noncitizens from admissions under a broad definition in which noncitizens “endorse or espouse terrorist activity” or “persuade others to support terrorist activity or a terrorist organization” when the secretary of state feels that it undermines the U.S. combat of terrorism.

In Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580 (1952), the Supreme Court upheld the Alien Registration Act of 1940, which allowed for the deportation of aliens who had been members of a subversive group before entering the United States, regardless of when or for how long they were members (Alien Registration Act of 1940, Ch. 439, § 23(b), 54 Stat. 673). The rationale for this decision is based on Congress's plenary power to admit and exclude aliens as held in Chae Chan Ping v. United States, 130 U.S. 581 (1889) and Fong Yue Ting v. U.S. (1893).

Thus, in the immigration arena, the Court has shown great deference to Congress. This approach has created a long-standing conflict over the issue of whether noncitizens have the same constitutional protections as citizens. In Harsiades, dissenting Justice Douglas critiqued the notion that Fong Yue Ting stood for Congress's absolute power to deport aliens, writing that it was "inconsistent with the philosophy of constitutional law which we have developed for the protection of resident aliens. We have long held that a resident alien is a person within the meaning of the Fifth and the Fourteenth Amendments" and has similar rights as a citizen.

Conclusion

Historically, statutes and court holdings have come out on the side against noncitizen outsider groups in their assessment of the relative rights of individuals vs. the whole. What history tells us is that when we limit the rights of individuals for their membership in outsider groups, we also run the danger of limiting the basic rights of individuals in society at large. The previous examples of the process in which blacks are construed as noncitizen property, Chinese are as inassimilable national security threats, and Middle Easterners as terrorists illustrate the role that race and national origin have played in legal outcomes. The balancing of individual rights vs. those of society at large must be exercised with a calculation for the role that discrimination plays in ideology and its effect on perceptions of who is American or not American, who will be loyal or disloyal, and, finally, who belongs or does not belong in this country.

Soon after September 11, Ariel Dorfman wrote that the photographs of those missing in the World Trade Center reminded him of the photographs of the desparecidos (the "disappeared") of Chile. Volpp asks what it might mean to expand "who occupies the category of our disappeared, from those killed in the World Trade Center, to consider also those noncitizens in detention? Our government has taken them, and we do not know where they are," and finally "[w]ho is the 'us' in the U.S.?"

MICHAEL CHANG

References and Further Reading

- Almaguer, Tomas. Racial Faultlines: the Historical Origins of White Supremacy in California. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994.
- Bosniak, Linda, Universal Citizenship and the Problem of Alienage, Northwestern University Law Review 94 (Spring 2000): 963–1982.
- Cole, David, Enemy Aliens, Stanford Law Review 54 (May 2002): 953, 970.
- Gross, Ariela, Litigating Whiteness: Trials of Racial Determination in the Nineteenth-Century South, Yale Law Journal 108 (1998): 109–180.
- Haney Lopez, Ian. White by Law: the Legal Construction of Race. New York: New York University Press, 1996.
- McClain, Charles, The Chinese Struggle for Civil Rights in Nineteenth Century America: The First Phase: 1850–1870, California Law Review 72 (1984): 529.
- Omi, Michael, and Howard Winant. Racial Formation in the United States: from the 1960s to the 1990s. New York: Routledge, 1994.
- Takaki, Ronald. Strangers from a Different Shore: a History of Asian Americans. New York: Penguin Books, 1989.
- Volpp, Leti, Critical Race Studies: The Citizen and the Terrorist, UCLA Law Review 49 (June 2002): 1575 at Fn.1.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969)
- Chae Chan Ping v. United States*, 130 U.S. 581 (1889)
- Harsiades v. Shaughnessy*, 342 U.S. 580 (1952)
- Scott v. Sandford*, 60 U.S., 393 (1857)
- Alien Registration Act of 1940*, Ch. 439, § 23(b), 54 Stat. 673
- The Chinese Exclusion Act*, May 6, 1882, Ch. 126, 22 Stat. 58
- USA PATRIOT Act*, Pub.L. 107-56, 115 Stat. 272 (2001)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Citizenship; Due Process in Immigration; Noncitizens and Civil Liberties

ILLEGITIMACY AND IMMIGRATION

Modern constitutional law provides substantial protection to children whose parents are not married; however, immigration law still recognizes distinctions between children who are and who are not "born out of wedlock." Thus, while the Supreme Court has subjected state laws that discriminate against non-marital children to heightened scrutiny under the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause, it has largely deferred to Congress's plenary power over immigration, upholding such distinctions to the extent that they purportedly reflect the legislature's reasonable policy choices. For example, fathers of marital children are not required to establish that they have a bona fide relationship with their children, a requirement fathers of nonmarital children must fulfill. Immigration law also recognizes gender distinctions between fathers and mothers of nonmarital children. Mothers of nonmarital children, unlike fathers, need not establish a bona fide relationship with their children: that they were present at the birth suffices.

While arguably serving the purpose of preventing the filing of fraudulent immigration petitions, laws that burden nonmarital children have been criticized not only for codifying stereotypical distinctions deemed unconstitutional when enacted by state and local legislatures, but also for perpetuating the commodification of children who depend on their parents for immigration benefits. Critics applaud efforts to give a more meaningful voice to children's perspectives in developing a fair and equitable immigration policy. But there has been some progress. In 1995, Congress amended the immigration code, replacing the terms "legitimate" and "illegitimate" with "child born in wedlock" and "child born out of wedlock," respectively.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies, 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Law and Business, 2002.

Fragomen, Austin T., and Steven C. Bell. Immigration Fundamentals: A Guide to Law and Practice, Fourth Edition. New York: Practice Law Institute, 2004.

Krause, Harry D., Equal Protection for the Illegitimate, Michigan Law Review 65 (1967): 477–505.

Thronson, David B., Kids Will Be Kids? Reconsidering Conceptions of Children's Rights Underlying Immigration Law, Ohio State Law Journal 63 (2002): 979–1016.

See also Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787 (1977); Sex and Immigration

ILLINOIS V. GATES, 462 U.S. 213 (1983)

How should courts measure whether information based on an informer's tip establishes "probable cause" to arrest or search?

Illinois police received an anonymous letter saying that Lance and Sue Gates were big-time drug dealers; that on May 3 Sue would drive down to Florida to pick up drugs and load them into the family car; and a that few days later Lance would fly down and drive the car back. When their surveillance confirmed the Gates' unusual travel arrangements, the officers took this information to a judge, who issued a search warrant; when the officers searched the Gates' car, they found a sizable amount of drugs.

According to prior Supreme Court decisions, probable cause could be based on an informant's tip only if the officer offered specific evidence showing that the informant was a truthful person and that he acquired his information in a reliable way. Because the tipster in Gates was anonymous and his letter did not say how he had obtained his information, the Gates' argument was that there had been no probable cause for the warrant.

The Supreme Court overruled its earlier cases, concluding that whether probable cause existed should be assessed by the "totality of the circumstances," and that under the "totality" test, the warrant was valid. The Court stressed that because the tipster accurately predicted the Gates' unusual travel arrangements, it was likely that the tipster had obtained his information in a reliable way, and because those arrangements were somewhat suspicious anyway, a judge could reasonably conclude that it was sufficiently probable that the tipster was also right in predicting there would be drugs in the car.

CLIFFORD S. FISHMAN

References and Further Reading

Cook, Joseph C. Constitutional Rights of the Accused, 3rd ed. 1996 and 2005 supplement, sections 4:23 and 4:36.

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: a Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2004, sections 3.2, 3.3(a), 3.3(b).

See also Probable Cause; Search (General Definition)

ILLINOIS V. KRULL, 480 U.S. 340 (1987)

The U.S. Supreme Court adopted the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), to deter unreasonable searches and seizures. The "good faith" exception to the exclusionary rule, which was created by the U.S. Supreme Court in U.S. v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984), allows evidence seized by the police executing a facially valid search warrant issued by a judge to be admitted in court even though the search warrant was later found to be invalid.

In Illinois v. Krull, 480 U.S. 340 (1987), the high court extended the "good faith" exception to cover searches conducted in good-faith reliance upon a state statute that was later determined to be invalid. An Illinois state statute permitted the police to examine the license and records of those who sold motor vehicles and vehicular parts without probable cause or a search warrant. A Chicago Police Department detective arrived at an automobile wrecking yard operated by Krull and, pursuant to the state statute, examined the vehicles in the yard. The search of the vehicles turned up three that had been stolen.

After his arrest for possession of stolen motor vehicles, Krull filed a motion to suppress the evidence obtained during the search of the vehicles, arguing that the police officer's reliance on the state statute authorizing a warrantless search was unreasonable and in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The state trial court granted the motion to suppress, stating that the warrantless search permitted by the state statute gave police unrestricted discretion and therefore was unconstitutional. The Illinois Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's decision and held that the exclusionary rule was not applicable to the evidence seized during the warrantless search permitted by the state statute.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the Illinois Supreme Court and applied the "good faith" exception to those situations in which the police rely upon a state statute authorizing a warrantless search, even though the statute is subsequently held unconstitutional. The Court felt that applying the exclusionary rule in such cases would not deter police misconduct and thus exclusion of the evidence would serve no legitimate purpose.

JENNIFER J. ASHLEY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)

U.S. v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984)

See also Exclusionary Rule

ILLINOIS V. PERKINS, 496 U.S. 292 (1990)

The Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination prohibits the government's use at trial of a suspect's statements given during custodial interrogation, unless the warnings set forth in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), were given. These warnings are intended to dispel coercion inherent in a police-dominated atmosphere. In Illinois v. Perkins, the Supreme Court held that the use of an undercover officer for interrogation did not implicate concerns about coercion.

While incarcerated on unrelated matters, Perkins told Charlton, a fellow inmate, about a murder he had committed. After learning of this conversation, the police placed an undercover officer and Charlton in the cellblock with Perkins. The undercover officer, under the guise of discussing a possible jail escape, elicited information from Perkins about the murder. Perkins was then charged with the murder, but the trial court prohibited the government from using his cellblock statements.

Given that compulsion is determined from the suspect's point of view, the Supreme Court reversed, finding that concerns regarding police coercion and self-incrimination were not present when a suspect speaks voluntarily to someone whom he believes is a fellow inmate. The Court distinguished other custodial interrogation cases. Those suspects knew they were speaking to government agents and might have felt coerced as a result. Because Perkins had not been charged with the murder, the Court also noted that he was not protected by the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

The Perkins decision is significant because the Court distinguished police coercion, which is always unconstitutional, from police deception, which may or may not rise to the level of coercion.

MARGARET M. LAWTON

References and Further Reading

Glennon, Charles E., and Tayebe Shah-Mirani, Illinois v. Perkins: Approving the Use of Police Trickery in Prison to Circumvent Miranda, Loyola University of Chicago Law Journal 21 (1990): 811-830.

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure: Criminal Practice Series, vol. 2. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999, chapter 6, sec. 10(b).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Coerced Confessions; Jailhouse Informants; Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964); Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 (1968); Miranda Warning; Orozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324 (1969); Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291 (1980); Rights of the Accused

ILLINOIS V. WARDLOW, 528 U.S. 119 (2000)

Wardlow was standing in an area of Chicago known for drug dealing. As four police vehicles approached the area he fled, but was stopped by a police officer. During a protective pat-down search of Wardlow for weapons, the officer discovered a handgun and arrested him. Wardlow's lawyer moved to suppress the weapon from evidence, arguing that the stop and search violated the Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures.

In Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), the Supreme Court held that a police officer may stop and briefly detain a person if the officer had reasonable suspicion to believe that he was engaging or about to engage in criminal activity. During the stop the officer is permitted to conduct a protective pat-down search for weapons. The Court required that the reasonable suspicion must be based on the existence of articulable facts and the inferences the officer could draw from them based on his experience.

The precise issue in Wardlow's case was whether standing in a drug trafficking area and then fleeing when the police vehicles approached supported a finding of reasonable suspicion. In upholding the constitutionality of the stop the Court concluded that 1) while standing in such an area does not, by itself, support a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, the characteristics of the location were suspicious enough to warrant further investigation; and 2) based on reasonable inferences about human behavior, fleeing from such a location suggested wrongdoing. Together these supported a finding of reasonable suspicion.

STEVEN B. DOW

References and Further Reading

- Goldman, Stanley A., To Flee or Not to Flee—That Is the Question: Flight as Furtive Gesture, Idaho Law Review 37 (2001): 557–582.
- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure, 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2004.
- Nelson, Debra Meek, Illinois v. Wardlow: A Single Factor Totality, Utah Law Review (2001): 509–541.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Terry v. Ohio*, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
- U.S. Constitution, Amendment IV

See also Search (General Definition); Seizures; Stop and Frisk

IMMIGRATION AND MARRIAGE FRAUD AMENDMENTS OF 1986

The perception that immigrants marry U.S. citizens to obtain immigration benefits is longstanding and has been popularized in movies, books, and magazines. In 1986, Congress responded to this perception by enacting restrictions to deter sham marriages. Under the Immigration and Marriage Fraud Amendments (IMFA), spousal sponsorship—a centerpiece of family-based immigration policy—became a two-step process for some applicants. Because Congress believed that sham marriages were unlikely to endure for two years, all persons who obtain permanent resident status based on a marriage that is less than two years old are deemed “conditional” permanent residents. At the end of two years, both spouses must petition the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to have the conditional status removed.

DHS then investigates the validity of the marriage. If it finds that the marriage is valid, it removes the conditional status and grants full permanent resident status to the applicant. If it finds that the marriage is fraudulent, legal status is terminated and the applicant is deportable. The petitioning process may compromise applicants' privacy and personal dignity, since applicants must often present items to demonstrate the validity of their marriages, from wedding announcements to evidence of shared expenses. Commentators have also criticized the underlying concept of sponsorship, arguing that it is based on an antiquated patriarchal model of marriage.

When IMFA was enacted, Congress did not anticipate its impact on abused spouses. Domestic violence victims with conditional status may be deterred from reporting abuse for fear that their spouse will refuse to participate in the joint petition to DHS. Subsequent amendments to IMFA have created special procedures for battered spouses and children.

MARTHA F. DAVIS

References and Further Reading

- Aleinikoff, Thomas Alexander, David Martin, and Hiroshi Motomura. Immigration and Citizenship: Process and Policy, 5th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2003, 308–322.
- Anderson, Michelle J., A License to Abuse: The Impact of Conditional Status on Female Immigrants, Yale Law Journal 102 (April 1993): 1401–1430.
- Calvo, Janet, A Decade of Spouse-Based Immigration: Coverture's Diminishment but not Its Demise, Northern Illinois University Law Review 24 (Spring 2004) 153–204.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Immigration and Marriage Fraud Amendments of 1986*, Pub. L. 99-639, 100 Stat. 3537

See also Due Process in Immigration; Noncitizens and Civil Liberties; Sex and Immigration

IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1965

The Immigration and Nationality Act Amendments of 1965 are considered by many as legislation that dramatically changed the method by which immigrants are admitted into the United States. The U.S.

immigration laws of which this amendment is a part and the Immigration and Nationality Service that executes its authority are gatekeepers for the nation's borders and ports of entry. More generally, INS laws determine who may enter the United States, how long they may stay (if at all), and when they must leave. It also determines whether a person is an alien and his or her associated legal rights, duties, and obligations in the United States. Lastly, it provides the means by which certain categories of aliens can become naturalized with full legal rights as natural born citizens of the United States.

The Act and Purpose

The purpose of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) Amendments of 1965 was to amend the 1952 Immigration and Nationality Act by eliminating the "quota and national origin" provisions perpetuated from previous INA laws such as the Quota Act of 1921, the Immigration Act of 1924, the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, and the 1790 Naturalization Law. Thirteen years earlier, the 1952 act did just the opposite. It brought together the quota and national origin practices of the early 1920s that governed immigration into the United States. Thus, the 1965 amendments represented an important revision of early U.S. immigration policy that limited immigration from non-European countries to nothing but negligible levels. In repealing these restrictions, the 1965 act eliminated race and ancestry as the primary bases for U.S. immigration policy.

Significance of the Act

The significance of the 1965 INA amendments lies in the fact that they made future immigrants to the United States aware that would be welcomed for criteria such as family, occupational skills, or professions, rather than for their race, ancestry, or countries of origin. They also eliminated the national origins quota system, but established a seven-category preference system under which immigrants would be admitted. A related significance of the 1965 INA is that it was enacted in the shadows of the ongoing civil rights legislation of the early 1960s. Perhaps because of this, it represented the most far-reaching revisions of U.S. immigration policy of its time.

As expected, the change in policy and, ultimately, law shifted the source of the immigration flow away from Europe towards the overpopulated developing countries. In so doing, it proposed a new principle of numerical restriction with an annual ceiling for which immigrant visas would be issued on a first-come, first-served basis. The new setup established a seven-preference system giving priority first and foremost to family reunification. It also provided for annual ceiling limits of Western Hemisphere immigration at 120 thousand without country limits on immigrants. The new preference system gave priority to: (1) immigrants with relatives residing in the United States, (2) immigrants with occupational skills or training needed in the United States, and (3) refugees.

Historical and Political Context

The circumstances that led to the shift in immigration policy were a complex change in public perceptions and values directing politics and legislative compromise on the issue of immigration policy of 1960. Thus, the near consensus by the legislative and executive branch on the issues of immigration as exhibited in the smooth passage of the 1965 act is noteworthy. The House of Representatives passed the legislation by a vote of 326 to 69; the Senate version was passed by a vote of 76 to 18 before President Lyndon Johnson signed it into law on October 3, 1965.

Undoubtedly aided by the intense civil rights movement climate of that period, abolishing the strict quotas on Asian immigration imposed since the 1882 Chinese Exclusion Act, the 1965 amendment was, indeed, a catalyst for rejuvenating the Asian American community after 1965. Arguably in this context, the 1965 act was a by-product of the "rights revolution" movement of the 1960s tied to congressional politics of the Eighty-Ninth Congress, which produced other notable civil and voting rights legislation in 1964 and 1965. However, U.S. immigration history has always been a cobweb of legal and political jigsaw that, on close examination, reveals more than expected. Thus, given the patchwork of U.S. immigration politics, the 1965 act cannot be understood in isolation without the benefit of other previous acts in the 1920s and 1950s and their respective histories. The same holds true for all other INA amendments passed since 1965.

Conclusion

Summarily passed at the height of the civil rights movements of the 1960s, the INA amendments of 1965 eliminated country-specific quotas and ended discrimination. In doing so, they not only expanded the numerical limits but also opened immigration to the United States to people from parts of the world that previously were denied entry. It also increased the Eastern Hemispheric annual quotas, per country limits, and for the first time created an annual cap for the Western Hemisphere countries. However, special preference rules that made immediate family members exempt from numerical quotas caused the ceiling established under the act to be shattered. Also, the European economic prosperity of the mid-1960s caused European immigration to the United States to drop to less than 20 percent, which consequently propelled Latin America and Asia to become the leading source of U.S. immigration.

To be sure, the 1965 act represented a significant watershed in U.S. immigration history and particularly in its explicit reversal of decades of systematically exclusive and restrictive immigration policies that denied non-European immigrants from Asia, Mexico, Latin America, and other non-Western countries entry into the United States. The act recognized that discrimination could no longer be tolerated; it abolished the quota system and went a step further to include general prohibition against discrimination. For example, Section 202(a) of the INA states that “no person shall receive any preference or priority or be discriminated against in the issuance of an immigrant visa because of his race, sex, nationality, place of birth, or place of residence.” Explicit from this section is a clear prohibition “except as specifically provided” in other sections of the act that provide for strict per-country limits. Undeniably, the language of the act is clear as to intent and purpose of U.S. immigration policy; granting or denying immigrant visas to aliens on the basis of their national origin is prohibited.

MARC GEORGES PUFONG

References and Further Reading

- Chin, Gabriel J., The Civil Rights Revolution Comes to Immigration Law: A New Look at the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, North Carolina Law Review 75 (1996): 274.
- Graham, Otis L., Jr. “Tracing Liberal Woes to ‘65 Immigration Act.” Christian Science Monitor, 88 (1995): 23:19–23.
- Hart–Cellar Act. Immigration and Nationality Act Amendments, October 3, 1965, (79 Statutes-at-large 911).
- Kennedy, John F. Published Papers, 1964, pp. 594–597.
- Kutler, Stanley. “Immigration Act of 1965.” In Dictionary of American History, 3rd ed., vol. 4. New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 2003, p. 230.
- Le, C. N. “The New Wave of Asian Immigration.” In Asian-Nation: The Landscape of Asian America. <<http://www.asian-nation.org/new-immigration.shtml>>September 2, 2005.

McCarran–Walter Immigration and Nationality Act, Immigration and Nationality Act of June 27, 1952 (INA), 66 Statutes at Large 66 (1952): 163.

Shih, Susan, Immigration Act of 1965, Purdue University; <<http://web.ics.purdue.edu/~willough/immgact.htm>>.

U.S. Congress, Senate Committee on the Judiciary. The Immigration and Naturalization Systems of the United States. S. Representatives 1515, 81st Cong., 2d Session. Washington, GPO, 1950.

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Citizenship; Race in Immigration; Sex in Immigration

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. CHADHA, 462 U.S. 919 (1983)

Jagdish Chadha, then a British citizen of East Indian descent, was lawfully admitted to the United States in 1966 on a nonimmigrant student visa. After it expired, the Immigration and Naturalization Service proceeded to deport Chadha who, although conceding his deportability, applied to the immigration judge for a suspension of deportation. Pursuant to the authority delegated to him by the attorney general, the immigration judge granted Chadha’s application, which allowed him to remain in the United States. The immigration judge then reported this action to Congress, and the House of Representatives decided to nullify the judge’s ruling pursuant to a statutorily granted one-House legislative veto. Chadha challenged this veto power in federal court, arguing its unconstitutionality.

The Supreme Court agreed, holding that vesting veto power in a single chamber of Congress violated the doctrine of separation of powers by giving the House legislative powers that the Constitution expressly assigns to both the Senate and the House, subject to presentment to the president or, in case of the president’s veto, congressional override. From an immigrant rights perspective, the Chadha Court’s decision to favor the noncitizen’s rights over Congress’s plenary power over immigration is extraordinary and unusual, for rarely has the Court curtailed Congress’s immigration authority, let alone on constitutional grounds. More likely, Chadha expresses the Court’s concern over the Constitution’s allocation of legislative power and how Congress’s creation of a unicameral legislative veto exceeded the permissible scope of its otherwise plenary power over immigration.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

- Craig, Barbara H. Chadha—The Story of an Epic Constitutional Struggle. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

Legomsky, Stephen H., Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, The Supreme Court Review (1985): 255–307.

Strauss, Peter L., Was There a Baby in the Bathwater? A Comment on the Supreme Court's Legislative Veto Decision, Duke Law Journal (1983): 789–819.

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Due Process in Immigration

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE V. LOPEZ–MENDOZA, 468 U.S. 1032 (1984)

In this case, the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment's exclusionary rule did not apply to deportation hearings. The case was brought by two aliens arrested at their place of employment by Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) agents without a warrant or probable cause. While in the custody of the INS, both men admitted they had entered the United States illegally. The INS moved to deport the two men, and they challenged the order of deportation on the grounds that the evidence used to deport them—their statements that they were in the United States illegally—had been obtained in violation of their Fourth Amendment rights. Thus, the men argued, the exclusionary rule, the principle that fruit of an illegal arrest must be excluded from evidence, required that their statements be suppressed in the deportation hearing.

The Court reasoned, however, that deportation hearings are civil proceedings to decide whether an alien is allowed to remain in the United States, not to punish him or her for unlawfully entry. The Court applied a balancing test to determine whether the exclusionary rule was an appropriate remedy for Fourth Amendment violations in the context of deportation. The Court decided that the social benefits of excluding unlawfully seized evidence to deter future unlawful police conduct were outweighed by the costs that applying the exclusionary rule in deportation hearings would cause by allowing aliens to continue to reside in the United States, even though they had entered illegally. The Court left open the possibility that the exclusionary rule might be appropriate in cases involving egregious violations of the Fourth Amendment.

The case is consistent with prior Supreme Court cases that have refused to give aliens any constitutional protection in deportation or removal hearings, other than minimal procedural due-process protections.

M. ISABEL MEDINA

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889); Criminal Law/Civil Liberties and Noncitizens in the U.S.; Due Process in Immigration; Exclusionary Rule; Fruit of the Poisonous Tree; Noncitizens and Civil Liberties; Seizures, Undocumented Migrants; Warrantless Searches

IMPARTIAL DECISIONMAKER

When a governmental body adjudicates the rights and interests of individuals, it is often said that the decisionmaker—the person who finds the facts and applies the law—should be impartial. This means that he or she should be insulated from improper considerations, which may include personal financial interests, fealty to the executive branch, or sympathy for one class of litigants (for example, the ones in a particular locality or party) over another. Some commentators consider the impartial decisionmaker to be the sine qua non of the rule of law and due process; others have argued that impartiality has drawbacks: it necessitates a system of adversary justice that may be slow, expensive, and under many circumstances infeasible.

The ideal of impartiality has come closest to realization in the courts, though not in the smoothest way. English common law traditionally invalidated a decision in which the judge had a personal financial stake, following Coke's maxim in Bonham's Case that a person cannot be a judge in his own cause. At the same time, however, English judges collected fees from litigants, which arguably gave them an incentive to attract plaintiffs to their courts. Furthermore, they were at the mercy of the Crown, which could remove them at will, until Parliament granted them life tenure in 1701. Even after that, the Crown's control over appointments and judicial pensions made for a government-minded judiciary. In the North American colonies, this arrangement was even more pronounced: judges depended significantly on fees, and they served at the pleasure of the crown and its agents; colonists viewed a judge as just another political official.

Shortly after the American Revolution, however, the new states began allowing judges to sit for life. (They also started abolishing fees, at least in the more important courts; in this respect, they were ahead of England, which did not do so until 1826.) The U.S. Constitution of 1787 guaranteed federal judges irreducible salary (not fees) and life tenure. In The Federalist, Alexander Hamilton explained that such tenure was essential to impartiality, which was, in turn, essential to the federal courts' mission to adjudicate interstate disputes in a vast and diverse country.

Though federal judges remained insulated as Hamilton wished, state governments, swept up in the Jacksonian movement to expand democracy, provided for popular election of many judicial offices ca. 1830–1860. Advocates of this reform insisted that the electorate was sufficiently wise to choose impartial judges, but many judgeships became associated with party machines. While various restrictions later lessened partisan influence, very few states today have fully life-tenured judiciaries.

Meanwhile, the fee systems that had been abolished in the federal and upper state judiciaries continued to flourish in minor criminal courts and small-claims courts well into the twentieth century. In many states in the 1920s, judges in minor criminal courts (enforcing Prohibition) could collect a fee from the defendant if they convicted, but got nothing if they acquitted. Until that time, the U.S. Supreme Court had dealt little with judicial impartiality as a constitutional matter (likely because the Constitution's institutional safeguards prevented the issue from arising among federal judges).

However, now that the Court had grown comfortable applying federal due process to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, it struck down the criminal-court fee systems in Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927). The Court reached the same result in Ward v. Monroeville, 409 U.S. 57 (1972), in which fines were a major source of revenue to a locality of which the judge was also the mayor. Federal due process developed more slowly in the civil context than it had in the criminal one: the dependence of small-claims judges on fees from plaintiffs, though abolished in many cities during the Progressive Era (for example, Chicago in 1905), continued in Mississippi until the U.S. Court of Appeals struck it down in Brown v. Vance, 637 U.S. 272 (5th Cir. 1981).

Of course, courts do not handle all (or even most) adjudications of individual rights and interests. Given limited resources, it is often necessary for executive officers to decide facts and law without resort to a court. The potential for bias in favor of the state is, by definition, ever present. For the nineteenth century, we do not know a great deal about how the law treated this kind of executive adjudication. In part, this is because courts often chose to stay out of it. They viewed it as their job to protect “rights,” not “privileges” such as public benefits and government jobs. Also, claims by the state against citizens were “public rights” traditionally beyond the judicial sphere, while claims by citizens against the state were originally a legislative matter. Also, at least up to the 1870s, judges generally respected the prerogatives of localities, which accounted for much of the regulation during that era (for example, fire safety, public health, and town marketplaces).

Even when judges did get involved, the great variety of executive action meant that their inquiries had to be context specific. Ruling that a county commissioner could sit on a board deciding the location of a road that might pass through his town, Chief Justice Lemuel Shaw of Massachusetts explained in Inhabitants of Wilbraham v. Hampden County Commissioners, 11 Pick. 322 (Mass. 1831), that the principle of impartiality had to be applied in light of expediency and the wishes of the legislature.

As the nineteenth century turned into the twentieth, executive adjudication grew and changed as the nation industrialized and as new political majorities demanded that the government alter economic outcomes in more systematic ways than it ever had before. By the New Deal of the 1930s, agencies were making decisions on numerous subjects formerly dominated by private law. The concern that these agencies fused prosecutor and judge roles was primarily resolved in Congress rather than in court.

Passed in 1946, the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) created a new corps of “hearing examiners,” later renamed administrative law judges (ALJs). The statute provided that for all programs designated by Congress (which ultimately included much of federal regulation, such as securities and labor), each adjudication would occur before an ALJ. Though employed by their respective agencies, the ALJs, to this day, have no responsibilities besides adjudication; never communicate with investigative or prosecutorial personnel ex parte; and cannot be fired unless the agency convinces an outside board that there is good cause to do so.

One key exception to the ALJ scheme is that the agency's top political appointees can take over any adjudication they wish, deciding facts and law themselves. Though such action is not always practical for the general run of cases, it ensures the political appointees' policymaking role. Due process requires only that political appointees not prejudge the specific facts of the case. In FTC v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683 (1948), the federal trade commissioners ordered certain businesses to stop using a certain pricing system. Prior to the case, the commissioners had publicly declared that the type of pricing system at issue was unlawful, but they had not made specific statements about the acts of the businesses involved in the case. The Supreme Court found no improper bias. By contrast, in Cinderella Career and Finishing Schools v. FTC, 425 F.2d 583 (D.C. Cir. 1970), the U.S. Court of Appeals found that the agency's chairman acted improperly when he declared publicly, while a case was pending, that conduct highly specific to the parties was unlawful.

There is also a large residual category of adjudications over which neither a political appointee nor an ALJ presides. In fact, this residual category covers the majority of federal adjudications (the most numerous being immigration hearings). Such matters are decided by officers who lack ALJ protections. In this context, often the sole safeguard for impartiality is constitutional due process, the demands of which are less than those of the APA. For example, in Marcello v. Bonds, 349 U.S. 302 (1955), the Supreme Court upheld a deportation even though, as the dissent put it, “the hearing officer adjudicated the very case ... which the hearing officer’s superiors initiated and prosecuted.”

Granted, due process gives protection in some instances. The Supreme Court ruled in Morissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972), that parole revocation must be decided by an official without direct prior involvement in the parolee’s case (which bars the arresting officer). But the fusion of the adjudicator with the investigator was upheld for prison discipline in Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974) and for medical licensing boards in Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35 (1975). Rejecting the argument that the adjudicator should always be separate from the investigator, Withrow declared that the “incredible variety of administrative mechanisms in this country will not yield to any single organizing principle.”

Ward’s prohibition on indirect financial interests was extended to the administrative process in Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564 (1973), in which the Supreme Court found that it violated due process for a board composed of independent optometrists to find that their corporate competitors were engaged in unlawful practice. However, the Court upheld an indirect linkage between an agency’s decisions and its income in Marshall v. Jerico, 446 U.S. 238 (1980).

After the attacks of September 11, 2001, the executive branch asserted the power to detain indefinitely, as “enemy combatants,” persons it believed to be members of Al Qaeda and associated forces. In Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004), a U.S. citizen detained in this way argued that the facts did not show that he was an enemy combatant. The Supreme Court held that due process entitled him to “a fair opportunity to rebut the Government’s factual assertions before a neutral decisionmaker.”

In response, the Defense Department established combatant status review tribunals (CSRTs), each of which was to consist of one judge-advocate and two other military officers, none of whom had previously dealt with the detainee whose status they were to decide. Within months, the CSRTs exonerated 38 detainees and classified 520 others as enemy combatants. (See Associated Press v. U.S. Department of Defense, 2005 WESTLAW 2065171 at *1 [S.D.N.Y.].) As of September 2005, several members of the latter group were challenging the constitutionality of the CSRTs in federal court.

NICHOLAS PARRILLO

References and Further Reading

- Asimow, Michael, The Administrative Judiciary: ALJs in Historical Perspective, Journal of the National Association of Administrative Law Judges 20 (2000): 157–165.
- Bator, Paul M., The Constitution as Architecture: Legislative and Administrative Courts Under Article III, Indiana Law Journal 65 (1989): 233–275.
- Croley, Stephen P., The Majoritarian Difficulty: Elective Judiciaries and the Rule of Law, University of Chicago Law Review 62 (1995): 689–794.
- Frye, John H., III., A Survey of Non-ALJ Hearing Programs in the Federal Government, Administrative Law Review 44 (1992): 261–353.
- Holdsworth, Sir William. A History of English Law, 6th ed., vol. 1. 1938.
- Lemmings, David. “The Independence of the Judiciary in Eighteenth-Century England.” In The Life of the Law. P. Birks, ed. 1993, 125–149.
- Novak, William J. The People’s Welfare: Law and Regulation in Nineteenth-Century America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Orth, John V. Due Process of Law: A Brief History. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 2003.
- Pierce, Richard J., Jr., Political Control Versus Impermissible Bias in Agency Decisionmaking: Lessons from Chevron and Mistretta, University of Chicago Law Review 57 (1990): 481–519.
- . Administrative Law Treatise, 4th ed. New York: Aspen Publishers, 2002, sections 9.8–9.10 (with 2005 supplement).
- Redish, Martin H., and Lawrence C. Marshall, Adjudicatory Independence and the Values of Procedural Due Process, Yale Law Journal 95 (1986): 455–505.
- Rotunda, Ronald E., and John E. Nowak. Treatise on Constitutional Law: Substance and Procedure, 3rd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 1999, sections 17.8–17.9 (with 2005 pocket part).
- Shepherd, George B., Fierce Compromise: The Administrative Procedure Act Emerges from New Deal Politics, Northwestern University Law Review 90 (1996): 1557–1683.
- Willrich, Michael. City of Courts: Socializing Justice in Progressive Era Chicago. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Wolfowitz, Paul. “Order Establishing Combatant Status Review Tribunal.” July 7, 2004.
- Wood, Gordon S. The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1969.
- Zywicki, Todd J., The Rise and Fall of Efficiency in the Common Law: A Supply-Side Analysis, Northwestern University Law Review 97 (2003): 1551–1633.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bonham's Case, 8 Co. Rep. 107a, 118a; 77 Eng. Rep. 638 (1610)
Brown v. Vance, 637 U.S. 272 (5th Cir. 1981)
Cinderella Career and Finishing Schools v. FTC, 425 F.2d 583 (D.C. Cir. 1970)
FTC v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683 (1948)
Gibson v. Berryhill, 411 U.S. 564 (1973)
Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)
Inhabitants of Wilbraham v. Hampden County Comm'rs, 11 Pick. 322 (Mass. 1831)
Marcello v. Bonds, 349 U.S. 302 (1955)
Marshall v. Jerrico, 446 U.S. 238 (1980)
Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972)
Turney v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927)
Ward v. Monroeville, 409 U.S. 57 (1972)
Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35 (1975)
Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974)
Administrative Procedure Act (APA), 60 Stat. 237; 5 U.S.C. 551-559, 701-706, 1305, 3105, 3344, 5372, 7521

See also Due Process

IMPLIED RIGHTS

Implied rights are those that are not explicitly mentioned in the U.S. Constitution, but have been recognized by the Supreme Court. At least since the 1928 case of Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), some justices on the Court sought to recognize rights that could reasonably be implied from rights specifically listed in the first eight amendments of the Constitution. For example, the First Amendment guarantees that Congress will not make laws that prohibit “the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.” How can people organize to assemble or petition for redress of grievances if they are not also assured of the right to associate? The two rights that are listed imply that a freedom of association also exists. This logic has been extended, not without controversy, to a number of other “rights” that are not enumerated in the Bill of Rights.

States retained the “police powers” or the power to regulate for the health, safety, and general welfare; as a result, most criminal laws and others statutes that affect health, marriage, education, sexual behavior, and family are made by states. Therefore, the Fourteenth Amendment has frequently become the vehicle for determining what rights are implied as part of preserving due process of law.

Using one theory of interpretation for the due process clause in the Fourteenth Amendment—that of selective incorporation first articulated by Justice Benjamin Cardozo in Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)—those rights that are “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty” or rank as “fundamental principles of ordered liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions” are protected by the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause. Justice Cardozo intended that this criterion could be used to differentiate between rights that are important from those that are not, such as indictment by a grand jury. Yet, some rights that everyone would agree are fundamental in a democracy, such as the right to vote, are not listed in the Bill of Rights. Surely the right to believe must be cognate to the rights to free exercise of religion and freedom of speech.

A number of implied rights have been recognized as protected by virtue of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Among them are the right to travel, the right to marry and have children, the right to association, the right to study a foreign language, the right to educate one’s children, and the right to privacy. As early as 1867, the right to travel interstate was recognized by the Court in Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U.S. 35 (1867), as implied by the term “liberty” in the Fifth Amendment. Nearly a century later, the right to travel internationally was incorporated through the Fourteenth Amendment in Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1958), and recognized in Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969). In the latter case Justice William Brennan, writing for the Court, stated that it was unnecessary to “ascribe the source of this right to travel interstate to a particular constitutional provision;” the right to travel was fundamental to the concept of a federal union.

A long list of unenumerated rights was recognized as early as 1923, when the Court struck down a Nebraska statute that banned the teaching of any language other than English until high school. Justice James Clark McReynolds, writing for the majority in Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), spoke expansively of the broad contours of the term “liberty.” He wrote,

It denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint, but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience and to enjoy those privileges ... essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men.

The right to educate children according to parental wishes was subsequently acknowledged as an implied right in the case of Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925). In Pierce the Court invalidated an Oregon statute requiring that students up to the age of sixteen could only attend public schools. A right to association was incorporated into the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause in 1958 by NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 44 (1958), and the right of belief was acknowledged by the 1943 decision in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943).

IMPLIED RIGHTS

Perhaps the most controversial of the implied rights that the Court has recognized are those associated with the right to privacy. The so-called “right to be left alone” as the essence of privacy was asserted by Justice Louis Brandeis in his dissenting opinion in Olmstead v. United States in 1928. The Brandeis formulation did not win the support of a majority of the Court until 1965 in the majority opinion of Justice William O. Douglas in the case of Griswold v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 145 (1965). Justice Douglas listed the various unenumerated rights discussed here previously and then proposed that a right to privacy could be found within the penumbras of a number of explicit rights.

The rights of association, to not have soldiers quartered in one’s home, and to be protected from unreasonable searches and seizures and against self-incrimination all implied a right of privacy. Moreover, he asserted that the Ninth Amendment’s statement that the enumeration of rights in the Bill of Rights “shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people” surely protected marriage and its intimacies from governmental intrusion. Though Griswold specifically addressed the ability of married couples to obtain and use contraceptive devices, it is regarded as having acknowledged the right to privacy.

The right to privacy in Griswold was later and more controversially used to protect a woman’s right to have an abortion. In the 1973 case of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), Justice Harry Blackmun’s opinion for the seven-justice majority traced the right of privacy to a long list of cases. Justice Blackmun refused to link the right in any single amendment, but rather argued that the Fourteenth Amendment’s “concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon state action ... is broad enough to encompass a woman’s decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy.”

Justice Blackmun balanced a woman’s right to choose an abortion against legitimate interests of the state and employed a trimester formula to reconcile the competing interests. He accorded the woman and her attending physician the decision during the first trimester, but acknowledged a progressively more significant role for the state to regulate to preserve maternal health in the second trimester and even to prohibit abortion to protect the health of the mother in the third trimester of pregnancy. Subsequently, a number of state laws that placed barriers to a woman’s ability to terminate her pregnancy were invalidated and approximately an equal number were upheld. Despite changes in public opinion, political climates, and personnel on the Court, the essence of Roe v. Wade has not been overturned.

MARY L. VOLCANSEK

Cases and Statutes Cited

Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U.S. 35 (1867)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 145 (1965)
Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1958)
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 44 (1958)
Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969)
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

INCORPORATION DOCTRINE

In the debates and public discussions that led to the framing and ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, proponents such as John Bingham, the principal framer of the amendment, proclaimed that its intent was to extend the jurisdiction of the federal courts over all of the rights recognized in the U.S. Constitution, including all those in the Bill of Rights, for cases between a citizen and his state. The Supreme Court in Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. 243 (1833), had held that while state courts were indeed bound to protect the rights recognized in the Bill of Rights, the Bill of Rights did not amend the omission of cases between a citizen and his state from the list of jurisdictions in Art. III, making them federal questions that could be adjudicated in federal courts. The Fourteenth Amendment was intended in part, its proponents claimed, to correct the precedent of Barron.

Opponents of this interpretation argue that the Fourteenth Amendment was primarily designed to protect the citizenship rights of blacks and ban race discrimination, but not to apply the Bill of Rights to the states. Supporters of this notion argued that black freedom could only be accomplished if the civil liberties of blacks and their white southern allies were protected. They further argued that without due-process protections, such as those found in the Bill of Rights, the former slaves and white southern Unionists would have been at the mercy of their former masters. Thus, the claim was made that the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment, especially John Bingham, understood they were protecting black freedom and the civil liberties of all people in the South.

Such extension created a logical problem, however. If rights, or more precisely, immunities against official action, were all the field of public action not restricted by the delegation of a power to public officials, and every declaration of a right a restriction on delegated powers, then federal immunities would include a vast array, including many that were abridged by the delegations of powers to state officials by state constitutions. If states could abridge any federal privilege or immunity by adopting state constitutional delegations of powers, then the Fourteenth Amendment could be rendered void.

If, on the other hand, there were federal privileges and immunities beyond the reach of state constitutions to abridge, then the Bill of Rights, especially the Ninth and Tenth Amendments, was not sufficiently specific as to which of those privileges and immunities might be of a more fundamental character. The states had adopted broad “police powers” to legislate for the “health, safety, order, and morals” of the people, and the language of such a broad delegation left it to the discretion of the state legislature to abridge almost any federal privilege or immunity.

Beginning with the Slaughterhouse Cases of 1872, which found only a very limited set of privileges and immunities inherent in federal citizenship, the U.S. Supreme Court began to reach decisions on such rights that narrowly considered only particular rights, and not the full array of them, and based their decisions not on the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, but on its due process clause. It has also expanded upon a distinction, first suggested in Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1856), between substantive and procedural due process. This raised the question of whether the states were bound to the same standards of due process as the federal government was; indeed, the Court did begin to allow the states to deviate from federal standards of due process.

In Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884), the Court refused to protect the right to indict by a grand jury in California. In Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78 (1908), the Court declined to protect the right against self-incrimination. In Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937), it was double jeopardy. In Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46 (1947), it was the right not to use a defendant’s refusal to testify against himself against him. In Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), it was the right to a jury of twelve. In Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972), it was the right to a unanimous jury.

Positive incorporation of rights can be traced back to Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway Co. v. Chicago, 166 U.S. 226 (1897), in which the Supreme Court appeared to require some form of just compensation for property appropriated by state or local authorities. More clearly, in Gitlow v. New York, 268

U.S. 652 (1925), the Court expressly held that states were bound to observe First Amendment free-speech protections. Since then, selective incorporation has been made in:

- Near v. Minnesota*, 283 U.S. 697 (1931) (freedom of the press)
- Powell v. Alabama*, 287 U.S. 45 (1932) (assistance of counsel in capital criminal cases)
- DeJonge v. Oregon*, 299 U.S. 353 (1937) (freedom of assembly)
- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940) (free exercise of religion)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947) (establishment of religion)
- In re Oliver*, 233 U.S. 257 (1948) (public trial)
- Wolf v. Colorado*, 338 U.S. 25 (1949) (right against unreasonable search and seizure)
- NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson*, 357 U.S. 449 (1958) (freedom of association)
- Mapp v. Ohio*, 367 U.S. 643 (1961) (exclusionary rule)
- Robinson v. California*, 370 U.S. 660 (1962) (cruel and unusual punishment)
- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1963) (assistance of counsel in felony cases)
- Malloy v. Hogan*, 378 U.S. 1 (1964) (right against self-incrimination)
- Pointer v. Texas*, 380 U.S. 400 (1965) (right to confront adverse witnesses)
- Klopfer v. North Carolina*, 386 U.S. 213 (1967) (right to speedy trial)
- Washington v. Texas*, 388 U.S. 14 (1967) (right to compulsory process to obtain witness testimony)
- Duncan v. Louisiana*, 391 U.S. 145 (1968) (right to trial by jury in cases with significant criminal penalties)
- Benton v. Maryland*, 395 U.S. 784 (1969) (right against double jeopardy)
- Rabe v. Washington* (1972) (right to notice of accusation)
- Argersinger v. Hamlin* (1972) (right to counsel in imprisonable misdemeanor cases)
- Burch v. Louisiana* (1979) (right to unanimous jury verdict if jury size is only six)

The principal champion for total incorporation of all of at least the enumerated rights recognized in the Bill of Rights and elsewhere in the U.S. Constitution was Justice Hugo Black in his dissent in Adamson. Opposing this is the position of Justice Felix Frankfurter, who argued in Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952), that the federal courts should apply only those provisions of the Bill of Rights that, if abridged, would “shock the conscience,” which would seem to make incorporation more a matter of emotion than logic. However, the Frankfurter doctrine has prevailed for the time being, leaving several rights, such as the protections of the Second and Eighth Amendments, unresolved. It also fails to address Ninth Amendment “unenumerated” rights that may be considered fundamental, such as the right to a presumption of nonauthority and to prosecute a public right privately.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- Aynes, Richard, On Misreading John Bingham and the Fourteenth Amendment, Yale Law Journal 103 (1993): 57.
- Curtis, Michael. “No State Shall Abridge”: The Fourteenth Amendment and the Bill of Rights. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1986.
- Lieberman, J. A Practical Companion to the Constitution. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.
- Roland, Jon. Intent of the Fourteenth Amendment was to Protect All Rights. Includes quotes from the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment and the arguments of Justice Hugo Black for full incorporation. http://www.constitution.org/col/intent_14th.htm.
- Symposium on John Bingham and the Meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment*, Akron Law Review 36 (2003): 589–717.

INCORPORATION DOCTRINE AND FREE SPEECH

The First Amendment explicitly protects speech and press from federal government abridgement, but only in 1925, in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925), did the Supreme Court find a way to provide federal protection when a state abridges expression. The key was “incorporation,” a new interpretation of Fourteenth Amendment language prohibiting states from depriving “any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.”

Benjamin Gitlow had been convicted of violating New York’s criminal anarchy statute by calling for violent overthrow of the government. The Court upheld Gitlow’s conviction, but also declared that “[f]or present purposes we may and do assume that freedom of speech and of the press ... are among the fundamental personal rights and ‘liberties’ protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the States” (p. 666). In other words, the Court interpreted the word “liberty” to include freedom of expression and thus “incorporated” protection of speech and press into the Fourteenth Amendment.

Two years later, in Fiske v. Kansas, 274 U.S. 380 (1927), the Court used the Fourteenth Amendment to overturn a state conviction for criminal syndicalism.

In 1931, in Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931), the Court declared, “It is no longer open to doubt that the liberty of the press and of speech is within the liberty safeguarded by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from invasion by state action” (p. 707). Without incorporation, many of the most significant free expression cases of the past seventy-five years would never have reached the Court.

ROBERT E. DRECHSEL

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Fiske v. Kansas*, 274 U.S. 380 (1927)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- Near v. Minnesota*, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)

See also Fourteenth Amendment; Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925); Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)

INDEFINITE DETENTION

Although the general presumption in the United States is against indefinite detention, there are a number of ways in which persons not convicted of crimes can nevertheless be detained involuntarily for potentially indefinite periods. States have long had the power to commit to mental hospitals any persons with mental illnesses that cause them to pose dangers to themselves or to society. In recent years, a number of states have extended that approach to laws allowing the government to seek civil commitment of certain convicted sex offenders who suffer from mental abnormalities or personality defects that make them likely to engage in future sex crimes and who have completed their term of imprisonment.

In Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346 (1997), the Supreme Court sustained one such sex offender detention law from a constitutional challenge. Because persons detained under either approach remain confined until they recover their mental health or no longer pose a danger to themselves or society, their detention may be indefinite. In addition to civil commitment as outlined here, there are other forms of potentially indefinite detention worth studying, especially in light of the War on Terrorism.

Pretrial Detention and Material Witness Detention

In appropriate circumstances, a person who has not yet been convicted of a crime, but who is due to stand trial on criminal charges, can be detained involuntarily until the conclusion of the trial. In United States v. Salerno, 489 U.S. 731 (1987), the Supreme Court ruled that pretrial detention was not automatically unconstitutional, provided there were appropriate procedural safeguards in place, such as availability of defense counsel and findings of dangerousness by the trial court.

Strictly speaking, pretrial detention is of perhaps uncertain duration, but it is not indefinite because there is a clear endpoint: if the detainee is acquitted, detention ceases, and if the detainee is convicted, then further detention is justified as imprisonment pursuant to a criminal sentence. Moreover, the period of pretrial detention is theoretically limited by the constitutional right to a speedy trial. In practice, however, the speedy trial requirements often contain loopholes; in the federal system; for example, the trial judge can effectively suspend the requirement by making findings on the record that delaying the trial would be in the “interests of justice.” Consider, for example, that O. J. Simpson spent about fifteen months in jail while awaiting and during his double homicide trial.

A related form of detention is that as a material witness, under which a person can be detained involuntarily when his or her testimony would be important and when there is reason to believe that the court would not be able to subpoena the person to testify at trial. Following the 9/11 attacks, the federal government detained a number of persons as material witnesses, drawing criticism that it was misusing the material witness statute as a general counterterrorism detention power. Still, material witness detention has a theoretical limit, in that detention is justified to ensure that the witness will be present to provide his or her testimony; thus, the federal statute provides that no one should be held as a material witness if his or her testimony can be adequately preserved through a deposition. While some delay is permissible for the deposition to be taken, this at least represents an end point of detention.

Guantanamo Bay and the War on Terrorism

After the devastating September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the United States began a “war on terrorism” that included the capture of thousands of persons in Afghanistan and Pakistan. About one thousand were sent to a U.S. naval base on Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; as of 2005, about five hundred remained there in detention. A small number were designated for war crimes prosecutions in military tribunals, but a federal judge blocked those military prosecutions on the ground that the composition of the military tribunals violated the Constitution. The vast majority of the Guantanamo detainees were not charged with crimes.

The government’s rationale for detaining them has been that they are “enemy combatants” and that as long as the War on Terrorism continues, they are subject to continued detention. This argument relies on the right of nations during war to detain enemy soldiers as prisoners of war for the duration of the war. There is, however, an important difference between the war on terrorism and traditional nation-state wars; with the latter, there is a sovereign nation with which to negotiate and thereby bring a definitive end to the conflict. In the War on Terrorism, detention as an enemy combatant may truly be indefinite.

In Rasul v. Bush, 124 S. Ct. 2686 (2004), the Supreme Court, while not addressing the underlying legality of potentially indefinite detention, concluded that the Guantanamo detainees were entitled to file petitions for writs of habeas corpus to test the lawfulness of their detention. Rasul spurred the government to implement military hearings known as “combatant status review hearings” to reassess the classification of Guantanamo detainees as enemy combatants; this resulted in the release of a small number of detainees. The upshot appears to be acceptance of the continuing detention of persons correctly classified as enemy combatants, with ongoing litigation over the procedures underlying such classifications.

The USA PATRIOT Act endowed the government with additional power to detain suspected terrorists. Under Section 412 of that act (codified at Title 8, Section 1226a), the attorney general may detain a noncitizen that he has reasonable grounds to believe is a terrorist. If the alien is unlikely to be deported in the next six months and if the alien’s release would “threaten the national security of the United States or the safety of the community or any person,” the attorney general can continue to detain the alien for up to six months, with the power to renew detention for additional six-month periods.

Conclusion

Indefinite detention (apart from that imposed as a sentence pursuant to a conviction) is among the gravest civil liberties infringement, but at least in most instances, it is tempered by procedural protections aimed at reducing the likelihood of improper detention.

TUNG YIN

References and Further Reading

Robinson, Paul, Punishing Dangerousness: Cloaking Preventative Detention as Criminal Justice, Harvard Law Review 114 (2001): 1429–1456.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346 (1997)
Rasul v. United States, 124 S. Ct. 2686 (2004)
United States v. Salerno, 489 U.S. 731 (1987)
Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001)
Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Requiring to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism (USA PATRIOT) Act of 2001, act of Oct. 26, 2001, 115 Stat. 272

See also Due Process of Law; Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), Material Witnesses; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Speedy Trial; Suspended Right of Habeas Corpus

CITY OF INDIANAPOLIS v. EDMOND, 531 U.S. 32 (2000)

Under what circumstances may the police stop vehicles randomly at roadblocks? The use of checkpoints to stop vehicles, question drivers, and search vehicles implicates the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures. Highway checkpoints to combat drunk driving and checkpoints to intercept illegal immigrants have been held consistent with the Fourth Amendment. However, the Supreme Court in City of Indianapolis v. Edmond held that Indianapolis's highway checkpoint program violated the Fourth Amendment because its primary purpose was to advance the city's general interest in crime control.

Indianapolis began operating vehicle checkpoints in August 1998 in an effort to intercept illegal drugs. Police officers stopped a random group of vehicles at roadblocks on Indianapolis roads. Officers viewed the driver and the vehicle from the outside while narcotics-detection dogs sniffed the vehicle's exterior. Officers generally spent less than five minutes viewing each vehicle. Two individuals who were stopped at a checkpoint filed suit, claiming that the checkpoints were an unlawful search and seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment.

The Supreme Court noted that there are very limited exceptions to the general rule that the government may not establish checkpoints unless there is particularized suspicion of wrongdoing. Such exceptions include checkpoints that were regulatory in nature, such as for highway safety as in Michigan Dept. of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990), or border control as in United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976). In contrast to these other checkpoints, the primary purpose of Indianapolis's checkpoint was to interdict illegal narcotics. Because the Indianapolis checkpoint's primary purpose was to advance its general interest in crime control, Indianapolis could not stop vehicles without particularized suspicion of wrongdoing as required by the Fourth Amendment.

KATY H. H. YANG-PAGE

References and Further Reading

Meehan, Kevin P., and George M. Dery, III, The Supreme Court's Curious Math: How a Lawful Seizure Plus a Non-Search Add Up to a Fourth Amendment Violation, University of Memphis Law Review 32 (2002): 879–925.

Cases and Statutes Cited

City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32 (2000)
Michigan Dept. of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990)
United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976)

See also Checkpoints (roadblocks); Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990); Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Seizures

INDIAN BILL OF RIGHTS

Congress enacted the Indian Civil Rights Act (ICRA) in 1968 as Title II of the 1968 Civil Rights Act. Portions of the ICRA that substantially mirror the Bill of Rights are popularly called the "Indian Bill of Rights." The Indian Bill of Rights extends most of the constitutional protections of the Bill of Rights to individuals under the jurisdiction of Indian tribal governments. In order to preserve certain aspects of tribal government and sovereignty, some parts of the Bill of Rights were modified or left out. The individual rights protections include:

- rights to free exercise of religion, free speech, press, assembly, and to petition for a redress of grievances
- right to be free of unreasonable searches and seizures without a search warrant to be issued only upon a showing of probable cause
- right to be free from being placed in double jeopardy and from self-incrimination
- right to due process and equal protection
- right to be free from taking of property without just compensation
- rights to a speedy trial, confront witnesses, and the assistance of counsel freedom from excessive bail and cruel and unusual punishment freedom from bills of attainder and ex post facto laws right to a jury of at least six persons (less than in federal law) in all criminal cases carrying the possibility of imprisonment

The main differences include the absences of an establishment clause, a right to counsel at the government's expense, and the lack of a right to a jury trial in civil cases. Also, the ICRA prohibited Indian tribes from sentencing convicted criminals to more than six months in prison and $500 in fines (later amended to one year and $5,000).

Foundational Cases and Legislative History

The Supreme Court had originally decided in Talton v. Mayes, 163 U.S. 376 (1896) that, since tribal sovereignty flowed from a time immemorial and tribes had not participated in the drafting of or consented to the U.S. Constitution, the individual rights protections that limited federal (and later state) governments did not apply to tribal governments. The Court reaffirmed earlier decisions such as Worcester v. Georgia, 31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 536 (1832) that labeled Indian tribes as "domestic dependent nations," whose sovereignty derived not from federal or state authority, but flowed from inherent tribal sovereignty that had never been extinguished.

In Talton, a non-Indian convicted of murder in the courts of the Cherokee Nation petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus in federal court. He argued that the Cherokee Nation had indicted him with a five-person grand jury. Under Cherokee Nation law, thirteen persons were required to indict a defendant validly for murder. The Court rejected the petition on the basis that the Fifth Amendment, by its terms, only applies to the federal government, not tribal governments.

In the 1950s, non-Indians had brought several cases to the federal courts seeking a civil rights remedy for actions taken against them by tribal governments. In Martinez v. Southern Ute Tribe (249 F.2d 915, 10th Cir. 1957, cert. denied, 356 U.S. 960, 1958), for example, the Tenth Circuit Court rejected a due-process challenge to a tribal decision to deny membership rights to an individual Indian. In that case, the Southern Ute Tribe allegedly refused to allow a woman with a tribal member mother and a nonmember Indian father to participate pro rata in the economic benefits of the tribal corporation.

In Native American Church v. Navajo Tribal Council, 272 F.2d 131 (10th Cir. 1959), the Tenth Circuit ruled that the Navajo Nation was not bound by the First Amendment and could prohibit the ritual use of peyote by members of the Native American Church within its territory. Members of the church had argued that they had used peyote for religious purposes from time immemorial. In Barta v. Oglala Sioux Tribe (259 F.2d 553, 8th Cir. 1958, cert. denied, 358 U.S. 932, 1959), the Eighth Circuit Court ruled that the Fifth Amendment's due process clause and the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause did not restrict an Indian tribe from imposing a tax on non-Indians for use of tribal lands, but not on tribal members. In that case, non-Indian lessees of tribal trust lands on the Pine Ridge Reservation sought to avoid a grazing and farming license tax imposed by the tribe.

In 1961, the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights began an investigation of constitutional rights in Indian Country by sending out two thousand questionnaires to persons familiar with Indian tribes, followed thereafter by a series of hearings in states with relatively large tribal populations that took place over several years. Judicial concern over civil rights violations by tribal courts in criminal cases came to a head when the Ninth Circuit Court decided Colliflower v. Garland, 342 F.3d 369 (9th Cir. 1965). In that case, the Gros Ventre tribal court sentenced a woman to five days in jail for failure to remove her cattle from land leased to another person.

The Ninth Circuit took jurisdiction over the case—even though the events took place on the reservation and the parties were all tribal members—on the theory that the federal government had funded the tribal jail. It is likely that the court took the case because the tribal court had not allowed Colliflower to have an attorney or to confront witnesses against her—serious civil rights violations. Normally, federal and state courts would not have had jurisdiction over these internal tribal matters.

The Senate's concern related to tribal government practices centered on the criminal procedure provided by tribal courts. The Senate took testimony that suggested that most tribal courts were relatively crude in comparison to state and federal courts. Tribal judges rarely had legal training and tribal court records were poor at best. The Senate pounced on the fact that most criminal defendants before tribal courts confessed easily and without the advice of counsel. But this ignores the fact that, in nearly all tribal communities, the concept of punishment for criminal acts is a foreign notion. Under tribal traditions and customs, those who commit crimes are taught to admit the infraction with the understanding that they will not be severely punished. Tribal criminal jurisprudence is more restorative than retributive.

Many Senators and advocates were also more generally concerned of the possibility that somewhere in the United States were enclaves in which there were no civil rights protections from governmental activity. The Senate took testimony from numerous individuals who claimed to have been treated unfairly by tribal governments. Others were concerned that many Indian tribes did not provide an independent adjudicative body apart from the tribal council. Though the Senate hearings were replete with much anecdotal evidence of tribal government unfairness and concerns about tribal government structures, the legislature was far more concerned with procedural rights of criminal defendants in tribal courts. The provision for habeas corpus review of tribal court convictions evidences that this concern weighed more heavily with Congress than civil cases did. Significantly, the ICRA makes no other provision for federal court jurisdiction over tribal court decisions or for civil rights violations by tribal governments.

Specific provisions in the final version of the ICRA strongly imply that Congress intended to preserve as much of tribal culture as possible. Congress left out a provision equivalent to the establishment clause in order to preserve the rights of tribes to form and maintain theocratic government structures if they wished, as some tribes had. Even in the area of criminal procedure, the Senate subcommittee explicitly questioned whether imposition of certain criminal procedures would injure tribal culture or exert a significant impact on the tribal governmental capability. On the question of whether Indian tribes should be obligated to provide attorneys to indigent defendants, the subcommittee appeared particularly concerned that Indian tribes did not have the financial capacity to fund public defender offices. The Department of Justice also testified that few attorneys were available on reservations and that, since most tribal prosecutions dealt with tribal customary and traditional law, attorneys were not necessary.

Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez* and the Development of Tribal Courts

After the enactment of ICRA, numerous individuals brought civil rights cases in federal court that attempted to vindicate the rights protected in the ICRA. In Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez, 436 U.S. 49 (1978), Julia Martinez brought a sex discrimination claim under the ICRA against her tribe, seeking membership for her children. The Pueblo had enacted an enrollment ordinance that denied membership to the children of women who were tribal members when the father was not a member. Conversely, children of Santa Clara Pueblo men and nonmember women would be enrolled. The father of Martinez's children was a Navajo man and the Pueblo denied her children membership.

The Supreme Court held that Congress, in enacting the ICRA, did not confer federal court jurisdiction to resolve civil rights complaints against tribal governments and, in any event, tribal sovereign immunity barred Martinez's claim. The Court, per Justice Marshall, stated that complainants against tribal government actions must pursue a tribal forum. The Court also noted the possibility that individual officers of Indian tribes could be sued for prospective equitable relief, similar to how federal officials could be sued under Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908).

Following Martinez, many Indian tribes began to develop their tribal courts more intensely. Tribes began to incorporate their versions of the Bill of Rights into new or amended tribal constitutions. As a result, tribal courts apply their tribal customs and traditions to civil rights cases. For example, the Navajo Nation Supreme Court in Navajo Nation v. Crockett, 7 Navajo Reporter 237 (1996), applied Navajo traditional principles in upholding a restriction on free speech enacted by the Navajo Tribal Council. In Snowden v. Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe, 32 Indian Law Reporter 6047 (2005), the tribal court applied important tribal values to a civil rights case related to a long-standing membership dispute. The Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa Indians in Turtle Mountain Judicial Board v. Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa Indians (No. 04-007, Turtle Mountain Band Appellate Court, 2005), adopted sophisticated rules relating to judicial independence from the political branches of the tribe.

Not all Indian tribes provide a tribal court for the resolution of disputes. Shortly after the Court decided Martinez, the Tenth Circuit decided Dry Creek Lodge v. Arapahoe and Shoshone Tribes (623 F.2d 682, 10th Cir. 1980, cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1118, 1981). There, the tribal council had blocked a road on the reservation that led to the private property of non-Indians who had built a resort on the parcel. The parcel had once been owned by an Indian family that resided on the reservation, but they had lost it due to a tax foreclosure. The tribal council refused to grant the property owners access to the tribal court for review of their decision, forcing them to seek a federal court injunction.

Ignoring Martinez, the court took jurisdiction and granted the injunction on the basis that the tribes' action had been egregious and that there was no tribal dispute resolution forum available. The Tenth Circuit has limited Dry Creek Lodge to its facts and has not invoked this so-called “exception” to Martinez again. Other federal circuits, such as the Ninth Circuit in Johnson v. Gila River Indian Community, 174 F.3d 1032 (9th Cir. 1999), refuse to adopt this holding, questioning its validity.

Habeas Corpus Review of Tribal Detention

The lone federal cause of action contained in ICRA is the provision allowing individuals convicted of a tribal offense to petition for a writ of habeas corpus in federal courts. The meaning of this phrase has been extended by some federal courts to include banishment or exclusion from reservation lands. In Poodry v. Tonawanda Band of Seneca Indians (85 F.3d 874, 2nd Cir., cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1041, 1996), the Second Circuit Court granted a petition for a writ of habeas corpus when the tribal council banished several tribal members for treason. The council also stripped them of their property and citizenship within the tribe. The banished individuals received no hearing prior to being deprived of their membership and property.

The court concluded that the order requiring the members to leave the reservation amounted to a restraint on liberty sufficient to invoke the habeas corpus review provision in the ICRA. The tribe argued that summary banishment was consistent with tribal customary law and that federal court intervention into tribal affairs violated the spirit and intent of the ICRA. The court rejected that argument, noting that Congress, through its enactment of the ICRA, had already limited tribal customary law by imposing the series of individual rights and the possibility of habeas review—both of which were Anglo-American legal concepts—upon Indian tribes. One federal district court, however (in Alire v. Jackson, 65 F. Supp. 2d 1124, D. Or. 1999), declined to extend federal habeas review to a Warm Springs Indian Reservation tribal council order excluding a nonmember. The tribal council based its exclusion on the fact that the petitioner had been convicted of child abuse and had been employed as a caregiver to children on that reservation.

Others have sought habeas review of tribal court decisions in matters resulting in civil fines. In Moore v. Nelson, 270 F.3d 789 (9th Cir. 2001), a Yurok Indian who had violated a tribal court order not to harvest timber on the Hoopa Valley Reservation sought review of that court’s order to impound his logging equipment and fine him over $18,000. The Ninth Circuit refused to grant the petition, emphasizing that the petitioner had never been criminally prosecuted or sentenced and never subjected to detention of any kind. Similarly, in Shenandoah v. Halbritter (366 F.3d 89, 2nd Cir. 2004, cert. denied, 125 S. Ct. 1824, 2005), the Second Circuit refused to grant habeas review to a petitioner who claimed her house had been condemned by the Oneida Indian Nation in retaliation for her political activities. In contrast to Poodry, the court held that the action taken against the petitioner’s home did not amount to a restraint on liberty sufficient to invoke the ICRA habeas provisions.

MATTHEW L. M. FLETCHER

References and Further Reading

- Carpenter, Kristen A., Considering Individual Religious Freedoms under Tribal Constitutional Law, Kansas Journal of Law and Public Policy 15(3) (2005): 561–590.
- Garrow, Carrie E., and Sarah Deer. Tribal Criminal Law and Procedure. Lanham, MD: Altamira Press, 2004.
- Goldberg, Carole E., Individual Rights and Tribal Revitalization, Arizona State Law Journal 35(3) (2003): 889–938.
- Indian Bill of Rights and the Constitutional Status of Tribal Governments*, Harvard Law Review 82(6) (1968): 1343–1373.
- Pevar, Stephen L. The Rights of Indians and Tribes, 3rd. ed. Carbondale: University of Southern Illinois Press, 2002, 260–291.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Alire v. Jackson*, 65 F. Supp. 2d 1124 (D. Or. 1999)
- Barta v. Oglala Sioux Tribe*, 259 F.2d 553 (8th Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 932 (1959)
- Colliflower v. Garland*, 342 F.3d 369 (9th Cir. 1965)
- Dry Creek Lodge, Inc. v. Arapahoe and Shoshone Tribes*, 623 F.2d 682 (10th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1118 (1981)
- Johnson v. Gila River Indian Community*, 174 F.3d 1032 (9th Cir. 1999)
- Martinez v. Southern Ute Tribe*, 249 F.2d 915 (10th Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 356 U.S. 960 (1958)
- Moore v. Nelson*, 270 F.3d 789 (9th Cir. 2001)
- Native American Church v. Navajo Tribal Council*, 272 F.2d 131 (10th Cir. 1959)
- Navajo Nation v. Crockett*, 7 Navajo Reporter 237 (1996)
- Ordinance 59 Ass’n v. United States Dept. of Interior*, 163 F.3d 1150 (10th Cir. 1998)
- Poodry v. Tonawanda Band of Seneca Indians*, 85 F.3d 874 (2nd Cir.), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1041 (1996)
- Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez*, 436 U.S. 49 (1978)
- Shenandoah v. Halbritter*, 366 F.3d 89 (2nd Cir. 2004), cert. denied, 125 S. Ct. 1824 (2005)
- Snowden v. Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe*, 32 Indian Law Reporter 6047 (2005)
- Talton v. Mayes*, 163 U.S. 376 (1896)
- Turtle Mountain Judicial Board v. Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa Indians*, No. 04-007 (Turtle Mountain Band Appellate Court 2005)
- Worcester v. Georgia*, 31 U.S. (6 Pet.) 536 (1832)
- Ex parte Young*, 209 U.S. 123 (1908)

INDIAN BILL OF RIGHTS

Blackfeet Tribe of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation of Montana Constitution and By-Laws, Art. VIII
Cherokee Nation of Oklahoma Constitution, Art. II
Chickasaw Nation Constitution, Art. IV
Civil Rights Act of 1968, act of April 11, 1968, Pub. L. 90-284, Tit. II, 82 Stat. 77, codified as 25 U.S.C. §§ 1301-1303
Grand Traverse Band Constitution, Art. X
Sisseton-Wahpeton Sioux Tribe, South Dakota Constitution and By-Laws, Art. IX

See also Barron v. Baltimore, 7 (U.S.) 243 (1833); Bill of Rights: Structure; Habeas Corpus: Modern History; Plenary Power Doctrine; Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez, 436 U.S. 49 (1978)

INEFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL

The Sixth Amendment provides that a criminal defendant shall “have the Assistance of Counsel” for his defense. The Supreme Court has interpreted this clause as guaranteeing the effective assistance of counsel, beginning with one of the appeals from a trial in the Scottsboro cases (Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 1932). The modern standard for evaluating claims of ineffective assistance of counsel was set in 1984 in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668.

Strickland involved an appeal from a habeas corpus petition filed by a capital defendant who claimed that his lawyer had been ineffective at trial. The lawyer did not investigate potential mitigating evidence that might have persuaded the trial judge to impose a sentence of life imprisonment, rather than death. The Supreme Court set out a two-part test for evaluating claims of ineffective assistance of counsel.

First, the defendant must show that his or her lawyer failed to provide reasonably effective assistance. The reasonableness of the lawyer’s performance is to be evaluated with reference to prevailing professional norms, and courts should be reluctant to second-guess the lawyer’s tactical judgments. Perhaps in hindsight, it appears that a lawyer should have pursued a particular line of investigation or tried a different strategy at trial, but if the decision was reasonable under the circumstances at the time it was made, the lawyer’s performance should not be judged ineffective. The Court declined to adopt a set of rules for the evaluation of counsel’s performance at trial out of concern for restricting the flexibility a defense lawyer must have in making tactical decisions. It also emphasized that review of counsel’s performance should be highly deferential, with a heavy presumption in favor of a finding of effective representation.

The second prong of the Strickland test is that the defendant will not be entitled to reversal of the conviction unless the lawyer’s deficient performance resulted in prejudice to the defendant. To make a showing of prejudice, the defendant must establish that, except for the lawyer’s errors, there is a reasonable probability that the result of the proceeding would have been different. As the Court recognized, it is possible to avoid the first prong of the test entirely and resolve a case on prejudice. If the evidence of guilt against the accused is overwhelming, it is unlikely that even a serious error of counsel would change the result of the proceedings. Following Strickland, lower federal courts frequently resolved ineffective assistance claims on the prejudice prong.

In certain cases, prejudice is presumed. The most significant category of these cases involves the attorney’s representation of conflicting interests. If a conflict of interest actually affects the lawyer’s performance, the defendant need not show prejudice to obtain a new trial (Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 1980). The requirement of showing actual effect means that the defendant must specifically identify some act or omission that is traceable to the lawyer’s multiple loyalties. Courts have been unwilling to expand the categories of cases in which prejudice is presumed, and the Supreme Court has actually suggested that only the concurrent representation of clients with conflicting interests should trigger the presumption of prejudice (Mickens v. Taylor, 535 U.S. 162, 2002).

The Court’s approach to ineffective assistance of counsel has been criticized on a number of grounds. First, by deferring to the norms prevailing in the practicing bar, the Court has abandoned any attempt to improve the standards of practice of criminal defense lawyers. If the overall performance of the criminal defense bar is deficient, a given lawyer’s performance may not violate the first prong of Strickland.

Because of the overwhelming caseloads of many public defender offices and lack of adequate funding for indigent defense, it is possible that the average level of competence of lawyers who represent poor people may not be very high. Several notorious cases involving defense lawyers who slept through substantial portions of trials in capital cases brought this problem to public attention. Two recent Supreme Court decisions seem responsive to this concern and may reinvigorate the efforts of courts to set minimum standards for the competence of criminal defense lawyers (Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510 (2003); Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S., 2005). Both cases involved inadequate investigations of mitigating circumstances performed by lawyers representing capital defendants.

A related criticism was raised by Justice Marshall, dissenting in Strickland. Marshall asked why the rights of the accused depend upon the outcome of the proceeding. Should not the defendant's rights be defined instead in terms of "vigorous and conscientious advocacy by an able lawyer," regardless of whether the defendant is likely to be convicted anyway? Putting it another way, the defense lawyer's role is subordinated to the systemic goal of convicting guilty people, rather than protecting the intrinsic procedural rights of the accused.

Another concern with Strickland relates to the prejudice prong. Any single error by counsel is unlikely to have a direct causal relationship with the outcome of the trial. Instead, it is more likely that a series of small errors adds up to a different result. It can also be difficult for a defendant to prove a negative. The trial record will reveal the result of counsel's actual performance, but will offer no clue as to the result of a hypothetical decision. If the lawyer had filed a suppression motion, investigated a line of mitigating evidence, or called a different witness, the result would undoubtedly be different. From the standpoint of a reviewing court, however, it is exceedingly difficult to say how, exactly, the result would have been different. Moreover, the record will be affected by the defense lawyer's incompetence, making it even more likely that prejudice will not be apparent.

Barring a major change in the funding for indigent representation, ineffective assistance of counsel claims are likely to persist. Courts must balance the desirability of enhancing the performance of lawyers against the recognition of the difficulty of establishing ineffectiveness upon appellate and collateral review. The difficulty of this balance is exacerbated by the complexity of the defense lawyer's task and the difficulty of judging tactical decisions in hindsight. Strickland may not be entirely satisfactory, but it remains the constitutional framework within which these decisions will be made.

W. BRADLEY WENDEL

References and Further Reading

- Bright, Steven B., Counsel for the Poor: The Death Sentence not for the Worst Crime but for the Worst Lawyer, Yale Law Journal 103 (1994): 1835–1883.
 Burkoff, John M., and Hope L. Hudson. Ineffective Assistance of Counsel. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002 and Supp. 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cuyler v. Sullivan*, 446 U.S. 335 (1980)
Mickens v. Taylor, 535 U.S. 162 (2002)
Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)

- Rompilla v. Beard*, 545 U.S. (2005)
Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984)
Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510 (2003)

See also Habeas Corpus: Modern History; Right to Counsel; Rights of the Accused; Scottsboro Trials

INFLICTION OF EMOTIONAL DISTRESS AND FIRST AMENDMENT

Intentional infliction of emotional distress upon another person is a civil wrong, for which the victim may recover monetary damages. Because words can inflict emotional injury, there is an inherent conflict between the free-speech guarantee and government imposition of civil liability for this tort. The leading case involving this issue is Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988).

Hustler Magazine, a pornographic publication controlled by Larry Flynt, published a parody of a Campari liqueur advertisement that lampooned the evangelist Jerry Falwell. The actual advertisements featured interviews of celebrities discussing the first time they tasted Campari. Hustler's parody used a faux interview with Falwell to portray the first time he had sexual intercourse as a drunken encounter with his mother in an outhouse.

The Supreme Court ruled that Falwell's suit to recover damages for his emotional injury was barred by the free-speech guarantee. The Court reasoned that public figures such as Falwell could not maintain such suits by proving that the offending speech was "outrageous," but must prove that it was made with "actual malice": knowledge of its falsity or with reckless disregard for its truth or falsity. The problem with this standard as applied to parody, of course, is that parody is, by nature, intentionally false. Though the Court has not had occasion to rule on the issue, the implication of Hustler Magazine is that private figures may freely recover damages for emotional injuries inflicted by words, subject to other free-speech limits that may be applicable.

CALVIN MASSEY

References and Further Reading

- Post, Robert, The Constitutional Concept of Public Discourse: Outrageous Opinion, Democratic Deliberation and Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, Harvard Law Review 103 (1990): 603.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Hustler Magazine v. Falwell*, 485 U.S. 46 (1988)

See also Actual Malice Standard; Falwell, Jerry; Flynt, Larry; Public Figures; Satire and Parody and the First Amendment

IN RE GAULT, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)

In re Gault is the landmark 1967 case in which the U.S. Supreme Court extended several constitutional rights to children prosecuted within juvenile justice systems. While these rights had long been accorded adults prosecuted in criminal courts, American courts had allowed states to skirt such protections in their separate juvenile tribunals.

Fifteen-year-old Gerald Gault was arrested in Arizona in 1964 for making a lewd phone call to a neighbor. He was apprehended while his parents were at work and held several nights at a juvenile detention home. The procedure of the case reflected the informal nature of many states' approaches to juvenile justice. He was not provided specific notice of the charges against him. He was not advised of, or extended, his right to counsel. He was not told of his right to remain silent. He was not allowed to confront witnesses against him. The victim never even appeared in court to testify. His hearing was never recorded or transcribed and, pursuant to state law, he had no right to appeal.

The Supreme Court, which had shown increasing concern for rights of children in the prior term's case, Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541 (1966) (holding that Washington, D.C.'s provision for transferring juveniles to adult court was inadequate), concluded that this level of informality was constitutionally inadequate. As Justice Fortas argued in his majority opinion, "under our Constitution, the condition of being a boy does not justify a kangaroo court."

The Court concluded that there was still room for a juvenile justice system to operate in a distinct form from the criminal courts, but held that such courts must accord certain basic rights. It ruled that Gault's constitutional rights were violated with respect to his right to fair notice, counsel, silence, and confrontation. On the other hand, the Court reserved judgment on whether a child has a constitutional right to an appeal.

In some respects, Gault represents the Court's high-water mark in the protection of children's rights in delinquency. For example, a few terms later, in McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528 (1971), the Court held that children being prosecuted in juvenile courts were not entitled to a jury trial.

Since Gault, many states have chosen to narrow the jurisdiction of their juvenile courts, reserving them exclusively for very young offenders and those charged with less serious crimes. Other aspects of these courts have changed as well. In many states, juvenile proceedings have been opened to public view. Juvenile records, once sealed, are increasingly available to the public or for use in later adult proceedings. Some critics argue that these changes are the logical result of Gault. In this view, states were willing to treat children less harshly than adults, but only on the condition that they be allowed to impose swift, albeit rough, justice. Whatever the merits of this view, the Court made clear in Gault that juvenile justice remains strictly regulated by the Constitution.

DANIEL M. FILLER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541 (1966)

McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528 (1971)

IN RE GRIFFITHS, 413 U.S. 717 (1973)

In re Griffiths establishes a lawful permanent resident's right not to be excluded from the practice of law by state and local bar associations. Fre Le Poole Griffiths, a Dutch citizen, longtime U.S. resident, and Yale Law School graduate, applied to take the Connecticut bar exam in 1970. Despite conceding that she was otherwise qualified to sit for the exam, the state of Connecticut rejected Griffiths's application based solely on her immigration status as a non-U.S. citizen. The Supreme Court held that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment precluded Connecticut from relying solely on Griffiths's alienage. Subjecting the state's exclusionary laws to strict scrutiny, the majority held that Connecticut failed to adequately justify a link between Griffiths's citizenship and her competence as a lawyer.

While the Court agreed that states have a substantial interest in ensuring that only qualified individuals are allowed to practice law, it rejected the notion that lawful permanent residents may be barred outright. Connecticut had argued that its lawyers perform a unique role as officers of the court—one that could call into question a noncitizen's divided loyalties between client and country. The majority disagreed, noting that attorneys have neither policymaking nor law enforcement authority, but rather are private professionals whose qualifications are already adequately regulated by the state's regular admission procedures and ethics rules. The civil rights legacy of In re Griffiths is its opening of the doors of equality to longtime permanent residents who desire to uphold the law through its practice.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

Knoppke–Wetzel, Volker, Employment Restrictions and the Practice of Law by Aliens in the United States and Abroad, Duke Law Journal (1974): 871–922.

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Equal Protection of Law (XIV)

IN RE WINSHIP, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)

In In re Winship, twelve-year-old Samuel Winship was charged with delinquency for allegedly entering a locker and stealing $112 from a woman's pocketbook, a crime that would constitute larceny if committed by an adult. The family court judge acknowledged that the proof against the boy might not establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt but, as permitted by state statute, adjudicated him delinquent by a preponderance of the evidence. The court committed Winship to a training school for eighteen months, with annual extensions possible until his eighteenth birthday six years later.

The Supreme Court reversed. Winship first held that Fourteenth Amendment due process protects criminal defendants against conviction except on proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every fact necessary to constitute the crime charged. The Court then held that due process also requires application of the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt in the adjudicatory stage of delinquency proceedings. "The same considerations that demand extreme caution in fact finding to protect the innocent adult apply as well to the innocent child."

Like all other juvenile court proceedings, delinquency proceedings are civil in nature. Delinquency proceedings hold distinct criminal overtones, however, because they charge conduct that would be a crime if committed by an adult and because, as in Samuel Winship's case, adjudication may lead to loss of liberty. Attention focused on delinquency's standard of proof after the Supreme Court held, in In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), that Fourteenth Amendment procedural due process requires juvenile courts to confer constitutional protections needed to assure "fundamental fairness" in delinquency proceedings. Winship applied the fundamental fairness test to the adjudicatory stage of these proceedings, without deciding the standard of proof required during the preliminary and dispositional stages. State law determines the sufficiency of proof during these two stages.

Winship's holding was also limited in other important respects. The Court did not apply due process to juvenile court proceedings that charge caregivers with abusing or neglecting children. Nor did the decision reach juvenile court proceedings that charge youths with only "status offenses"—conduct such as truancy, incorrigibility, or running away from home, which would not be crimes if committed by an adult. The general civil standard of proof, preponderance of evidence, applies in abuse, neglect, and status offense proceedings unless state law requires a higher standard, such as clear and convincing evidence.

Winship's legacy remains mixed. On the one hand, the decision requires the state to put on greater proof than frequently sustained delinquency adjudications under the traditional view that juvenile court sanctions constituted nonpunitive treatment in the youth's best interests. Despite the juvenile court's traditional rehabilitative mission, Winship makes it more difficult to ignore the punitive nature of delinquency dispositions. On the other hand, some question remains about Winship's practical impact. Some commentators argue that juvenile court judges sometimes find delinquency on less evidence than would establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt in criminal cases, particularly when the judge believes the youth would benefit from court-ordered treatment unavailable outside the juvenile justice system.

DOUGLAS E. ABRAMS

References and Further Reading

Davis, Samuel M. Rights of Juveniles 2d: The Juvenile Justice System, 2005 ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2005, 279–284.

LaFave, Wayne R. Criminal Law, 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2003, 56–57.

Rosenberg, Irene Merker, Winship Redux: 1970 to 1990, Texas Law Review 69 (1990): 109.

Sanborn, Joseph B., Jr., Remnants of Parens Patriae in the Adjudicatory Hearing: Is a Fair Trial Possible in Juvenile Court? Crime and Delinquency 40 (1994): 599.

Cases and Statutes Cited

In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)

See also Due Process of Law (V and XIV); In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)

INSANITY DEFENSE

The insanity defense is an excuse for crime for those who, because of mental disorder, are not considered blameworthy. It is premised on the intuition that people with serious mental illness are so different from others that they cannot be held accountable for their criminal actions. Yet, many do not share in this intuition, and those who do have disagreed over the best formulation for capturing it.

The insanity defense has ancient roots. Greek and Hebrew civilizations recognized that serious mental illness should have mitigating impact and medieval English kings pardoned murderers who suffered from “madness.” The first modern test for insanity was devised in 1843 by the House of Lords in England. In M’Naghten’s case, the Lords announced that a person should be excused by reason of insanity if a “mental disease or defect” caused “a defect in reason that resulted in the inability to know the nature and quality” of the criminal act or caused the person to “not know that the act was wrong.”

At about the same time, other courts were recognizing insanity claims based on a failure of the will rather than a lack of understanding. Thus, an American court held, in Parsons v. State, 81 Ala. 577, 596, 2 So. 854 (1887), that an insanity defense could also succeed if the person “has lost the power to choose between the right and wrong and to avoid doing the act in question, such that free agency is destroyed”—a formulation that came to be called the “irresistible impulse” test for insanity. By the mid-twentieth century, most American jurisdictions had adopted the M’Naghten test or a combination of M’Naghten and the irresistible impulse test.

The M’Naghten and irresistible impulse tests were criticized on the ground that they required almost total impairment in terms of cognition (M’Naghten) or volition (irresistible impulse). In reaction to these complaints, in the 1950s American Law Institute (ALI) fashioned another test for insanity. This “ALI test” defines an insane person as one who, “as a result of mental disease or defect ... lacks substantial capacity either to appreciate the criminality [wrongfulness] of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law.” This formulation does not require complete cognitive or volitional incapacity, only “substantial” incapacity. Furthermore, it uses the word “appreciate” rather than M’Naghten’s “know,” a modification that, according to the ALI commentary, was meant to convey “a broader sense of understanding than simple cognition.” Well over half the states, as well as most federal courts, had adopted some version of the ALI test by the end of the 1970s.

The law of insanity changed considerably after John Hinckley’s insanity acquittal in 1982 on the charge of attempting to assassinate President Ronald Reagan. Within a short period after that case, several states had abolished the insanity defense, and many others had narrowed the types of mental disorders that could form the predicate for insanity, eliminated the “volitional prong” of the defense, changed the test language from “appreciate” back to “know,” shifted the burden of proving insanity to the defendant, or adopted some combination of these reforms.

Representative of these efforts is the test promulgated by Congress in the Insanity Defense Reform Act of 1984, which provides that a person is insane if, “as a result of severe mental disease or defect,” he “was unable to appreciate the nature and quality or the wrongfulness of his acts.”

Another post-Hinckley effort at undermining the effect of the insanity defense, adopted in about a dozen states, is the guilty but mentally ill (GBMI) verdict. This verdict is meant to provide juries with a compromise between an insanity finding and a straightforward guilty verdict. Empirical research indicates that the GBMI verdict has not reduced insanity acquittals, but rather merely provides jurors with another way of describing those who are normally found guilty. Furthermore, the verdict is seriously misleading to the extent that jurors or defense attorneys believe that it somehow mitigates sentence. In fact, persons found GBMI are supposed to and do receive the same sentence as if they had been found guilty, and several have been sentenced to death.

Approximately five states have abolished the insanity defense, although they still allow defendants to present psychiatric evidence that might prove the defendant did not intend the offense. This “mens rea” alternative has generally been upheld against constitutional attack, although one state court found it violated due process because it abolishes the (broader) insanity excuse (Finger v. State, 117 Nev. 548, 27 P.3d 66, 2001). Also of relevance here is the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Montana v. Egelhoff, 518 U.S. 37 (1996), which found that a state’s abolition of the intoxication defense did not violate due process primarily because that defense was “of recent vintage.” On this reasoning, the insanity defense, which has ancient origins, might be constitutionally mandated.

From the civil liberties perspective, whether and in what form the insanity defense should be retained is a difficult question to answer. Certainly some mentally ill people are relatively less blameworthy than other offenders, and the defense has historically been a useful method of escaping the death penalty. But in noncapital cases, confinement after an insanity acquittal can last as long as or longer than imprisonment for the same crime, and a broad insanity test might result in pervasive preventive detention of those with mental problems.

While treatment is supposedly provided people found insane, it should also be provided to those mentally ill people who end up in prison; using the insanity defense as a vehicle for obtaining treatment for the tens of thousands of mentally ill people who offend is inefficient and distracts attention away from the treatment needs of offenders who would not be found insane under any formulation of the defense.

Some sort of insanity defense is worth keeping, however, as a recognition that some members of society are so impaired that a society that punished them would be a disgrace and also because cases that raise the issue forces people to confront what it means to be responsible for their actions.

CHRISTOPHER SLOBOGIN

References and Further Reading

Melton, Gary et al. Psychological Evaluations for the Courts: A Handbook for Mental Health Professionals and Lawyers, 2nd ed. New York: Guilford Press, 1997, chapter eight.

Perlin, Michael J. The Jurisprudence of the Insanity Defense. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Finger v. State, 117 Nev. 548, 27 P.3d 66 (2001)

Montana v. Egelhoff, 518 U.S. 37 (1996)

Parsons v. State, 81 Ala. 577, 596, 2 So. 854 (1887)

See also Guilty but Mentally III

INTELLECTUAL INFLUENCES ON FREE-SPEECH LAW

Free-speech law in America begins with the state of English free-speech law in the seventeenth century. At that time there were two avenues for state control of speech: licensing and libel. Licensing was a prior restraint on publishing. In order to operate a printing press, one had to obtain a license from the king, who could veto any publication based on content. The early advocates for free speech focused on doing away with this prior restraint of licensing. These included Milton, whose (illegally unlicensed) Areopagitica cautiously argued against prior restraints on four grounds: (1) They are used by parties, such as opponents of the Reformation, who have weak positions; (2) they deprive citizens of the intellectual exercise provided by studying alternative points of view; (3) they do not succeed in preventing points of view from becoming known; and (4) they discourage healthy curiosity. When Blackstone did away with licensing in the late seventeenth century, he believed freedom from prior restraints ensured freedom of speech.

Unfortunately, the law of libel was an even more pernicious restraint on free speech. There were three libels: sedition, defamation, and blasphemy. These made it a crime to criticize the government (sedition), fellow citizens (defamation), or religion (blasphemy). The law of seditious libel was especially notorious; confessions were often obtained through torture and truth was not a defense. Prosecutions were numerous and arbitrary, including that of Thomas Paine for publishing The Rights of Man. Interestingly, the government showed relatively little interest in prosecuting sexual or bawdy speech. As late as 1708, no law existed in England against obscenity.

Many seventeenth- and eighteenth-century thinkers advocated freedom to criticize the government. For example, the natural rights thinkers, such as John Locke, believed that government only existed to safeguard its citizens' interest in life, liberty, health, and property. When government overstepped its bounds, the people had a right to destroy it. Eighteenth-century Enlightenment thinkers agreed. Thus, criticism of government and institutions is central to the Enlightenment. Locke's notion of the limitations on civil government were central to the American Revolutionaries, embodied by Thomas Jefferson's paraphrasing of Locke in the Declaration of Independence ("... life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness ...").

The right to voice a dissenting opinion was obviously important to the colonists. In the 1735 sedition trial of Peter Zenger, Andrew Hamilton persuaded the jury to reject the English common law of sedition by accepting truth as a defense. The Americans' value of open criticism of government is reflected in the fact that most of the colonies had bills of rights that protected the freedom of speech by the time the constitutional delegates convened in Philadelphia. When the Constitution was submitted to states' approval and did not include a protection for the freedom of speech, there was a national clamor against it. Elbridge Gerry and George Mason threatened to scuttle the whole thing; Jefferson wrote from Paris that he hoped it would not be ratified without one.

Opponents of a federal bill of rights, such as Roger Sherman, argued that it was not necessary, since the states' protections of free speech were still in effect, and the new Constitution did not repeal them. However, since the federal Constitution was paramount over state constitutions, George Mason and others wanted a federal guarantee. Other opponents of a bill of rights argued that the constitution did not need one because it was organized with the people as sovereign. Since the people gave up no rights to the government, they did not need to specify rights that they reserved. In fact, a bill of rights might be dangerous. By enumerating specific powers not granted to the government, it would imply that all other powers were granted to the government. This was the position taken by Madison, Jay, and Hamilton in Federalist Papers no. 84, as well as of James Wilson of Philadelphia. Nevertheless, Mason, Gerry, and Jefferson won out and the Bill of Rights and the First Amendment were passed.

Despite the strong protection of the First Amendment, during times of political crisis the right to dissent has often been curtailed because of fear that dissent will incite unrest. For example, during World War I, pacifists were imprisoned for opposing the draft on the grounds that their opposition might undermine the war effort. The lawyer Zechariah Chafee argued that the mere possibility of inciting unrest was not enough to justify suppressing the pacifists' dissent. In his view, suppressing speech on "public protection" grounds was only valid when the speech posed an identifiable "clear and present danger," such as yelling for a gunman to pull the trigger. His arguments persuaded Justice Holmes and soon became constitutional law.

Alexander Meiklejohn advocates a theory of free speech that emphasizes the role it plays in keeping the government accountable. Thus, Meiklejohn believes revolutionary agitation is protected by the First Amendment, even if it poses a clear and present danger of inciting a revolution. However, in Meiklejohn's view, the First Amendment is not concerned with purely private experience and therefore art and fiction are not protected by the First Amendment at all. Nevertheless, Meiklejohn does believe people have a due-process right not to have their private speech curtailed unnecessarily. While his theories are consistent and logical, they lead to such extreme results that they have not met with judicial application.

Classical liberalism takes a laissez-faire approach to speech. Thus, in the nineteenth century, John Stuart Mill argued that complete freedom of speech creates a "marketplace of ideas." However, recent scholarship has criticized classical liberalism's laissez-faire take on speech, claiming that liberals are naïve about the effects of power in speech. Thus, Schiffrin rejects the "marketplace of ideas" theory because of its faith in an invisible hand that guides us towards truth. He argues a "market failure" rebuttal: since the rich have more access to media than the poor, an unregulated trade in ideas is inherently unfair. In his view, there should be a positive right for dissenting voices to be heard. Because American law is negative-rights oriented, this position has not taken hold. Other scholars claim that hate speech perpetuates domination by the strong over the weak and should be prohibited. One notable scholar to take this tack was the feminist Andrea Dworkin, who favored a ban on pornography, which she considered an "antifeminist propaganda machine." Others favor restrictions on ethnic or racial slurs.

CHRISTOPHER D. KING

References and Further Reading

- Dworkin, Andrea. Pornography: Men Possessing Women. New York: Putnam, 1981.
 Hudon, Edward G. Freedom of Speech and Press in America. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press, 1963.

Meiklejohn, Alexander. Free Speech and its Relation to Self-Government. New York: Harper, 1948.

Nelson, Samuel Peter. Beyond the First Amendment: The Politics of Free Speech and Pluralism. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2005.

See also Government Funding of Speech; Hate Speech; Low Value Speech; Meiklejohn, Alexander; National Security and Freedom of Speech; Obscenity; Philosophy and Theory of Freedom of Expression; Prior Restraints; Public Forum Doctrines; Red Scare of the Early 1920s; Seditious Libel; Zenger Trial (1735)

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Intellectual property rights and free-speech rights find explicit support in the Constitution. The First Amendment prohibits the government from "abridging the freedom of speech." Article I of the Constitution grants Congress the power to secure "for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries."

Congress has protected intellectual property rights through copyright, patent, and trademark laws. Copyright law grants authors exclusive rights to their works for up to seventy-five years after their death. Patent law grants inventors a twenty-year monopoly on the manufacture or sale of their inventions. The law of trademarks—distinctive words or designs identifying the source of goods or services—allows trademark holders to prevent others from using similar words or designs to market similar goods or services.

Intellectual property rights and free-speech rights exist in a symbiotic relationship. Without free-speech protection, authors and inventors might find themselves harshly censored. Yet without intellectual property protection, authors and inventors might not invest their creative energy in works that ultimately benefit the public. In this balance between empowering authorship and empowering speech, there lies the risk that the predominance of one may diminish the other.

Digital communication media could destabilize this balance by changing the ways that people share information. Before the digital age, information sharing was constrained by the practical limits on how many paper copies or tape recordings one could make and distribute. Digital media, however, have largely erased such physical constraints. Some argue that the ease of copying and sharing information threatens intellectual property rights.

Others, however, believe that the rise of digital media will shift the balance in favor of intellectual property rights. Digital rights management (DRM) technologies allow intellectual property rights-holders to encode restrictions within digital files or digital media. DRM technologies can limit how often or how long the user views a file and can similarly restrict the user's ability to alter, share, copy, print, or save the file. Although DRM technologies are not immune to hackers, the Digital Millennium Copyright Act makes it a crime to create or distribute tools that circumvent DRM technologies.

DRM technologies threaten a critical aspect of the balance between intellectual property and free speech. Under the "fair use" exception to copyright law, people need not receive the author's permission to use copyrighted works for such purposes as criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching, scholarship, and research. The fair use exception allows these important areas of public discourse to benefit from the work of authors and inventors, yet still protects those works against commercial exploitation. If DRM technologies were perfected, they could prohibit the fair uses that have traditionally been considered essential to a healthy public discourse.

SHAUN B. SPENCER

References and Further Reading

- Halbert, Debora J. Intellectual Property in the Information Age: The Politics of Expanding Ownership Rights. Westport, CT: Quorum 1999.
- Lessig, Lawrence. The Future of Ideas: The Fate of the Commons in a Connected World. New York: Random House 2001.
- Moore, Adam D. Intellectual Property and Information Control: Philosophic Foundations and Contemporary Issues. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers, 2001.
- Reidenberg, Joel R., Lex Informatica: The Formulation of Information Policy Rules Through Technology, Texas Law Review 76 (1988): 553–593.
- Samuelson, Pamela, Intellectual Property and the Digital Economy: Why the Anti-Circumvention Regulations Need to Be Revised, Berkeley Technology Law Journal 14 (1999): 519–566.

INTELLIGENCE IDENTITIES PROTECTION ACT (1982)

The Intelligence Identities Protection Act, P.L. 97-200, became law on June 23, 1982, as an amendment to the National Security Act of 1947. The act was an immediate response to a series of disclosures in the post-Watergate era, placing U.S. covert operatives and others working with them in personal danger. The most famous cases involve disclosures by former CIA operative Philip Agee, leading to the assassination of CIA operative in Greece, and by the editor of a publication, the Covert Action Bulletin Board, at a news conference in Kingston, Jamaica, in 1980, leading to an attack on the U.S. Embassy there. The act thus reflects Congress's judgment that some new deterrent measures were necessary.

It criminalizes the disclosure of covert agents of the United States, establishing three distinct offenses with increasingly severe penalties, reaching up to ten years' imprisonment, $50,000 in fines, or both. In decreasing order of severity, it distinguishes among the following cases: intentional disclosure by a person who ordinarily has access to classified information concerning the identity of a covert agent; intentional disclosure by a person who has access to classified information and learns of the identity of a covert agent; and, finally, a pattern of activities intended to identify and expose covert agents, with reason to believe that those activities would impair or impede the foreign intelligence activities of the United States. In each case, the government must prove that the defendant knows not only that the information identifies a covert agent, but also that the United States is taking affirmative measures to conceal that agent's relationship to the United States. The defendant can avoid criminal responsibility if he can show that the United States had publicly acknowledged or revealed its intelligence relationship with the identified covert agent.

As the legislative history reveals, with regard to wholly private conduct, the Congress considered the First Amendment interest in publishing actual names of covert agents to be de minimis. The legislative history also reveals that Congress intended that prosecution in such cases would require a showing of a "pattern of activities," such as efforts to obtain classified information; a comprehensive counterintelligence effort involving espionage techniques; or systematic collection, collation, and analysis of information from documentary sources. The Congress believed that this requirement would allow the courts to protect expressive, journalistic, and scholarly activities protected by the First Amendment.

In 2003, the act drew public attention in relation to the revelation of the name of a CIA employee, Valerie Plame, whose husband had submitted a report on the possibility of uranium ore transfers from Niger to Iraq at variance with public assertions by the Bush administration. The matter is under investigation, drawing the act into public attention, but this renewed attention bears little relation to the types of disclosures that originally prompted its enactment.

ANTONIO F. PEREZ

References and Further Reading

- Michalec, Mitchell J., The Classified Information Protection Act: Killing the Messenger or Killing the Message?

Cleveland State Law Review 50 (2002–2003): 455 (offering a recent discussion of the act, its history, and significance).

INTELLIGENT DESIGN

See Creationism and Intelligent Design

INTERMEDIATE SCRUTINY TEST IN FREE-SPEECH CASES

The “intermediate scrutiny” test, which has its origins in equal protection jurisprudence, is now widely used to deal with numerous free-speech problems involving government regulation that does not seek to regulate the content or viewpoint of speech, but that may nonetheless have an incidental impact on freedom of expression. The intermediate scrutiny test generally requires that the government regulation be supported by a “substantial” governmental interest and that the regulation be “narrowly tailored” to effectuate that interest. The concept of “narrow tailoring” in the intermediate scrutiny context, however, does not require the rigorous precision of the “strict scrutiny” test. Specifically, when intermediate scrutiny is applied, the government need not use the “least restrictive means” of regulation. This is often confusing because the languages of the two tests are quite similar.

The general intermediate scrutiny standard borrowed from equal protection jurisprudence often gets slightly adjusted when applied to specific free-speech problems. Such adjustments maintain the general “intermediate” level of judicial scrutiny but tailor the test to include factors particularly important to the nature of the problem at hand.

Perhaps the most common variant of intermediate scrutiny in free-speech cases, for example, is the test used to evaluate the constitutionality of content-neutral “time, place, or manner” regulations. Time, place, or manner regulations do not regulate what is said, but merely such matters as when, where, and how loud. The First Amendment allows “reasonable” time, place, or manner regulations. To determine whether time, place, or manner regulations are reasonable, the Supreme Court employs a three-part test. The Supreme Court in Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989), thus held that “the government may impose reasonable restrictions on the time, place, or manner of protected speech, provided the restrictions are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, that they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and that they leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information.”

Genuine time, place, or manner regulations are by definition content neutral. If the regulation at issue is not content neutral, then it is an error for a court to apply the standard of review applicable to content-neutral regulations. Thus, the Supreme Court in Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976), admonished that While a municipality may constitutionally impose reasonable time, place, and manner regulations on the use of its streets and sidewalks for First Amendment purposes ... and may even forbid altogether such use of some of its facilities ... what a municipality may not do under the First and Fourteenth Amendments is to discriminate in the regulation of expression on the basis of the content of that expression.

Another important variant of intermediate scrutiny is the standard employed in United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968). The O'Brien case dealt with content-neutral laws that have, as their “incidental” impact, some demonstrable burden on speech. O'Brien is a “workhorse” case, employed constantly by courts to assess the constitutionality of content-neutral regulations that have an adverse impact on speech. The Court announced the standard in one of the most important passages in the history of First Amendment jurisprudence, stating that “a government regulation is sufficiently justified if it is within the constitutional power of the Government; if it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest; if the governmental interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and if the incidental restriction on alleged First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest.”

RODNEY A. SMOLLA

References and Further Reading

Smolla, Rodney. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech. New York: Thomson/West, 2005, sections 3:1, 8:35; 9:1.
Stone, Geoffrey, Content Regulation and the First Amendment, William and Mary Law Review 25 (1983): 189.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976)
United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989)

INTERNET AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

Since the emergence of the World Wide Web in the early 1990s, the Internet has played an increasingly important role in commerce, politics, and social life.

Within the United States and around the globe, millions of people turn to the Internet each day to transact business, obtain news, conduct research, disseminate information, and otherwise connect with each other. Internet technology continues to develop rapidly, with new applications proliferating in virtually all segments of society. In light of the celerity of technological innovation and the vastly expanding uses for that technology, capturing the various ways in which the Internet implicates civil rights presents a special challenge. Although technological changes will create unforeseen contexts in which new rights claims emerge, some of the most important civil rights claims involving the Internet fall roughly into three categories: speech, privacy, and access.

Speech

The explosive growth in Internet communication over the past decade has sparked a heated debate about regulating the content of cyberspace communication. Many free speech advocates insist that the government must not regulate in any way the substance of Internet communication. In contrast, many legislators argue that the Internet poses special problems involving the proliferation of pornography, hate speech, and commercial advertising, among other concerns, that require governmental intervention. Although the courts have provided limited guidance in a few notable cases, the debate about the level of free speech afforded Internet communication is nowhere close to settled.

Pornography

Some of the earliest and most important speech cases arose out of governmental attempts to regulate pornography on the Internet. In 1996, Congress passed the Communications Decency Act (CDA), which provided criminal penalties for transmission over the Internet of “indecent” or “patently offensive” materials accessible by children. In Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997), a group of civil rights organizations, newspapers, and technology companies argued that the “indecent” and “patently offensive” standards, which the statute defined only by reference to prevailing community values, improperly criminalized potentially nonpornographic speech in violation of the First Amendment. In a unanimous ruling, the Supreme Court struck down the CDA because the statute’s standards were impermissibly vague and potentially covered large amounts of materials possessing legitimate educational or social value (for example, an e-mail regarding birth control information sent by a parent to a child away at college).

In response to the Supreme Court opinion in Reno, less than two years later Congress passed the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), which prohibited the dissemination over the Internet of any material “harmful to minors” as defined by a new set of community-based standards that closely tracked the Supreme Court’s previously articulated test for identifying obscenity. In Ashcroft v. ACLU, civil libertarians and Internet content providers challenged the statute as unduly burdening speech properly protected by the First Amendment. In 2004, following years of litigation, the Supreme Court narrowly upheld the injunction preventing enforcement of COPA because the statute unnecessarily restricted access to protected speech by adults and less restrictive regulatory options were available in any event. While certainly a victory for speech advocates and content providers, the slim five-to-four majority decision made some civil libertarians wary about the approach the Court might take in future Internet speech cases.

Hate Speech

Hate speech provides another important context for the debate about regulation of Internet content. While the Internet serves an enormous array of socially valuable purposes, the technology also facilitates the organization of hate groups and the dissemination of their messages. For many civil libertarians, tolerating hateful speech on the Internet remains necessary in order to ensure the free exchange of ideas generally. For other civil rights groups, such as the Anti-Defamation League (which targets anti-Semitic activity), tolerance of hate speech on the Internet undermines the fundamental goal of social equality.

Although most hate speech finds protection under the First Amendment, some important exceptions exist. For example, in Planned Parenthood v. American Coalition of Life Activists, 290 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2003), abortion providers in Oregon brought suit under the federal Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act (FACE) against anti-abortion activists who disclosed the names and addresses of the providers on an Internet Web site called the “Nuremberg Files.”

With bloody images in the background, the site called for holding the doctors who provided abortions responsible for crimes against humanity. The site also listed the names of doctors who had performed abortions, depicting those who had been murdered with a line through the middle of their names and doctors who had been wounded (but not killed) with their names in gray. Viewers were encouraged to “share your point of view with this ‘doctor.’” In 2002, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the content of the Nuremberg Files constituted a threat of force by calling for the killing of the abortion providers and therefore was not entitled to protection under the First Amendment. Although perhaps circumscribing the reach of the First Amendment in cyberspace, the decision was hailed at least by some civil rights groups as an important step in stemming the spread of hate on the Internet.

Commercial Advertising

Perhaps the most litigated area of Internet communication involves commercial advertising and, in particular, the use of unsolicited bulk e-mails, or “spam,” to sell products and services of every imaginable sort. Recent studies suggest that spam accounts for more than half of all e-mail, with some single advertisers sending hundreds of thousands of spam messages each day. In addition to the increasing annoyance Internet users encounter in sifting through unwanted spam, purported problems include increased risk of consumer fraud, infection by computer viruses, diminished Internet server responsiveness, and the unwanted cost of purchasing spam-blocking computer programs.

In response to public calls to stem the proliferation of spam, more than thirty states have passed some sort of antispam legislation; in 2003, the U.S. Congress passed the Can Spam Act (CSA). The CSA imposes significant restrictions on sending unsolicited commercial e-mail, provides Internet service providers, like America Online, the right to sue for damages resulting from violations of the statute, and calls for the consideration of a “do not e-mail” registry by the Federal Trade Commission. Several lawsuits involving the enforceability and constitutionality of the CSA are working their way through the federal courts. Although the First Amendment provides less protection for commercial speech than for political expression, it remains unclear whether the Can Spam Act will ultimately pass constitutional muster.

There is no doubt that the government can regulate fraudulent or deceitful commercial speech. But some free-speech purists worry that antispam sentiments will provide an unwanted inroad for governmental regulation of truthful expression as well (for example, e-mail from universities to alumni or prospective students). This concern may become especially pronounced if the boundary between commercial and political speech becomes blurry. Thus, while regulation of spam may seem at the outset a wholly commercial concern, the constitutional analysis the courts provide the CSA and other attempts to limit bulk e-mail may affect the level of protection the First Amendment provides for Internet communication generally.

Privacy

In the context of the Internet, the right to privacy focuses on the collection and dissemination of personal information by companies and governmental entities. Anyone who has used an Internet search engine knows that an enormous amount of personal information is available online. With every keystroke and mouse-click, Internet users add to that store of information by creating “clickstream data,” a trail of electronic tracks or markers generated by each visit to a Web page.

That data may include basic information, such as the type of computer an individual used to access the Internet, the browser utilized, and the identification of each site or page visited. In addition, if an individual were to disclose certain information during the visit, the clickstream data may also include more personalized details, such as passwords, e-mail addresses, social security numbers, credit card numbers, addresses, telephone numbers and other demographic or consumer information. Over time, that clickstream data can be used to build incredibly detailed consumer or personal profiles on anyone who surfs the Web. Companies can use that data to send targeted online advertisements specifically tailored to each Internet user’s consumer profile. That detailed information is also obviously valuable to any governmental or investigative body interested in monitoring an individual’s activity or interests.

Moving beyond simple aggregation of clickstream data, new spying technologies continually develop. Generally dubbed “spyware” or “adware,” these innovative monitoring tools typically rely on information-gathering software that is installed clandestinely on a user’s computer. In addition to those technologies, some more malicious covertly installed programs actually harness the host computers to send e-mail or store unwanted information from external sources. Although a significant market in privacy software has developed to stem unwanted data collection, Internet spying technology continues to evolve quickly, with the spying technology seemingly just ahead of attempts to block it.

Many state and federal laws attempt to limit the collection and use of personal data obtained online, but those legislative responses have met with limited success in halting privacy invasions. At the federal level, statutes such as the Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA), the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (CFAA), the Federal Wire Tap Act (wire tap act) and the Children's Online Privacy Protection Act address in some manner the unwanted collection of personal data over the Internet. The incredible speed of innovation in Internet spying technology, however, makes it difficult if not impossible for legislators to keep up with those technological innovations.

For instance, in In reDoubleClick, Inc. Privacy Litigation, 154 F. Supp. 2d 497 (S.D.N.Y. 2001)—one of the most significant decisions regarding privacy and the Internet, a class of Internet users alleged that one of the world's largest online advertisers, DoubleClick, Inc., violated the ECPA, CFAA, and wire tap act by depositing "cookies" (small text files used to collect clickstream data) on the computer hard drives of Internet users. Relying on the precise language of the statutes considered, a federal district court in New York dismissed each of the statutory causes of action as inapplicable to the particular data collection technology at issue. Quite simply, the precise statutory mandates in existing statutes often fail to target the latest methods of electronic monitoring. As a result, by continually developing new spying technologies, those interested in mining personal information over the Internet can often evade the restrictions embedded in the privacy statutes.

In light of challenges legislators face in keeping up with technological change, some scholars and lawyers have suggested turning to common law principles (for example, trespass, conversion, etc.) as a platform for holding companies liable for privacy invasions. Although the malleable nature of the common law makes it easier to apply that legal framework to continually changing spying technologies, the limited causes of action perhaps do not provide the full protection many Internet users desire. While statutes and common law principles might work in tandem to afford the most robust protection of privacy rights in cyberspace, the swiftly evolving architecture of the Internet makes securing those privacy rights especially difficult.

On a final note, many privacy rights activists argue that one particular legislative initiative, the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001, represents a significant threat to online privacy. Passed in response to the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the act expands the government's authority to collect information over the Internet, among other powers, as part of an overall effort to combat terrorism. In contrast to other federal statutes that attempt to protect online privacy interests, the PATRIOT Act favors increased collective security over personal privacy rights. The legislative debate surrounding an extension of the act's provisions underscores the precarious position of privacy rights on the Internet. While many Internet users desire greater privacy safeguards, governmental security concerns and corporate interests may align against robust privacy protection. In the end, the debate about the proper scope of online privacy remains heated; the courts have yet to weigh in on some of the most pressing matters.

Access

While it might seem odd to discuss access to the Internet in the context of civil rights, the increasing importance of Internet communication in economic, political, and social life makes access a true rights concern. Within the United States and in the international arena, scholars describe a "digital divide" that separates those who have access to the Internet and those who do not.

Undercurrents of race, class and gender inequality make the digital divide especially problematic. For instance, within the United States, a U.S. Department of Commerce study estimated that in 2000 the number of African Americans and Hispanics who had access to the Internet fell almost 18 percent below the national average (an even greater disparity than measured two years earlier). Regarding economic class, the same study reported the access rate for people in households with income ranging between $25,000 and $35,000 was less than half the rate for people in households with income over $75,000.

Similarly, access rates for people in rural areas fell far behind those in urban areas. With respect to gender, access concerns often take a different tack, focusing on the disproportionate prevalence of males in creating the structure and content of Internet communication. On the international front, the problems of access become incredibly magnified, with Internet communication available only to the most privileged individuals in some developing countries.

Thus, involving domestic and international components, the debate over access raises basic equality concerns. Couched in that way, the "digital divide" simply provides a new context for presenting some traditional equal rights claims involving race, class, and gender. Although the impact of the digital divide occupies significant scholarly debate, rights of access are only beginning to garner the attention of courts and legislatures in the United States and around the world.

MICHAEL R. SIEBECKER

References and Further Reading

- Celli, Andrew G., Jr., and Drifach, Kenneth M., Postcards From the Edge: Surveying the Digital Divide, Cardozo Arts and Entertainment Law Journal 20 (2002): 53–71.
- Finkelman, Paul, Picture Perfect: The First Amendment Trumps Congress in Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, Tulsa Law Review 38 (2002): 243–61.
- Fishman, Clifford S., Technology and the Internet: The Impending Destruction of Privacy by Betrayers, Grudgers, Snoops, Spammers, Corporations, and the Media, George Washington Law Review 72 (2004): 1503–1556.
- Isenberg, Doug, The GigaLaw Guide to Internet Law. New York: Random House, 2002.
- Lessig, Lawrence. Code, and Other Laws of Cyberspace. Basic Books, 1999.
- Li, Joyce H.-S. The Center for Democracy and Technology and Internet Privacy in the U.S.: Lessons of the Last Five Years. Oxford: The Scarecrow Press, Inc., 2003.
- Siebecker, Michael R., Cookies and the Common Law: Are Internet Advertisers Trespassing on Our Computers? Southern California Law Review 76(4) (2003): 893–952.
- Volokh, Eugene, Freedom of Speech and Information Privacy: The Troubling Implications of a Right to Stop People From Speaking About You, Stanford Law Review 52 (2000): 1049–1124.
- Wilhelm, Anthony G. Digital Nation: Toward an Inclusive Information Society. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ashcroft v. ACLU*, 542 U.S. 656 (2004)
- In re DoubleClick, Inc. Privacy Litigation*, 154 F. Supp. 2d 497 (S.D.N.Y. 2001)
- Planned Parenthood v. American Coalition of Life Activists*, 290 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2003)
- Reno v. ACLU*, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)
- Can Spam Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 7701-13 (2003)
- Child Online Protection Act, 47 U.S.C. § 231 (1998)
- Children's Online Privacy Protection Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 6501 et seq. (1998)
- Communications Decency Act, 47 U.S.C. §§ 230, 560-61 (1996)
- Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1030 (2000)
- Electronic Communications Privacy Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2701-11 (2000)
- Federal Wire Tap Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2511-22 (2000)
- Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act, 18 U.S.C. § 248 (2000)
- USA PATRIOT Act, Pub. L. No. 107-56, 115 Stat. 272 (2001)
- See also Commercial Speech; Communications Decency Act (1996); Free Speech and Free Press: The Modern Period (1917–Present); Hate Speech; Reno v. ACLU*, 521 U.S. 844 (1997); Right of Privacy

INTERNET AND INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY

Digital home computing and the Internet have brought about a crisis in intellectual property law by raising new issues and multiplying the possibilities for infringement of intellectual property rights. Copyright law is particularly affected, but computers and the Internet also raise trademark, patent, and trade secret issues.

Copyright

Digital computers make it possible to make multiple copies of creative works, including books, music, and movies, in very little time, with no loss of quality. The Internet enables copiers to share these copies with millions of users worldwide. Problems arise, however, when the shared works are protected by copyright.

Recent additions to the U.S. copyright code addressing digital copying include the No Electronic Theft Act, which allows the government to prosecute those who sell copies of copyrighted material and also those who give copies away, and the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA), which prohibits the circumvention of copy-protection measures and provides safe harbors protecting Internet service providers (ISPs) from liability for copyright infringement by their users.

When an unauthorized person reproduces, distributes, publicly displays or performs, or prepares a derivative work, the copyright is infringed unless an exception applies. Infringement may be direct, contributory, or vicarious. In an Internet context, applicable exceptions may include the right to make backup copies, fair use, the first sale doctrine, and the four DMCA safe harbors for ISPs.

Backup copies: While ordinarily the purchaser of a copyrighted work has the right to make a backup copy, Title I of the DMCA has the practical effect of prohibiting the making of digital backup copies of copy-protected recordings.

Fair use: Copying a copyrighted work “for purposes such as criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching, scholarship, or research” is permissible if the use is fair. Fairness is determined by examining four factors: “(1) the purpose and character of the use, including whether such use is of a commercial nature or is for nonprofit educational purposes; (2) the nature of the copyrighted work; (3) the amount and substantiality of the portion used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole; and (4) the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the copyrighted work” (17 U.S.C. § 107).

Copying a music recording one has purchased on to one's computer for personal listening is fair use, but copying music for large numbers of anonymous individuals to access over the Internet is not (Napster, 239 F.3d 1004). Copying a movie one has purchased for personal use might be fair use, but if the copying required the circumvention of copy-protection technology, it would still be prohibited under the DMCA (17 U.S.C. § 1201).

First sale doctrine: The copyright holder's control over a lawful copy of the work is limited to its first sale; the purchaser or recipient may dispose of that lawful copy as he or she wishes (17 U.S.C. § 109). The first sale doctrine does not create a right to make copies of the work and does not include the right to display the copy somewhere other than the place where it is located, such as by posting it on the Internet.

ISP safe harbors: Title II of the DMCA protects ISPs from liability for copyright infringement for material passing through their servers if certain requirements are met. There are safe harbors for ISPs for transitory communications, system caching, storage of information on systems or networks at the direction of users, and information location tools (17 U.S.C. § 512). Without these safe harbors, ISPs would be unable to function; policing all content transmitted over, cached on, stored on, or located via a network would be prohibitively time-consuming and expensive. ISPs may be required to remove or block copyright-infringing content once the copyright owner complies with certain notice procedures.

Contributory and vicarious infringement: Third parties may be liable for copyright infringement by others through contributory or vicarious liability. Both require underlying direct infringement by another. Contributory infringement also requires actual or constructive knowledge of the violation and a material contribution to the direct infringer's activities (Fonovisa, 76 F.3d 259). Vicarious infringement requires the vicarious infringer to have the right and ability to control the direct infringer's actions and to receive a direct financial benefit from the infringing activity (Fonovisa, 76 F.3d 259).

Copyright infringement has been perhaps the most contested battlefield in Internet law. The 1997 No Electronic Theft Act targets direct infringers such as warez traders (who copy and share copyrighted software); some critics claim that a subgroup of warez traders, those who trade in abandonware (software no longer sold, distributed or supported by the copyright owner), actually perform a useful social function by keeping alive programs that might otherwise be lost forever.

The most visible struggle is over peer-to-peer (P2P) file-sharing networks, which allow users to exchange files, including copyrighted music, movies, photographs, programs, and books, with large numbers of other users. File-sharing technology has evolved in direct response to the law. After the content industry's victory against MP3.com (92 F.Supp.2d 349), the model of a centralized site storing copies for download was abandoned in favor of Napster's model, in which files were stored on users' computers and the central site maintained only a directory of files and search tools.

This model, it turned out, also gave rise to third-party liability for copyright infringement (239 F.3d 1004), so two new models were adopted. In virtual private network (VPN)-based systems, encryption kept the content of the traded files secret from all except the sender and the recipient; a VPN-based system, Aimster, was nonetheless found to give rise to third-party liability. (334 F.3d 643). Second, super-node-based systems place the directory, files, and search tools on the users' computers; there is no central site. This technology powers KaZaA, Grokster, and other popular P2P systems. It survived court challenges in the Netherlands, but in June 2005, the U.S. Supreme Court held that it could give rise to third-party liability under U.S. copyright law, provided the other requirements were met (125 S.Ct. 2764). Further legal battles over file-sharing seem likely.

Trademark

The Internet can assist in traditional forms of trademark infringement (such as the sale of fake Rolex watches), as anyone with an e-mail account knows. It also gives rise to a new form of trademark infringement: the use of trademarks to alter search-engine results. Some search engines (but not Google) use Web site metatags in the search process. These metatags are invisible to most users, but visible to the search engines. Using a competitor's name in a meta-tag may divert traffic from the competitor's site. At the same time, provisions must be made for fair use: for example, it would be difficult for a Volkswagen repair shop to explain its business without using the word "Volkswagen." The Ninth Circuit explained in Playboy Enterprises, Inc. v. Welles, 279 F.3d 796 (9th Cir. 2002), that use of a trademarked term is permissible as a nominative fair use if three conditions are met:

First, the product or service in question must be one not readily identifiable without use of the trademark; second, only so much of the mark or marks may be used as is reasonably necessary to identify the product or service; and third, the user must do nothing that would, in conjunction with the mark, suggest sponsorship or endorsement by the trademark holder (279 F.3d at 801).

Trademark issues also arise when one user registers a domain name that includes or closely resembles a mark. Sometimes this occurs innocently; sometimes it is “cybersquatting”—done deliberately to inconvenience or extort money from the mark holder. The Anti-Cybersquatting Consumer Protection Act provides a test for distinguishing between the two and provides remedies for cybersquatting.

Other Issues

Some controversy has arisen over the granting of “business method patents” for, among other things, Amazon.com’s “one-click” ordering system. Patents of this sort, however, are authorized by the federal circuit’s decision in State Street Bank & Trust v. Signature Financial Group, Inc., 149 F.3d 1368, Fed. Cir. 1999, and arguably required under TRIPs, the World Trade Organization’s intellectual property agreement.

The Internet also provides a cheap, quick, and often untraceable means of destroying a trade secret. As cases like Religious Technology Center v. Lerma, 908 F. Supp. 1362 (E.D. Va. 1995), have shown, making a trade secret available online, at least for a few days, is probably enough to deprive the secret of further protection under the Economic Espionage Act or the Uniform Trade Secrets Act.

AARON SCHWABACH

References and Further Reading

- “A Fine Balance: How Much Copyright Protection Does the Internet Need?” Economist Technology Quarterly (Jan. 25, 2003): 12.
- Efroni, Zohar, A Guidebook to Cybersquatting Litigation: The Practical Approach in a Post-Barcelona.com World, University of Illinois Journal of Law, Technology and Policy (2003): 457.
- Goldman, Eric, A Road to No Warez: The No Electronic Theft Act and Criminal Copyright Infringement, Oregon Law Review 82 (2003): 369.
- Leaffer, Marshall. Understanding Copyright Law, 3rd ed. New York: Matthew Bender, 1999.
- Lessig, Lawrence. Free Culture: How Big Media Uses Technology and the Law to Lock Down Culture and Control Creativity. New York: Penguin, 2004.
- Litman, Jessica. Digital Copyright: Protecting Intellectual Property on the Internet. Amherst, NY: Prometheus, 2000.
- McCarthy, J. Thomas et al. McCarthy’s Desk Encyclopedia of Intellectual Property, 3rd ed. Washington, D.C.: Bureau of National Affairs, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- A&M Records, Inc. v. Napster, Inc.*, 239 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2001)
- Amazon.com, Inc. v. Barnesandnoble.com, Inc.*, 239 F.3d 1343 (Fed. Cir. 2001)
- Fonovisa, Inc. v. Cherry Auction, Inc.*, 76 F.3d 259 (9th Cir. 1996)
- In re Aimster Copyright Litigation (Aimster II)*, 252 F. Supp.2d 634 (N.D. Ill. 2002); affirmed in part, 334 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2003); certiorari denied sub nom Deep v. Recording Industry Ass’n of America, Inc., 124 S.Ct. 1069 2004
- MGM Studios, Inc. v. Grokster, Ltd.*, 259 F.Supp.2d 1029 (C.D. Cal. 2003), affirmed, 380 F.3d 1154 (2004); reversed, 125 S.Ct. 2764 2005
- Playboy Enterprises, Inc. v. Welles*, 279 F.3d 796 (9th Cir. 2002)
- Recording Industry Association of America v. Diamond Multimedia Systems, Inc.*, 180 F.3d 1072 (9th Cir. 1999)
- Recording Industry Association of America, Inc. v. Verizon Internet Services*, 240 F.Supp.2d 24 (D.D.C. 2003); reversed, 351 F.3d 1229 (D.C. Cir. 2003); certiorari denied, 125 S.Ct. 309 and 125 S.Ct 347 2004
- Religious Technology Center v. Lerma*, 908 F. Supp. 1362 (E.D. Va. 1995)
- Religious Technology Center v. Netcom On-Line Communication Services, Inc.*, 907 F.Supp. 1361 (N.D. Cal. 1995)
- Sony Corp. of America v. Universal City Studios, Inc.*, 464 U.S. 417 1984
- State Street Bank & Trust v. Signature Financial Group, Inc.*, 149 F.3d 1368 (Fed. Cir. 1999)
- UMG Recordings, Inc., v. MP3.com, Inc.*, 92 F.Supp.2d 349 (S.D.N.Y. 2000)
- Anti-Cybersquatting Consumer Protection Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(d)
- Copyright Act of 1976, 17 U.S.C. §§ 101-1332
- Digital Millennium Copyright Act, 16 U.S.C. § 512, 1201-04
- Economic Espionage Act of 1996, 18 U.S.C. § 1831 et seq.
- Lanham Trademark Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1052, 1058, 1059, 1125-1127
- No Electronic Theft Act, 17 U.S.C. §§ 101, 506-07
- Patent Code, 35 U.S.C. §§ 1-376
- National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, Uniform Trade Secrets Act, as amended 1985, available at <http://nsi.org/Library/Espionage/usta.htm> (visited November 16, 2004)
- Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPs), Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization, Annex 1C, Apr. 15, 1994, 33 I.L.M. 81 (1994)

See also Copyright Law and Free Exercise; Intellectual Property and the First Amendment; Internet Filtering at Libraries and Free Speech

INTERNET FILTERING AT LIBRARIES AND FREE SPEECH

The Internet provides instant access to content located on servers all over the world. Some of that content is pornographic; some of it is obscene or otherwise illegal in the United States. As the Supreme Court recently observed in Ashcroft v. ACLU, 542 U.S. 656 (2004), blocking and filtering offensive and illegal content may be more effective than attempting to control such content at the supply end.

While the First Amendment protects the right of adults to access offensive but not illegal content, there has been concern over the ease with which the Internet makes pornographic content available to minors. Attempts to control this problem on the supply side, by regulating the providers of Internet content, ran into two problems: The First Amendment limits Congress's authority to regulate content providers within the United States, and Congress lacks authority to regulate content providers outside the United States. In 1998, Congress addressed the problem from the demand side by enacting the Children's Internet Protection Act (CIPA).

CIPA provides discounts of up to 90 percent on Internet access for qualifying schools and libraries under the federally funded e-rate or school and libraries discount, provided that those schools and libraries install filtering and blocking software. Administrators of institutions receiving subsidized Internet access must certify that the school or library

- (1) is enforcing a policy of Internet safety for minors that includes monitoring the online activities of minors and the operation of a technology protection measure with respect to any of its computers with Internet access that protects against access through such computers to visual depictions that are
 - a. obscene
 - b. child pornography
 - c. harmful to minors
- (2) is enforcing the operation of such technology protection measure during any use of such computers by minors (47 U.S.C. § 254(h)(5)(B))

A similar but less restrictive provision applies to adults: the school or library must make an identical certification, except that item III (protection against material harmful to minors) is not required. In addition, a school or library administrator or authorized person "may disable the technology protection measure concerned, during use by an adult, to enable access for bona fide research or other lawful purpose" (47 U.S.C. § 254(h)(5)(D)).

In order to carry out their obligations under CIPA, institutions receiving discounted Internet access are required to purchase and install "technology protection measures" (filtering programs) to filter or block Internet access to specified "visual depictions." Each institution is also required to hold a minimum of one public meeting on Internet safety policies to gather input and feedback from community members. This requirement of one meeting was perhaps inspired by the "community standards" element of the Miller test for obscenity (413 U.S. 24).

Neither obscenity nor child pornography is protected by the First Amendment, but defining material "harmful to minors" in constitutionally permissible terms has always posed a problem. In CIPA Congress defined the term as including:

any picture, image, graphic image file, or other visual depiction that

1. taken as a whole and with respect to minors, appeals to a prurient interest in nudity, sex, or excretion
2. depicts, describes, or represents, in a patently offensive way with respect to what is suitable for minors, an actual or simulated sexual act or sexual contact, actual or simulated normal or perverted sexual acts, or a lewd exhibition of the genitals
3. taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value as to minors (47 U.S.C. § 254(h)(5)(G))

CIPA also includes a subtitle, the Neighborhood Children's Internet Protection Act, requiring schools and libraries to adopt policies addressing areas such as minors' access to inappropriate matter on the Web; their safety when using e-mail, chat rooms, and other direct electronic communications (such as instant messaging); and hacking. In keeping with the "community standards" element, the term "inappropriate for minors" is to be determined by a "school board, local educational agency, library, or other authority," rather than by an "agency or instrumentality of the United States Government." These locally adopted policies are not subject to review by these federal agencies or instrumentalities (47 U.S.C. § 254(l)).

CIPA's potential for conflict with First Amendment rights led plaintiffs including the American Library Association to bring suit to enjoin its enforcement, at least as far as libraries and their adult patrons were concerned. With regard to libraries, the plaintiffs argued that CIPA required the imposition of content based restrictions on library patrons' access to constitutionally protected speech. Although patrons could request the unblocking of access to blocked content, placing the burden on the library patron to make the potentially embarrassing request was likely to discourage many patrons from doing so. Also, filtering and blocking programs, inevitably imperfect, would block some content that Congress intended to permit while failing to block some content that Congress intended to restrict. The plaintiffs also argued that CIPA was an impermissible use of the spending power.

The district court issued the injunction requested by the plaintiffs (201 F. Supp.2d 401), and the case was appealed directly to the Supreme Court, which reversed the decision in June 2003. A four-justice plurality, with two justices concurring in the result, stated that CIPA neither violated the First Amendment nor attached an impermissible condition to Congressional exercise of the spending power.

Chief Justice Rehnquist, writing for the plurality, pointed out that “a public library does not acquire Internet terminals in order to create a public forum for Web publishers to express themselves, any more than it collects books in order to provide a public forum for the authors of books to speak” (539 U.S. at 206). Most libraries, he continued, choose not to acquire pornographic books, and this decision is not subject to heightened scrutiny. “[B]ecause of the vast quantity of material on the Internet and the rapid pace at which it changes, libraries cannot possibly segregate, item by item, all the Internet material that is appropriate for inclusion from all that is not.” The use of software to exclude certain categories of content, Rehnquist stated, “is entirely reasonable” (539 U.S. at 208). The concurring justices also found the statute’s provision for unblocking at an adult patron’s request necessary and constitutionally adequate (539 U.S. at 214, 219-20).

AARON SCHWABACH

References and Further Reading

- Kolbert, Kathryn, and Zak Mettger, eds. Justice Talking: Censoring the Web: Leading Advocates Debate Today's Most Controversial Issues. New York: The New Press, 2002.
- Lessig, Lawrence. Code and Other Laws of Cyberspace. New York: Basic Books, 1999.
- . The Future of Ideas. New York: Random House, 2001.
- Saunders, Kevin W. Saving Our Children from the First Amendment. New York: New York University Press, 2004.
- Schachter, Madeleine. Law of Internet Speech, 2nd ed. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- American Library Association v. United States*, 201 F. Supp.2d 401 (E.D. Pa. 2002); reversed sub nom United States v. American Library Association, Inc., 539 U.S. 194 (2003)
- Miller v. California*, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
- Child Online Protection Act, 47 U.S.C. § 231
- Children’s Internet Protection Act, 47 U.S.C. § 254(h)

See also Children and the First Amendment; Miller Test; Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973); Obscenity; State Action Doctrine

INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Article I, Section 8 of the U.S. Constitution grants Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce. When most people think about the commerce clause, they imagine Congress passing laws regulating the buying and selling of goods. However, many people are surprised to find out that Congress also has used the interstate commerce clause to promote civil rights and civil liberties. In fact, Congress used its power to regulate interstate commerce when it passed Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964—one of Congress’s most important pieces of civil rights legislation. Thus, the Constitution’s interstate commerce clause has been instrumental in safeguarding the civil rights and civil liberties of American citizens.

Congress first attempted to eliminate discrimination in public inns and places of public entertainment in the Civil Rights Act of 1875. However, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in the Civil Rights Cases of 1883 that the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution only applied to “state action.” In other words, the Fourteenth Amendment only prohibited discrimination by the state and did not prohibit discrimination by private individuals. Consequently, this case determined that Congress could not pass laws under the Fourteenth Amendment that would prohibit discrimination in privately owned public accommodations.

Despite the ruling in the Civil Rights Cases, some private business owners freely chose not to discriminate against African Americans in their businesses. Nevertheless, in the mid-twentieth century, there still were a significant number of businesses, particularly in the South, who chose to deny access to African Americans. Other businesses chose to segregate their facilities. In an effort to correct these forms of racial discrimination, civil rights activists challenged these discriminatory policies in the courts in the 1950s and 1960s; however, the 1883 ruling in the Civil Rights Cases hindered any legal success. In Peterson v. Greenville, 373 U.S. 244 (1963), Chief Justice Warren reiterated that the Supreme Court was limited by the “state action” doctrine established in the Civil Rights Cases, and thus the Fourteenth Amendment did not prohibit private businesses from discriminating against African Americans.

This put Congress in a bind. It wanted to end racial segregation in private accommodations, but the Supreme Court made it clear that Congress could not base its authority to create such laws under the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, Congress decided to anchor its authority to make this type of legislation in its power to regulate interstate commerce. Since the creation of the Constitution, Congress's powers under the interstate commerce clause had expanded significantly.

Over the years, the Supreme Court ruled that Congress could do more than regulate the buying and selling of goods. For instance, in the nineteenth century, the Court ruled that Congress had the authority to regulate the navigation and transportation of goods. In the mid-twentieth century, the Court ruled that Congress had the authority to regulate the manufacturing and production of goods as well as regulate any actions that had a "direct and substantial effect" on the interstate flow of goods and people or an impact on the national economy. Likewise, the Supreme Court asserted that Congress had "national police powers," which gave it the authority to pass any legislation that promoted the health, safety, morality, or general welfare of the nation.

Because Congress's power to regulate interstate commerce had expanded, many members of Congress believed that they could eliminate racial discrimination in public accommodations using their authority to regulate interstate commerce. After all, many members of Congress believed that excluding African Americans had a "direct and substantial" impact on the national economy. Moreover, racial discrimination was a moral wrong that "national police powers" would give Congress power to correct. Using this logic, Congress passed Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibited racial discrimination and segregation in hotels, motels, restaurants, bars, barbershops, gasoline stations, places of entertainment, and all other forms of public accommodation.

Congress's authority to pass Title II of this act was challenged in the cases of Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241 (1964), and Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294 (1964). Both of these cases, however, affirmed Congress's power. In these companion cases, the Supreme Court pointed out that Congress had evidence that racial discrimination placed burdens on interstate commerce. For instance, African Americans encountered difficulties when traveling because discriminatory policies often kept them from finding hotels in which they could stay and restaurants in which they could eat. Consequently, African Americans were restricted in their right to travel, since people cannot travel if they cannot find a place to stay or eat. The Court also explained that when African Americans are restricted in their travels, this has a negative impact on the nation's economy, since fewer goods and services are purchased. Furthermore, the Court agreed that Congress could regulate interstate commerce and intrastate activities that had an impact on commerce, since Congress had the authority to legislate moral wrongs under its "national police power."

With the Supreme Court's approval of Congress's authority to pass Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Congress continued to use its powers for regulating interstate commerce to pass other legislation promoting civil rights and civil liberties. However, the constitutionality of some of these laws was challenged in the late twentieth century.

For instance, in United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995), the Supreme Court ruled that Congress exceeded its powers under the commerce clause when it passed a law making it illegal to possess a firearm in a school zone. Similarly, in United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000), the Court decided that Congress exceeded its commerce clause power when it passed the Violence Against Women Act, which gave female victims a right to seek a federal remedy for civil rights violations. In both of these cases, the Supreme Court found that these laws were criminal statutes that did not have any economic enterprise. Despite these recent rulings, the interstate commerce clause has been and continues to be an important tool for Congress in the protection of civil rights and civil liberties.

FRANCENE M. ENGEL

References and Further Reading

Cortner, Richard C. Civil Rights and Public Accommodations: The Heart of Atlanta Motel and McClung Cases. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241 (1964)
Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294 (1964)
Peterson v. Greenville, 373 U.S. 244 (1963)
United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995)
United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000)

INTRUSION

Intrusion is one of four privacy torts. The Second Restatement of Torts describes intrusion as entering upon the solitude of another of a kind that would be highly offensive to a reasonable person. It is the right "to be left alone." Not all jurisdictions recognize intrusion as a basis for recovery in tort.

The invasion for purposes of intrusion may be physical; intrusion may be analogous to trespass. It may include acts such as eavesdropping—that is, prying or snooping by hidden microphone—or peering into residential windows.

INTRUSION

Intrusion must concern private affairs of the plaintiff's. No liability exists for matters of a public nature, such as photographing people in public; however, publicity is not required. Additionally, intrusion must be intentional and the interference must be highly offensive; it need not be clandestine.

There are two views of intrusion. Under the first (see Nader v. General Motors Corp., 25 N.Y. 2d 560, 1970), intrusion covers activities that have as their end the gathering of confidential information such as opening a plaintiff's mail. Under the second view found in the First Restatement of Torts, intrusion is more expansive. Plaintiffs are protected from repeated acts of surveillance, eavesdropping, and persistent phone calls. Overzealous (or “rough”) shadowing can cross the line into intrusion.

Intrusion cases have resulted from violation of statutes. Federally, Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Street Act of 1968 prohibits intentional interception of wire or oral communications. Violators may be subject to criminal and civil actions. Some courts provide common-law protection of the same communications.

CAROL A. OLSON

References and Further Reading

- LaMarca, George A., Overintrusive Surveillance of Plaintiffs in Personal Injury Cases, American Journal of Trial Advocacy 9 (1985): 1–20.
- Logan, David, Masked Media: Judges, Juries, and the Law of Surreptitious Newsgathering, Iowa Law Review 83 (1997): 161.
- Restatement of the Law, Second of Torts*, 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: American Law Institute Publishers, 1965.
- Speiser, Stewart M. Lawsuit. New York: Horizon Books, 1980.
- Warren, Samuel D., and Brandeis, Lewis D., The Right to Privacy, Harvard Law Review 4 (1890): 193.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Nader v. General Motors Corp.*, 25 N.Y. 2d 560 (1970)
- Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Street Act of 1968, 42 U.S.C. § 2510–2520

See also Privacy

INVASION OF PRIVACY AND FREE SPEECH

It is generally understood that the constitutional right of privacy has two components: decisional privacy, illustrated by the abortion cases, and “information privacy”—namely, the capacity of each person to control certain types of information about himself or herself. Many of the decisions addressing the constitutional dimensions of privacy and free speech concern information privacy. A third type of privacy interest—the interest in tranquility and repose, sometimes described as the “right to be left alone”—has also figured in a number of cases presenting conflicts between speech interests and privacy.

At one level, it makes perfect sense that one's right to speak freely about all First Amendment matters might run up against another's interest in protecting personal information from disclosure. Indeed, addressing this tension between speech and privacy has proven to be an important focus of Supreme Court jurisprudence and will be discussed here.

Yet, a right of privacy is undoubtedly central to any meaningful conception of a right of speech. Consider that in order for most people to speak with confidence, they must have space and time to reflect out of the public eye. If one's thoughts, writings, or intimate communications were unprotected from prying eyes and ears, it would be most difficult to develop coherent ideas.

Moreover, consider the constitutional freedom of assembly. Suppose state officials secretly recorded all meetings of the “Organizing Committee to Replace the Government.” If permitted, such unwarranted intrusions into private spaces—spaces necessary for peaceful organizing—would undermine the capacity of citizens to associate and to express themselves effectively against government repression.

A case arising out of the civil rights movement vividly illustrates the close connection between privacy and associational rights. In NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958), a state government vehemently opposed to desegregation demanded the membership lists of the local NAACP. The organization refused, fearing the government would harass its members. The Supreme Court held that Alabama could not obtain the lists without first demonstrating a compelling reason, such as criminal behavior, but the state could not.

Nonetheless, sometimes privacy interests collide with First Amendment speech claims. Recall that one of the rationales undergirding the right of free speech is that it protects the search for truth. Does the Constitution therefore protect truthful publication of information lawfully obtained, even when publishing that information invades someone's privacy? This question has provoked much debate.

For example, many states allow individuals to sue those who publicly portray them in a “false light”—false but not defamatory assertions that invades an individual's privacy. When the portrayed events are “newsworthy” on matters of public concern, such as crimes or public events or about “public figures,” claimants alleging invasion of privacy must meet a higher standard of proof than mere negligence: generally, that the false statements were made deliberately or recklessly.

Conflicts between privacy and speech interests have also arisen in the context of statutes prohibiting publishing rape victims’ names. Although recognizing the important interest in shielding rape victims from shame or public exposure, the Supreme Court has not allowed states to punish for the publication of victim names when the names have appeared in public records. One case involved identification of the victim’s name in transcripts of court proceedings; another involved careless posting of the victim’s name on a bulletin board accessible by reporters. In each instance, the Court held that the state could not punish subsequent publication of the victim’s name.

The Court has taken a somewhat different approach to state efforts to protect the kind of privacy defined as tranquility or repose against free speech challenges. When municipalities have sought to protect residential “privacy” by banning all solicitation, marches, or literature distribution, the Court has held that the interests in free communication forbid outright bans. Yet, cities may enact limited protections for residential privacy. For example, sound trucks carrying booming amplifiers may be prohibited in residential communities in order to shield residents from noise intrusions.

In attempting to balance abortion protesters’ rights to march through residential areas against the privacy interests of residents, the Court has allowed municipalities to forbid picketing “targeted” at specific residences, but not to ban residential picketing altogether.

Furthermore, when lower courts enter injunctions to protect patient access to abortion facilities, the injunction may be framed to protect the tranquility of the patients. Judicial efforts to balance the competing claims of patient tranquility vs. speech interests have led to injunctions protecting only against yelling or amplified noise near abortion clinics during clinic hours, but not signs, since patient windows may be screened.

The limited recognition of an individual’s interest in tranquility has also arisen under the guise of a related doctrine, the “captive audience.” The idea is that, generally, people who do not want to be exposed to objectionable communications should be able to shield themselves from repeated intrusions. As long as the communications occur in public spaces, the speech interest generally prevails since individuals can typically avoid exposure.

However, no speaker has a right to force others to listen to his message. This rationale explains the Rowan case, which upheld the right of citizens who objected to offensive mailings to ask the Postal Service to order the mailer to remove their names from future solicitations. Other courts have upheld statutes that forbid telemarketers from calling once they have been individually told not to. Although marketers have challenged the constitutionality of “do not call lists”—in which those who do not wish to be contacted by telephone solicitors may list their phone numbers on a general registry—such restrictions will likely be upheld since they protect residential and consumer privacy.

In sum, the complex interplay of different conceptions of privacy and free speech forestalls formulaic descriptions of how these cases will be resolved. Privacy is central to a coherent approach to freedom of speech, yet often one person’s interest in keeping personal information private or being free of intrusive communications conflicts with others’ interest in unfettered speech. With increasingly sophisticated surveillance technologies, these latter conflicts will undoubtedly continue to proliferate.

JOHN T. NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

- Prosser, William L., Privacy, California Law Review 48 (1960): 383.
 Singleton, Solveig, Privacy Versus the First Amendment: A Skeptical Approach, Fordham Intellectual Property, Media & Entertainment Law Journal 11 (2000): 97–153.
 Stahl, Matthew, False Light Invasion of Privacy in Docudramas: The Oxymoron Which Must Be Solved, Akron Law Review 35 (2002): 251.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cox Broadcasting v. Cohn*, 420 U.S. 469 (1975)
Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524 (1989)
Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Madsen v. Women’s Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994)
Mainstream Mktg. Servs. v. FTC, 358 F.3d (1228) (10th Cir. 2004)
Martin v. Struthers, 319 U.S. 141 (1943)
NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
Nat’l Fed’n of the Blind v. FTC, 420 F.3d 331 (4th Cir. 2005)
NY Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Rowan v. United States, 397 U.S. 728 (1970)
Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147 (1939)
Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967)

See also Abortion; Abortion Protest Cases; Captive Audiences and Free Speech; Compelling State Interest; Defamation and Free Speech; False Light Invasion of Privacy; Intellectual Influences on Free Speech Law; Intrusion; Matters of Public Concern Standard in Free Speech Cases; NAACP v. Alabama Ex Rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958); National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); Picketing; Public Figures; Public Forum Doctrines; Rowan v. United States Post Office Department, No. 399, 397 U.S. 728 (1970); Time, Place, and Manner Rule

INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION

Invidious discrimination refers to the arbitrarily different treatment of a class of persons by the government. Discrimination is said to be invidious if the law's classification does not rest on a reasonable and just relation to its aims, whatever those aims may be. Discrimination animated solely by bias or prejudice is invidious.

Though the principle of equal protection of law stands as a constitutional commitment to the like treatment by the government of all similarly situated persons, it does not render every legislative classification invalid. Indeed, nearly every law discriminates in some way by differentiating on its face or in its effect between similarly situated persons—between those who will benefit from the law and those who will be burdened by it. As interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court, however, equal protection forbids only invidious discrimination.

For example, the court has treated as presumptively invidious legislative classifications that disfavor individuals who may be identified by their race or national origin or that undermine the ability of individuals to exercise a fundamental right, such as the right to vote. Experience has shown that these classifications often flow from a desire by the majority to disadvantage a discrete group of persons. Accordingly, these classifications can be justified only by a demonstration of a compelling state interest and only if the means to achieve the government's ends are no broader than necessary.

LAWRENCE FRIEDMAN

References and Further Reading

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation Press, 1988, pp. 1465–1473.

See also Antidiscrimination Laws; Compelling State Interest; Equal Protection of Law (XIV)

J

JACKSON V. DENNO, 378 U.S. 368 (1964)

The United States Supreme Court was asked to determine whether it was proper for a jury to decide, along with guilt or innocence, whether a confession to a crime was voluntary. Reversing the court below with an opinion authored by Justice Byron White, the Court held that it was impermissible to leave the voluntariness of a confession to be determined in the first instance by a jury and that due process is satisfied by the so called “orthodox rule,” which provides that the trial judge solely determines the voluntariness of the confession. The Court also determined that a jury need not decide on the voluntariness of a confession once a trial judge had decided that the confession was, in fact, voluntary and thus admissible.

The Court found it doubtful that a jury could fully appreciate the values served by the exclusion of involuntary confessions and to ignore the content of a confession no matter what was determined with regard to its voluntariness. Because there was only a general verdict of guilt, it was impossible to determine whether the jury had focused on the issue of voluntariness and then either had found the confession voluntary and considered it on the question of guilt or had found it involuntary, disregarded it, and reached a guilty verdict on independent evidence.

The Fifth and the Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution prohibit the use of confessions obtained through unlawful coercion. Although it is often argued that the “ends will justify the means,” the foundation of life and liberty could be endangered if undue coercion is used to convict those thought to be criminals even more so from the actual criminals themselves.

ROBERT DON GIFFORD

JACKSON V. INDIANA, 406 U.S. 715 (1972)

In Jackson v. Indiana, the United States Supreme Court held that the state may confine a criminal defendant found incompetent to stand trial only for that period reasonably necessary to restore him to competency or to determine that he is not restorable. If it is determined that the person is not restorable, the Court held that he must either be civilly committed (which generally will mean transfer from a criminal forensic hospital to a low-security civil hospital) or released. Because Jackson, a person who was both deaf-mute and mentally retarded, had been hospitalized as incompetent for more than three years on charges of petty theft and was not likely to be restored to competence, the Court ordered his release. Jackson stands for the very important proposition, based on the due process clause, that the nature and duration of confinement must bear “some reasonable relation” to its purpose. Unfortunately, most states have paid no attention to Jackson. Although restoration of competency or a determination of unrestorability should virtually always be possible within six months, defendants found incompetent are routinely confined for much longer periods, especially if their charges are serious. Yet challenges to this practice are rare, despite the willingness of state doctors (who are anxious to free up beds) to bolster them. The states' blatant violation of Jackson is a situation begging for civil rights litigation.

CHRISTOPHER SLOBOGIN

References and Further Reading

Grant, Morris, and J. Reid Meloy, Out of Mind? Out of Sight: The Uncivil Commitment of Permanently Incompetent Criminal Defendants, University of California Davis Law Review 27 (1993): 1–89.

See also Dusky v. U.S., 362 U.S. 402 (1960); Insanity Defense

JACKSON V. VIRGINIA, 443 U.S. 307 (1979)

In this case the Supreme Court held that due process mandates reversal of a conviction if, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, no rational fact finder could have found the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

In state court, Jackson was found guilty of first-degree murder, although he presented evidence that he acted in self-defense, or alternatively, was too intoxicated to form the specific intent necessary for first-degree murder.

After failing in his state appeal, Jackson filed a federal habeas corpus petition on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the conviction. The lower federal courts denied the petition using a “no evidence” test, under which a defendant could gain a reversal only if there was a complete lack of evidence to support an element of the offense.

The Supreme Court concluded, five to three, that because under In re Winship (1968) the prosecution is required to prove every element beyond a reasonable doubt, reversal is required if no rational fact finder could have found guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. However, under this standard, the Court upheld Jackson's conviction.

As a practical matter, although Jackson may induce more appellants to include an insufficiency claim, it is unlikely that it has produced significantly more reversals, which were rare under the “no evidence” standard and continue to be so. There is almost always some evidence to support a guilty verdict; and viewing that evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, an appellate court almost always concludes that it was rational for a fact finder to have found guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

DAVID McCORD

Cases and Statutes Cited

In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1968)

See also Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt

JACKSON, ANDREW (1767–1845)

Presiding over an era of profound political and social change, Andrew Jackson transformed both the perception and the practice of the American presidency. His civil rights legacy is a checkered one; he championed great changes in the American electorate, he fought to protect individual liberty, and he believed in states' rights. Yet he was also sympathetic to slavery, and he oversaw the Indian removal policies of the 1830s.

The primary guiding principle throughout Jackson's life and career was his belief that the majority should govern, an idea emphasized by the 1824 presidential election. In that election, Jackson won the popular vote but did not win a majority of votes cast. The House of Representatives, contrary to Jackson's expectations, elected Jackson's opponent, John Quincy Adams, president. Personally wounded, Jackson believed that democracy had been derailed in favor of regional and partisan considerations.

Four years later, in the 1828 election, Jackson was easily elected. Once in office, Jackson began a campaign to abolish the Electoral College, to place term limits on the presidency, and to restore democratic integrity to the political process. The 1828 Tariff of Abominations provoked his first presidential crisis. Although the Tariff was unpopular all over the South, South Carolina was particularly opposed to it. South Carolinian John C. Calhoun, Jackson's vice-president, resigned from office and wrote an anonymous pamphlet explaining South Carolina's right to nullify, or disregard, federal law. Jackson, although he generally supported states' rights, believed that South Carolina had an obligation to honor the congressionally approved Tariff and sent federal troops to enforce the Tariff. Only a negotiated compromise, which lowered the Tariff, prevented violence.

Jackson also presided over an era of increased suffrage. Sweeping through the country was a wave of reform that lowered or abolished property qualifications for white male suffrage. In short, it became easier for white men to vote. This wave, although it cannot be directly credited to Jackson, certainly met with his approval. He believed that the promise of liberty could only be fulfilled through the widespread, even universal, exercise of the franchise by white men. The wider the electorate, thought Jackson, the more meaningful the majority. And the more meaningful the majority, the more powerful the mandate.

Jackson was concerned with the balance between liberty and government. A believer that citizens were innately virtuous and capable of governing themselves, Jackson also believed on the right of the people to instruct their leaders. Furthermore, the will of the people (as measured by the majority) was sovereign. And although it might seem paradoxical, Jackson believed that as the country industrialized, it would need a stronger central government to ensure liberty for the minority. That vigorous government could easily grow out of control, so vigilance was also necessary, as well as term limits and rotation of office.

Yet Jackson's support of slavery is a blot on his civil liberties legacy. Owner of approximately 150 slaves himself, Jackson believed that the Constitution expressly protected slavery. As a matter of law, then, slaves were private property. His belief that blacks were intellectually inferior is well documented, as well. Interestingly, although he supported the institution, Jackson was politically astute to foresee that arguments over slavery would one day divide the Union.

Because he presided over the massive Indian Removal, Jackson is often criticized for his brutal and racist views toward Indians. But the truth is, although he, indeed, thought of Indians as inferior to whites, he was no more racist than most Americans of his era. Indeed, he may have been slightly more enlightened than was typical for Jackson's time. Jackson's papers indicate a profoundly paternalistic attitude toward Indians, and they further indicate that his main intent in removing the Indians from their traditional areas was preserving them from extinction. White settlers, greedy speculators, and gold seekers would eventually displace Indians, who had no mechanism to deal with the cultural and territorial intruders. Although historians and others may argue about Jackson's ignorance or hatred, or may assign genocidal intent, neither the facts nor the context support that charge.

Jackson's contemporaries often remarked about his bad temper (and in his own writings, he admitted having one). And his reputation for being stubborn is well deserved. But much of the rest of his record is misunderstood. By the standards of his time, he was neither the unrelenting racist nor the recalcitrant Indian hater he is often believed to have been. His political beliefs and his view of America drove him to decisions that later generations may challenge, but Jackson always believed that he was right, and he always claimed to be working for the preservation of democracy. He did, indeed, preside over America's transition from republicanism to democracy.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

Remini, Robert V. Andrew Jackson and the Course of American Empire, 1767–1821; Andrew Jackson and the Course of American Freedom, 1822–1832; Andrew Jackson and the Course of American Democracy, 1833–1845. (3 volume series) New York: Harper and Row, 1977, 1981, 1984.

———. The Legacy of Andrew Jackson: Essays on Democracy, Indian Removal, and Slavery. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1988.

JACKSON, ROBERT H. (1892–1954)

Robert H. Jackson served on the Supreme Court from 1941–1954. He made notable contributions to constitutional law, particularly in the areas federalism, free speech, and separation of powers. He was known for his pungent, commonsensical judicial opinions.

Legal Career

By the time he joined the Supreme Court, Jackson had experienced perhaps the broadest background as a practicing lawyer of any Justice in the Court's history. He had argued cases everywhere from the small city of Jamestown, New York, to the United States Supreme Court. He often described himself as a "country lawyer," based on his successful practice in Jamestown, where he worked on a broad range of cases. Yet, his later work as a federal official included the most sophisticated areas of legal practice: tax, antitrust, securities law, and constitutional litigation.

Jackson began his legal career at an early age, arguing his first case in court before he was twenty-one. In addition to establishing a successful legal practice, he became active in local Democratic politics and developed a connection with then-Governor Franklin Roosevelt. After Roosevelt became president, Jackson became general counsel to the Internal Revenue Service. He then served in several other positions in the executive branch: special counsel to the Treasury Department and to the Securities Exchange Commission, and in the Justice Department as the head of the Tax and Anti-Trust Divisions.

Jackson's success in these positions and his strong support of Roosevelt brought him to the highest positions in the Justice Department. He became Solicitor General (the government lawyer who argues cases in the Supreme Court) and finally Attorney General. As Solicitor General, he was a strong advocate for the constitutionality of the New Deal, which was only then winning acceptance by the Supreme Court.

While Attorney General, he provided important advice to Roosevelt on the eve of World War II. Thus, Jackson's appointment to the Supreme Court was the culmination of an exceptional legal career.

Even after joining the Supreme Court, Jackson made one final, historic appearance as a lawyer. He took a leave from his position at the Court to lead the U.S. prosecuting team at the Nuremberg war crimes trial. Even before the trial began, he played a leading role in the negotiations that lead to the creation of the tribunal. His opening and closing statements at the trial cogently made the case for punishing the Nazi leaders for war crimes and crimes against humanity. He was less successful in cross-examination, particularly of Hermann Goring, who was able to delay the proceedings with long speeches. Today, the Nuremberg trials are commonly considered to be the foundation of modern international human rights law.

Jackson's most notable contributions to civil liberties involved free speech doctrine and the recurring issue of the President's wartime powers over citizens.

Jackson and Free Speech

In the midst of World War II, Jackson penned one of the great classics of First Amendment jurisprudence. The issue in Barnette was whether the children of Jehovah's Witnesses could be expelled from school for refusing to take part in the Pledge of Allegiance and flag salute. Just three years earlier, the Court had soundly rejected a religious freedom claim in a similar case. In Barnette, the Court overruled Gobitis and held compulsory participation in the Pledge to be unconstitutional.

Several passages in Jackson's opinion have become standard quotations in later free speech cases. For example, in response to the argument that the protection of free speech in such cases was better left to the democratic process, he replied: "The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts." He added, "One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections." Coming shortly after the Court had withdrawn from protecting property rights under the guise of the due process clause, this passage presaged a new rule for the Court as guardian of civil rights and civil liberties.

The most famous portion of the Barnette opinion, however, comes near the end, where Jackson wrote: "If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein." This endorsement of freedom of thought as a foundational constitutional principle has been a favored quotation of later Justices.

In Barnette, Jackson seems to have been motivated in part by a desire to distinguish America from its totalitarian foes. One argument in favor of the pledge requirement was that it was needed to instill national unity. Jackson argued that such efforts were ultimately futile, as shown by "the fast failing efforts of our present totalitarian enemies." He observed that those who began such an effort often later became its victims. In the end, he said, the effort to unify opinion by force "achieves only the unanimity of the graveyard."

After the war, Jackson often sided with the government in free speech disputes, which he saw as involving threats to public order rather than freedom of thought. In Saia, the majority struck down an ordinance that gave the chief of police complete discretion over granting permits to use loudspeakers. Jackson, however, argued that the defendant had abused his right of free speech by using loudspeakers in a public park, disrupting its use for recreational purposes. Similarly, in Terminiello, Jackson voted to uphold the conviction of an anti-Semitic speaker for disturbing the peace. The majority overturned the conviction because of one of the judge's instructions to the jury. The judge had told the jury they could convict if speech "stirred people to anger, invited public dispute, or brought about a conviction of unrest." The majority emphasized that dissent often has such effects. Jackson considered this a hyper-technical, if not contrived, basis for reversing the conviction, especially because the defendant's lawyers had never objected to the instruction. He saw the case instead as involving a replay of prewar street battles in Europe, with a rabid speaker inciting a crowd to violence while equally extremist opponents outside threatened to riot.

The majority opinions in Saia and Terminello are now part of the First Amendment canon, and Jackson's dissents seem at odds with his rousing defense of free speech in Barnette. One reason for the disparity between Jackson's views and current law is that the Court generally considers attacks against a statute on its face, whereas Jackson's concern was whether the particular speaker's rights had been invaded. Jackson was also probably influenced by his experience at Nuremberg, which had impressed him with the potential for extremist groups like the Nazis to take abuse the rights of speech and assembly to destroy public order and seize power.

Civil Liberties and Executive Power

Jackson's other major opinions regarding civil liberties involved executive powers during wartime. In Korematsu, he argued that courts should refuse to endorse the Japanese internment, lest they be seen as approving of racial discrimination. He feared that a judicial endorsement of the program would "for all time" validate the "principle of racial discrimination in criminal procedure." Paradoxically, however, he also thought the courts would be powerless to interfere against purely military enforcement. "If the people ever let command of the war power fall into irresponsible and unscrupulous hands, the courts wield no power equal to its restraint." In terms of civil liberties, Jackson's opinion was a mixed blessing. It forthrightly rejected the constitutionality of the internment but also promised to give the military a blank check to act on its own during wartime.

A clearer message emerged from what is probably Jackson's most influential opinion. In the Steel Seizure case, Jackson joined the majority in condemning President Truman's order taking control of the nation's steel mills during the Korean War. Jackson's position was especially noteworthy because of his wealth of experience in the executive branch and his strong support for Presidential initiatives under Roosevelt. But he thought that Truman had gone overboard in claiming executive power. He tartly observed that the Constitution makes the President commander in chief of the military, not of "the country, its industries and its inhabitants." In the course of his opinion, Jackson developed a nuanced analysis of the exercise of presidential power. Although Jackson's was only a concurring opinion, his analysis has had much more impact on the law than the Justice Black's brief majority opinion. The importance of Jackson's approach became clear in the early twenty-first century, when the courts confronted antiterrorist measures that had been issued on the basis of inherent executive authority.

DANIEL A. FARBER

References and Further Readings

- Desmond, Charles, et al. Mr. Justice Jackson: Four Lectures in his Honor. New York: Columbia University Press, 1969.
- Gerhart, Eugene. America's Advocate. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Co., 1958.

- Hutchinson, Dennis, The Achilles Heel of the Constitution: Justice Jackson and the Japanese Exclusion Cases, Supreme Court Review (2002): 455.
- Jaffe, Louis, Mr. Justice Jackson, Harvard Law Review 68 (April 1955): 940.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Korematsu v. United States*, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)
- Minersville School District v. Gobitis*, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
- Saia v. People of State of New York*, 334 U.S. 558 (1948)
- West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette*, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)
- Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer (The Steel Seizure Case)*, 343 U.S. 579 (1952)

See also Flag Salute Cases; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present)

JACOBELLIS v. OHIO, 378 U.S. 184 (1964)

Can the elements of the Roth test be balanced against one another as an appropriate way of applying the rule? A manager of a motion picture theatre in Ohio was convicted for possessing and showing an obscene film. Ohio's appellate courts upheld the conviction. The Supreme Court reversed on the basis that the state courts misapplied the Roth test for obscenity and Brennan's plurality opinion attempts to clarify how the test should be used. The decision generated four different opinions from the majority, who agreed with the judgment, but none garnered more than two justices; there were two dissenting opinions. Stewart's concurring opinion quickly entered American folklore for his comment that criminal laws are constitutionally limited to "hard core pornography," which, while declining to define the term, he nevertheless confidently claimed, "I know it when I see it."

Brennan's ruling reaffirms Roth, even though the standard, he acknowledges, "has been the subject of much discussion and controversy." The test is "not perfect," Brennan admits but asserts "any substitute would raise equally difficult problems." The Roth test asks "whether, to an average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material, taken as a whole, appeals to prurient interests." Material alleged to be obscene must be "utterly without redeeming social importance," but if the material "advocates ideas . . . or . . . has literary or scientific or artistic value or any other form of social importance," it is protected under the First Amendment.

Brennan's opinion then lays out the steps Roth requires. The constitutional status of allegedly obscene material does not “turn on a ‘weighing’ of its social importance against its prurient appeal” unless the material is “utterly without social importance.” Material must be found to go “substantially beyond customary limits of candor in description or representation of such matters” before it is declared obscene. In the absence of such a finding, inquiries into the alleged prurient appeal of the work or expression are unnecessary. Finally, “contemporary community standards” cannot be interpreted as referring to particular local communities but to society at large or the public in general. Brennan, paraphrasing John Marshall, declaims “It is, after all, a national Constitution that we are expounding.”

Warren’s dissent, while accepting the Roth test, disagreed with the Court’s decision in three ways. First, he disagrees that a national standard can be proven to be the relevant “community standard.” Second, he concludes that “hard core pornography” offers no greater clarity than “obscenity” and puts forward his own view that it is the “use to various materials are put” that determines whether something is obscene or not; a technical treatise on pornography could well be obscene when sold or displayed to children. Third, he concludes that the Supreme Court should limit its reviews of lower court decisions involving obscenity to whether “sufficient evidence” was admitted to implement Roth.

Harlan, also dissenting, repeats his view that states should have constitutionally greater latitude when banning material that is obscene than the federal government, which should be subject to rigorous adherence to the Roth test. States could ban obscene material, Harlan suggests, as long as the material, taken as a whole, was “reasonably” found in state judicial proceedings to “treat sex in a fundamentally offensive manner under rationally established criteria for judging such material.”

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-Clío, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Jacobellis v. Ohio*, 378 U.S. 184 (1964)
- Roth v. United States*, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

JACOBSON V. MASSACHUSETTS, 197 U.S. 11 (1905)

Any free society must strike a balance between protecting public health and safeguarding civil liberties. In 1894, Massachusetts enacted a law that allowed municipalities to order the compulsory vaccination of its residents during disease outbreaks. The Cambridge Board of Health in 1902 ordered its residents to be vaccinated. Henning Jacobson refused to be inoculated and was arrested and prosecuted. The trial jury found him guilty, and the court fined him five dollars. He appealed his conviction to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, which sustained his conviction. Jacobson then appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

The Court, in an opinion written by Justice John Marshall Harlan, upheld the conviction and ruled that the Massachusetts statute authorizing local boards of health to make vaccination compulsory was constitutional. The defendant alleged that the law violated his liberty, “the inherent right of every freeman to care for his own body and health in such way as seems to him best,” as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Fourteenth Amendment prohibits the states from depriving any person of liberty without due process of law. Justice Harlan explained that each citizen enters into a social contract, according to which he promises to obey the laws in exchange for the benefits of living in a society under law. The Massachusetts legislature determined that an unvaccinated person put all fellow citizens at risk of infection. The law can compel a person to be inoculated even when the vaccine poses a risk of harm or even death. The compulsory vaccination statute was an exercise by Massachusetts of its “police power.” The police power is the power to make laws for the health, safety, morals, and welfare of the people.

The responsibility of the judiciary, said Harlan, is not to examine the medical evidence on its own but to defer to the legislature’s judgment. Following the Court’s decision, additional states required vaccination of all children prior to enrollment in school. The Supreme Court later upheld the authority of states to subject automobile drivers to breath and blood tests to determine intoxication.

The Court’s rejection of a right to control one’s body and to resist governmental intrusion, however, was successfully challenged in a number of other cases. In Roe v. Wade (1973) and Lawrence v. Texas (2003), the Supreme Court judged that abortion and sodomy did not pose nearly as serious a risk to the common good as unvaccinated persons, and therefore the burden on individual liberty was unjustified.

The terrorist attacks on New York City and Washington, D.C., in September 2001 raised fears of bioterrorism, in which terrorists would introduce viruses or bacteria causing smallpox, anthrax, and other diseases. Within two years, more than thirty states enacted a version of the Model State Emergency Health Powers Act, which permits governors to declare a state of emergency and subject residents to compulsory vaccination.

KENNETH M. HOLLAND

References and Further Reading

- Joseph, D. George. "Uses of Jacobson v. Massachusetts in the Age of Bioterror." Journal of the American Medical Association 290 (2003): 2331.
- Matsumoto, Gary. Vaccine A: The Covert Government Experiment That's Killing Our Soldiers—And Why GI's Are Only The First Victims. New York: Basic Books, 2004.
- Silverman, Ross D., No More Kidding Around: Restructuring Non-Medical Childhood Immunization Exemptions to Ensure Public Health Protection, Annals of Health Law 12 (2003): 277–294.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lawrence v. Texas*, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Abortion; Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment; Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003); Police Power of the State; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Sodomy Laws; Terrorism and Civil Liberties

JACOBSON v. UNITED STATES, 503 U.S. 540 (1992)

When the government participates in the commission of a crime to catch a person committing an illegal act, that person may raise a defense of entrapment. Its agents may only provide an opportunity for a person to commit a crime; they cannot coerce a person into acting. The defense of entrapment will arise when the government has persuaded an otherwise law-abiding person to commit a crime that he or she would not have committed without government intervention. Jacobson v. United States provided the United States Supreme Court with the opportunity to explore the degree to which the government could induce unlawful behavior.

Before Congress passed a law banning the receipt in the mail of pornographic materials featuring children, the defendant Jacobson ordered and received two such magazines. During the next two and a half years, two different governmental agencies set up several fictitious agencies to persuade him to order child pornography. At the end of the twenty-six-month operation, he ordered a magazine and was promptly arrested. He raised the defense of entrapment.

In the trial court, the judge instructed the jury on the defense of entrapment, however, the jury still found Jacobson guilty of violating the law against receipt through the mail of sexually explicit materials featuring children. Jacobson appealed ultimately to the Supreme Court.

The Court stated that during the course of an investigation, "Government agents may not originate a criminal design, implant in an innocent person's mind the disposition to commit a criminal act, and then induce commission of the crime so that the Government may prosecute." A person must have the predisposition to commit a crime before any involvement by the government. In Jacobson's case, the prosecution could not carry the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that he was predisposed to break the law before any involvement by the agents. The contact, itself, may have created a predisposition in Jacobson to break the law. Jacobson placed his order only after twenty-six months of repeated contact by the government's fictitious organizations.

During the effort to enforce the law, "law enforcement officials go too far when they 'implant in the mind of an innocent person the disposition to commit the alleged offense and induce its commission in order that they may prosecute.'" The Justices further stated that if a person would never have broken the law without the intervention of the government, the courts should intervene on the person's behalf.

The dissent argued that the government's conduct was not so egregious as to create a defense of entrapment. The action consisted only of sending materials that could have easily been thrown away. When the defendant was given the opportunity to act and place an order with the fictitious company, he did so willingly. This view was rejected by the majority of the Supreme Court.

PAUL MARCUS

References and Further Reading

- Colquitt, Joseph A., Rethinking Entrapment, American Criminal Law Review 41 (2004): 1389.
- Dillof, Anthony M., Unraveling Unlawful Entrapment, Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology 94 (2004): 827.
- Marcus, Paul, The Entrapment Defense. 2nd Ed. Lexis Publishing.

See also Due Process; Entrapment by Estoppel; Entrapment and "Stings"

JAILHOUSE INFORMANTS

When one is housed inside an eight-by-ten foot cell, human nature can trump rationality. A trusting or insecure inmate might recount to his cellmate details of his crimes, seeking advice, assistance, consolation, or confirmation of his masculinity. But the cellmate might encourage disclosures for a different, more selfish reason—to collect information that the government might find helpful. In short, he may be an informant. There have also been several well-publicized cases in which jailhouse informants fabricated confessions, sometimes against innocent defendants.

The admissibility of the informant's testimony at the inmate's criminal trial is governed by several provisions of the federal Bill of Rights, subject to modification by more liberal state constitutional provisions and both federal and state statutory law in some jurisdictions. The Sixth Amendment right to counsel mandates exclusion of the informant's testimony if, at the time he questioned the inmate, (1) the inmate had already been charged with the questioned crime, even if no particular lawyer had been appointed to represent him; (2) the cellmate had prearranged his status as an informant; and (3) the cellmate actively prompted the inmate to speak about his crimes (passive listening to spontaneous utterances will not suffice). The Fifth Amendment's due process clause, which prohibits the use of evidence obtained by outrageous police tactics, will be implicated only if the cellmate threatened the inmate with violence to induce speech. The Fifth Amendment's self-incrimination clause does not apply, because questioning by an undercover agent (such as the cellmate) does not constitute a "coercive police environment" of the kind contemplated by the Supreme Court in Miranda. Finally, the Fourth Amendment offers no protection to the loquacious inmate, because the U.S. Supreme Court has consistently held that each of us must assume the risk that our consensual conversation partners are (or will become) traitors. For this reason, questioning by an undercover agent does not constitute a "search," because it violates no reasonable expectation of privacy.

KAY L. LEVINE

References and Further Reading

- Tomkovicz, James J., An Adversary System Defense of the Right to Counsel against Informants: Truth, Fair Play, and the Messiah Doctrine, U.C. Davis Law Review 22 (1988): 1:1.
- Trott, Stephen S., Words of Warning for Prosecutors Using Criminals as Witnesses, Hastings Law Journal 47 (1996): 1381.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Arizona v. Fulminante*, 499 U.S. 279 (1991)
Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966)
Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292 (1990)
Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436 (1986)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264 (1980)
United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745 (1971)

See also Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279 (1991); Bill of Rights: Structure; Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation; Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966); Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292 (1990); Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Miranda Warning; Right to Counsel (VI); Rights of the Accused; Search (General Definition) Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution

JAMISON V. TEXAS, 318 U.S. 413 (1943)

Ella Jamison, a longtime member of the Jehovah's Witnesses, was distributing pamphlets to Dallas pedestrians, inviting them to hear a speech from another Jehovah's Witness and to contribute money to the Jehovah's Witnesses by buying their books. She was charged with violating a city ordinance prohibiting distribution of pamphlets.

The Corporation Court of Dallas and the County Criminal Court successively convicted her, and she appealed to the United States Supreme Court. The Court held that the Dallas ordinance violated her First Amendment rights of freedom of press and of religion, applied to the states per the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Court rejected both of the city's arguments in favor of the ordinance. First, it said that although cities certainly have much control of travel and public conduct, individuals have the right to express their views "in an orderly fashion" in public spaces. The right to do so is protected, whether in speech or written word.

Second, the Court rejected the city's argument that despite their goal of advancing a religious cause, the invitation to purchase should render the pamphlets commercial and, therefore, proscribable. Following its holding in Schneider v. Irvington, the existence of a commercial statement in the pamphlet was not sufficient to interdict it. Purely commercial pamphlets, the Court said, could still be proscribed by the state.

This case is one of several foreshadowing the Court's line of "forum doctrine" cases, which hold (among other things) that communication of ideas in public forums is an important First Amendment right.

ADAM GITLIN

References and Further Reading

Schauer, Frederick, Principles, Institutions, and the First Amendment, Harvard Law Review 112 (1998): 84:98–100.
 Stone, Geoffrey R., Fora Americana: Speech in Public Places, Supreme Court Review 1974 (1974): 233:233–280.
 Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law, 987. 2nd Ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Schneider v. Irvington, 308 U.S. 147 (1939)

See also Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939);
Public Forum Doctrines; Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction

JAPANESE INTERNMENT CASES

Background

On December 7, 1941, Japanese planes and submarines attacked the naval base at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. The following day, Congress declared war against the Empire of Japan. On February 19, 1941, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt issued Executive Order 9066. The Order authorized military commanders to designate certain regions as “Military Areas” from which “any or all persons may be excluded.” The Secretary of War designated Lieutenant General John DeWitt Military Commander of the Western Defense Command. On March 2, 1942, General DeWitt issued a proclamation reciting that the entire Pacific Coast was particularly subject to attack, invasion, and espionage. The proclamation designated as military areas regions including all of the Pacific coast states and Arizona. Another presidential Executive Order, issued March 18, 1942, created the War Relocation Authority, charged with the creation of a program for the removal, relocation, and supervision of persons excluded from military areas.

On March 21, 1942, Congress ratified the exclusion program with an act making it a misdemeanor to enter, remain in, or leave a military area contrary to the restrictions imposed by the Secretary of War or any military commander. Three days later, General DeWitt issued a proclamation imposing an 8 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew on all enemy aliens and Japanese Americans within the military areas. Beginning the same day, a series of Civilian Exclusion Orders began the process of removing Japanese Americans from coastal regions and concentrating them in camps. More than 120,000 people, mostly birthright citizens, were ultimately confined, spending an average of three years in the camps.

The constitutionality of these restrictions on the civil rights of Japanese Americans was litigated in four cases: Yasui v. United States, Hirabayashi v. United States, Korematsu v. United States, and Ex parte Endo. Divisive at the time, the cases have continued to resonate in the American psyche. Over the years they have been subject to a wide variety of interpretations, and the process continues to this day.

The Cases

The cases deal with three different aspects of the internment program: curfews, exclusion from Military Areas, and detention within camps. Yasui and Hirabayashi, companion cases, considered the curfew orders.

Minoru Yasui and Gordon Hirabayashi turned themselves in to authorities in Portland and Seattle, respectively, to create test cases. Hirabayashi sought to challenge the exclusion order as well as the curfew, but the Supreme Court declined to decide the validity of that order. The decision to limit the Hirabayashi decision to the curfew may have been designed to allow the Court more time to consider the exclusion orders or perhaps to preserve unanimity in Hirabayashi itself. (In Justice Delayed, Peter Irons reports that Justice Frank Murphy, who had originally intended to dissent in Hirabayashi, was won over by Justice Felix Frankfurter’s argument that any dissent would support the enemy.)

On June 21, 1943, the Court unanimously affirmed the validity of the curfew order, although three Justices wrote separate concurrences expressing some reservations. Justice Harlan Fiske Stone, writing for the Court, acknowledged that “[d]istinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people....” But the principle that “racial discriminations are in most circumstances irrelevant and therefore prohibited” did not bar the government from drawing lines on the basis of race when such distinctions were in fact relevant. The circumstance of a war with Japan, Stone ruled, afforded “a rational basis” for the curfew order. Yasui’s conviction was affirmed the same day on the authority of Hirabayashi.

Unlike Yasui and Hirabayashi, Fred Korematsu was not a willing litigant. Wanting to remain with his Caucasian fiancée, Korematsu refused to report for evacuation in compliance with the exclusion order, altered his draft card, and had minor plastic surgery in the hopes of evading detection. Arrested on a tip, he was convicted of violating the exclusion order. Although his case was initially argued before the Supreme Court along with those of Yasui and Hirabayashi, it was remanded to the court of appeals and was not reargued until October 1944. At that point, the outcome of the war was no longer in doubt, and the continued detention of Japanese Americans seemed increasingly unnecessary.

As in Hirabayashi, the Court limited the issues before it. Korematsu argued that the military orders required him to report to an Assembly Center, where he would be confined, and that the exclusion order could not be upheld without considering the legality of the detention. Justice Hugo Black, writing for the majority, restricted his analysis to the exclusion order, and explicitly noted that he was assessing it “as of the time it was made...” After observing that “all legal restriction which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect,” Black argued that Korematsu had not been subject to the exclusion order “because of hostility to him or his race” but rather “because we are at war with the Japanese Empire.”

As it had in Hirabayashi, the Korematsu Court found a legitimate basis for wholesale exclusion in the military finding that it “was impossible to bring about an immediate segregation of the disloyal from the loyal.” Given this impossibility, Black held that the government had grounds to believe that the exclusion orders were necessary and refused to invoke “the calm perspective of hindsight” to say that they were unjustified. In contrast to Hirabayashi, the Korematsu Court could not maintain unanimity. Three Justices dissented, and one, Justice Frank Murphy, asserted explicitly that the exclusion orders had exceeded constitutional power and fallen “into the ugly abyss of racism.”

In the third case, Endo v. United States, the Court addressed the legality of the detentions, but again it avoided the constitutional issue. Mitsuye Endo had complied with the exclusion order, reporting to the Walerga Assembly Center near Sacramento, from whence she was transferred to the Tule Lake camp near the Oregon border. Endo, who had worked for the state of California and whose brother had been drafted before the Pearl Harbor attack, was identified by the Japanese American Citizens League as an uncontroversially loyal American and thus an appealing litigant. She challenged her detention through a petition for a writ of habeas corpus and refused an early release that would have mooted her lawsuit.

Justice William O. Douglas’s opinion for the Court declined to decide the constitutionality of the detention program. Instead, it focused on the authorization for the detentions, finding that neither the Executive Orders, nor the Act of Congress ratifying them, granted the War Relocation Authority power to detain loyal citizens. The government conceded Endo’s loyalty, and the Court found her, therefore, entitled to unconditional release. No Justice dissented in Endo, but Justice Owen Roberts and Justice Murphy, who had dissented in Korematsu, wrote separately to reiterate their claims that the detentions were unconstitutional.

Early Reaction and Doctrinal Development

Justice Robert Jackson, dissenting in Korematsu, had argued for a conceptual split between the authority of the military and that of the civil courts. The Court, he argued, should accept its inability to judge military necessities and not try to countermand even an unconstitutional military order. But it should not distort the Constitution to approve that order; it should not allow the military order to be enforced in a civilian court. Jackson’s proposed dichotomy has a peculiar ambivalence to it, and Justice Frankfurter wrote a separate concurring opinion to reject its “dialectic subtleties.” Yet the Court’s careful limitation of the issues in each of the internment cases suggests that it likewise sought some middle course between interfering with a military operation and approving a race-based detention program.

The balancing act could have succeeded. Apparently alerted to the content of the impending Endo decision, the War Department announced on December 17, 1944, that Japanese Americans “whose records have stood the test of Army scrutiny during the past two years” would be released from internment. Korematsu and Endo were announced the next day, at which point the danger of a traumatic showdown between the Court and the military authorities had passed. And had Endo offered a constitutional denunciation of the race-based detention of loyal Americans, it might have become the most salient of the internment decisions.

But Endo rested on statutory interpretation, and despite Justice Black’s reference to it in Korematsu as illustrating the difference between detention and exclusion, Endo quickly fell from view. Korematsu received the lion’s share of public attention, and the attention was not favorable. Writing almost contemporaneously, Yale Law Professor Eugene Rostow pronounced the Japanese Internment cases a disaster, “our worst wartime mistake.” In 1948, Congress enacted the Japanese American Evacuation Claims Act, which provided compensation to detainees who had lost homes and businesses as a consequence of the exclusion orders. Widespread sentiment held that the internment program had been a tragic overreaction, and the Court's performance a shameful capitulation.

At the same time as it assumed the role of villain in the public mind, however, the Korematsu opinion was embarking on a surprising second career in Supreme Court doctrine. The outcome of the case had been an acceptance of the government's racial classification, of course, but Justice Black had also commented that laws curtailing the civil rights of a single racial group were "immediately suspect" and should be subjected to "the most rigid scrutiny." These phrases persisted in the Court's Equal Protection jurisprudence, and in 1954 the Supreme Court relied on them in a case striking down racial discrimination. That case was Bolling v. Sharpe, the federal counterpart to Brown v. Board of Education, in which the Court held unconstitutional the racial segregation of the District of Columbia public schools.

Korematsu and Hirabayashi had pursued a vision of Equal Protection under which government discrimination was unconstitutional if invidious—motivated by racism or hostility—but acceptable if supported by some legitimate purpose. In an effort to bring greater objectivity to Equal Protection analysis, the Court gradually refined this approach. The direct assessment of discrimination as invidious or noninvidious faded away; instead the Court began applying a demanding means-end fit test to forms of discrimination deemed highly likely to be invidious. Eventually, it settled on the modern form of strict scrutiny: discrimination on the basis of certain "suspect" characteristics such as race or national origin would be upheld only if the government could show that such discrimination was necessary to serve a compelling state interest.

The Court repeatedly cited Korematsu as the birthplace of strict scrutiny, giving it a strange place within Supreme Court doctrine. Korematsu remains the only Supreme Court case in which discrimination against a racial minority survived purportedly strict scrutiny. At the same time, however, it is acknowledged as the origin of the doctrine relied on in such landmark civil rights cases as Loving v. Virginia, which struck down a state ban on interracial marriage. More recently, Korematsu was again invoked in the cases extending strict scrutiny to affirmative action, Regents of the University of California v. Bakke and Adarand v. Peña.

Back to Court: The Second Round of Cases

Korematsu's surprising emergence as a source of protection for racial minorities did nothing to rehabilitate the decision or the internment program in the public eye. Executive Order 9066 had terminated with the cessation of hostilities, but in 1976 President Gerald Ford issued a proclamation reaffirming the termination and branding the evacuation "wrong." In 1980, Congress created the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. A stream of witnesses testified to the hardships and trauma they had suffered. The Commission's report, Personal Justice Denied, was issued in 1982. It concluded that the internment had not been justified by military necessity but was rather the product of "race prejudice, war hysteria, and a failure of political leadership." The report characterized the Supreme Court decisions as "overruled in the court of history." The recommendations accompanying the report, released in 1983, included a suggestion that Congress appropriate funds to pay reparations of $20,000 each to the roughly 60,000 surviving detainees.

At around the same time, an activist movement was seeking redress, if not overruling, not in the court of history but in those of the United States. In 1983, Yasui, Hirabayashi, and Korematsu filed petitions in federal district court seeking to have their convictions vacated. Their argument was not simply that the internment had been unjustified. No one seriously disputed that point, but it would not have been enough to set aside the convictions. Instead, their petitions presented a story of government misconduct in the course of the Supreme Court litigation, misconduct severe enough to constitute a fraud on the Court.

Researching a book on the internment cases, Peter Irons had discovered considerable discord among the Justice Department lawyers assigned to the litigation. In internal memos, some lawyers had protested that the Department was engaged in the "suppression of evidence" and that General DeWitt's Final Report on the evacuation, presented to the Supreme Court, contained "lies" and "intentional falsehoods." Korematsu's petition presented two main allegations of misconduct.

First, the Justice Department had argued to the courts that there was insufficient time to distinguish between loyal and disloyal Japanese Americans and that a wholesale evacuation was, therefore, necessary. Irons and Aiko Herzig-Yoshinaga discovered that DeWitt's initial version of the Final Report had made no mention of insufficient time but asserted that there was simply no way to tell the loyal from the disloyal, a more frankly racist claim to which courts might have been less willing to defer. War Department officials revised the report to make it consistent with the Justice Department's litigating position, burned the original version, and destroyed records of its existence.

Second, the War Department and the Justice Department withheld from the courts and Korematsu's attorneys reports from the FBI, the FCC, and the Office of Naval Intelligence that contradicted DeWitt Report's assertions about disloyalty and espionage activity among the Japanese American population. Given these contradictory reports, Justice Department attorney John Burling concluded that the DeWitt Report's statements about illegal radio transmissions and shore-to-ship signaling were "intentional falsehoods." Burling drafted a footnote for the Justice Department's brief in Korematsu stating that the DeWitt Report's factual assertions in support of the claims of military necessity were "in conflict with information in possession of the Department of Justice" and renouncing any reliance on those facts. At the insistence of the War Department, and over the objections of Burling and his superior Edward Ennis, Assistant Attorney General Herbert Wechsler revised the footnote to eliminate any mention of the contradictory reports. As submitted to the Supreme Court, the footnote simply asserted that the Justice Department relied on the DeWitt report only for facts asserted in the brief.

The government did not oppose Korematsu's request that his conviction be vacated, but it urged the court not to delve into the issue of governmental misconduct. In its decision, however, the court explicitly discussed the footnote and its revision, concluding that the government knowingly withheld information from the courts. It granted Korematsu's petition on April 19, 1984. Yasui's conviction was likewise vacated, although the court in his case declined to make any findings of governmental misconduct. Yasui appealed the decision to the Ninth Circuit but died in November 1986 before the case could be resolved. Litigation over the last of the petitions, that of Gordon Hirabayashi, continued until 1988. Ultimately that petition too was granted, with the court announcing that the government had doctored the record submitted to the Supreme Court.

The question of reparations remained. In 1983, the National Council for Japanese American Redress had filed a class action on behalf of 125,000 interned Japanese Americans, requesting a total of $27 billion in damages. That suit was ultimately dismissed, but in 1988 Congress enacted a bill accepting the recommendations of the Commission on Wartime Relocations and awarded $20,000 to each surviving detainee.

Continuing Relevance and the Verdict of History

The second round of cases had cast Korematsu in a slightly different light, suggesting that perhaps the blame lay less with a supine Court than with a disingenuous Executive. In the years following the coram nobis cases, some defenders of Korematsu emerged. In his analysis of civil liberties during wartime, All the Laws But One, Chief Justice William Rehnquist suggested that Korematsu was understandable as a product of Equal Protection doctrine that had not yet matured. Some years later Judge Richard Posner offered a stronger defense on the grounds that judicial deference to military judgment was appropriate and unavoidable during wartime.

What might have seemed academic speculation acquired real-world relevance after the attacks of September 11, 2001. In the wake of the attacks, the Executive asserted the authority to unilaterally declare American citizens "enemy combatants" and thereafter hold them indefinitely without charges or access to counsel. The constitutional permissibility of such detention came before the Court again in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld—not as an Equal Protection case but as one about the scope of Executive power.

Yaser Hamdi, an American citizen born in Louisiana, was seized in Afghanistan by local forces and turned over to the U.S. military. The military initially transferred him to Guantanamo Bay, but on discovering his American citizenship moved him to a naval brig in Norfolk, Virginia. The government asserted that Hamdi had been fighting for the Taliban and that his status as an enemy combatant justified indefinite detention without formal charges or proceedings. Hamdi's father, filing a habeas petition on his son's behalf, responded that he had gone to Afghanistan as an aid worker and had never supported the Taliban. The petition asked for the opportunity to rebut the government's allegations at an evidentiary hearing.

The parallels to the Japanese internment could not have been lost on the Court, but they were made more emphatic by the participation of Fred Korematsu as a friend of the court. Korematsu filed a brief in support of Hamdi, chronicling historical examples of actions taken in the name of military necessity that hindsight had revealed as unnecessary restraints on liberty. He argued that the pattern of overreaction and after-the-fact regret should not persist, and he asked the Court to closely scrutinize the government's asserted justifications to avoid the mistakes of the past.

The Supreme Court ruled that Hamdi was entitled to an opportunity to challenge the government's assertions before a neutral decisionmaker. "[A] state of war," wrote Justice O'Connor, "is not a blank check for the President when it comes to the rights of the Nation's citizens." She cited Justice Murphy's dissent in Korematsu for the proposition that the military's claims, like any others infringing the constitutional rights of the individual, must be subjected to scrutiny through the judicial process.

Korematsu remains a reviled decision. Many such cases, like Plessy v. Ferguson, in which the Court upheld racial segregation of railroad cars, have become what could be called antiprecedents. Court majorities tend to cite the dissents in these cases, and their majority opinions are invoked only as epithet or accusation. Korematsu's role in the development of strict scrutiny has spared it that fate, but its appearance in Hamdi suggests it has become what might be called a historical antiprecedent. Quite apart from the legal principles it endorsed or inspired, the decision now stands as a reminder that courts must look carefully not only at military infringements on the liberty of American citizens, but also sometimes at civilian defenders of those infringements.

KERMIT ROOSEVELT, III

References and Further Reading

- Commission on Wartime Relocation. Personal Justice Denied. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1983.
- Gotanda, Neil "The Story of Korematsu: The Japanese-American Cases" in Dorf, Michael C., ed. Constitutional Law Stories. New York: Foundation Press, 2004, pp. 249–295.
- Grodzins, Morton. Americans Betrayed: Politics and the Japanese Evacuations. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.
- Gudridge, Patrick, Remember Endo?, Harvard Law Review 116 (2003): 1933.
- Irons, Peter, ed. Justice Delayed: The Record of the Japanese American Internment Cases. Middletown: Wesleyan University Press, 1989.
- . Justice at War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Rostow, Eugene V., The Japanese American Cases: A Disaster, Yale Law Journal 54 (1945): 489.
- Yen, Alfred C., Introduction: Praising with Faint Damnation—The Troubling Rehabilitation of Korematsu, B.C. Law Review 40 (1998): 1.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adarand v. Peña*, 515 U.S. 200 (1995)
- Bolling v. Sharpe*, 347 U.S. 497 (1954)
- Brown v. Board of Education*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Ex Parte Endo*, 323 U.S. 283 (1944)
- Hamdi v. Rumsfeld*, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)
- Hirabayashi v. United States*, 320 U.S. 81 (1943)
- Korematsu v. United States*, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)
- Loving v. Virginia*, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
- Regents of the University of California v. Bakke*, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)
- Yasui v. United States*, 320 U.S. 115 (1943)

See also Dewitt, General John; Guantanamo Bay, Enemy Combatants, Post 9/11; Indefinite Detention;

National Security; Roosevelt, Franklin Delano; World War II, Civil Liberties in

JAY COURT (1789–1795)

The "Jay Court" is the title attributed to the Supreme Court during the tenure of John Jay, who served as Chief Justice of the United States from October 1789 to February 1795. Jay, a prominent New York Federalist and champion of the Constitution's ratification, was the first chief justice. During this period, the Supreme Court formally organized, admitted the first members of the Supreme Court Bar, and established many precedents defining the functions and duties of the institution.

Prominent among the associate justices who served alongside Chief Justice Jay were William Cushing, James Wilson, James Iredell, and William Paterson. Other justices at this time included John Rutledge, John Blair, and Thomas Johnson, each of whom served only briefly. Each of these individuals was selected by President George Washington and considered to be sympathetic to Federalist principles.

The Supreme Court's membership, then only six justices, reflected geographical balance, with jurists selected from each region of the United States. This restrained sectional jealousies and facilitated the circuit riding then required of justices. The justices met twice annually to undertake Supreme Court business, with terms in February and August of each year. The Supreme Court was without a permanent home at this time, meeting in makeshift quarters in New York (1790) and then Philadelphia (1791–1800). Justices were also then required to travel outside the nation's capital twice annually and hold court throughout a designated judicial circuit. This practice was known as "circuit riding."

Circuit riding required justices to interact with the citizenry and to hear arguments in circuit courts alongside district judges. Justices often complained that riding circuit required extensive travel and created difficulties when the Supreme Court considered appeals of the justices' circuit rulings. Proponents of circuit riding asserted that it familiarized the justices with local conditions and enhanced the status of the judiciary. The justices' frequent appeals to Congress for relief from circuit duties were largely unsuccessful in the Jay Court period, although they were excused after 1792 from repeated visits to a single circuit in the same year.

Although justices heard cases while on circuit, the docket of the Supreme Court remained small at this time. The Supreme Court did not decide its first case until 1791, and its caseload did not exceed five cases in a year while Jay served as chief justice. Decisions during this period were delivered in seriatim, with each justice issuing a written opinion declaring his view of the correct outcome. This practice was common for the early Supreme Court and did not subside altogether until the Marshall Court period (1801–1835).

Perhaps the most noteworthy Supreme Court decision from the Jay Court period is Chisholm v. Georgia (1793). In this case, the facts of which concerned the state of Georgia's failure to pay its debt to the estate of a creditor, the justices considered whether a state could be sued by a citizen of another state without its consent, particularly in the federal courts. Georgia argued that states enjoyed sovereign immunity and could not be subjected to such suits. The Supreme Court decided to the contrary, ruling that states could be sued in federal courts without the permission of the state. The decision in Chisholm was widely opposed, because it represented a clear limitation to state sovereignty. The controversy eventually resulted in the ratification of the Eleventh Amendment (1795) removing suits against states by citizens of other states from the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

Also significant during this period were early instances of judicial review. Although the Supreme Court's decision in Marbury v. Madison (1803) is recognized as the first instance in which the Court used judicial review to overturn a federal law, it was the Jay Court that first asserted the institution's power to do so. In Hayburn's Case (1792), the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of the Invalid Pensioners Act (1792). This legislation assigned the federal courts the duty of reviewing pension petitions submitted by veterans of the American Revolution to determine their eligibility for federal pensions. Along with the constitutional issue raised by assigning nonjudicial duties to federal judges, the Invalid Pensioners Act allowed the Secretary of War to review the decisions of the courts. The justices on circuit considered several cases resulting from this legislation, reaching general agreement that the statute was unconstitutional. Ultimately, Justice Wilson's outright refusal to consider pension petitions led to the controversy in Hayburn. However, the Supreme Court did not formally decide the merits of the case or the statute's constitutionality. Because of congressional dissatisfaction with the delays associated with judicial consideration, new legislation was crafted to remove the circuit courts from the petition process.

The paltry docket of the Supreme Court during Jay's tenure included little of significance for American civil liberties. However, during this time early indictments and convictions for sedition and other rebellious acts took place in reaction to civic unrest. These indictments relied on federal common law, which would prove to be controversial. The first such indictment took place in 1792, with the first conviction in 1794. The Supreme Court did not take part in either action. Criminal charges under federal common law were perceived by many as an encroachment on state sovereignty and individual rights. Proponents of federal common law argued that the common law's basis in natural law transcended state boundaries. Opponents of federal common law, however, argued that its establishment would give the federal government—including the judiciary—unacceptably broad jurisdiction. The debate over common-law crimes continued beyond Jay's tenure, later becoming a key conflict between the major American political factions.

In 1794, Chief Justice Jay was selected as envoy to Great Britain and assigned to renegotiate the terms of peace then in place. The terms of the treaty negotiated by Jay were highly controversial and widely viewed as favorable to the British. Jay resigned his judicial office in 1795 to become governor of New York. Jay was briefly succeeded as Chief Justice by John Rutledge, who soon vacated the office after his recess appointment expired, and he failed to achieve confirmation from the U.S. Senate.

RICHARD L. VINING

References and Further Reading

- Casto, William R. The Supreme Court in the Early Republic: The Chief Justiceships of John Jay and Oliver Ellsworth. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.
- Gerber, Scott D., ed. Seriatim: The Supreme Court before John Marshall. New York: New York University Press, 1998.
- Goebel, Julius Jr. History of the Supreme Court of the United States, Volume I: Antecedents and Beginnings to 1801. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1971.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Chisholm v. Georgia*, 2 U.S. 419 (1793)
- Hayburn's Case*, 2 Dall. 409 (1792)
- Marbury v. Madison*, 5 U.S. 137 (1803)
- Invalid Pensioners Act, Act of March 23, 1792, 1 Stat. 243

See also American Revolution; Common Law or Statute; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History (1791–1917); Judicial Review; Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803); Natural Law, Eighteenth Century Understanding; Seditious Libel

JEFFERSON, THOMAS (1743–1826)

Thomas Jefferson, a Virginia planter and legal scholar, was principal author of the Declaration of Independence. He served as representative in the Virginia House of Burgesses 1769–1775, member of the Virginia House of Delegates 1775–1779, wartime governor of Virginia 1779–1781, member of Congress 1783–1784, Minister to France 1784–1789, Secretary of State under George Washington 1789–1793, Vice-President under John Adams 1797–1801, and as Third President of the United States, 1801–1809, during which he negotiated the Louisiana Purchase, which doubled the land area of the nation.

On his tombstone near his Virginia home, Monticello, however, which he designed and for which he wrote the inscription, there is no mention of the offices he held. Rather, it reads that Thomas Jefferson was “author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia.”

He authored many important writings. In 1774, he wrote a political pamphlet, A Summary View of the Rights of British America, which brought him attention beyond Virginia. Arguing on the basis of the natural rights theory of John Locke, Jefferson claimed that colonial allegiance to the king was voluntary. “The God who gave us life,” he wrote, “gave us liberty at the same time: the hand of force may destroy, but cannot disjoin them.”

Jefferson was elected to the Second Continental Congress, which met in Philadelphia. He was appointed on June 11, 1776, to head a committee of five in preparing the Declaration of Independence, but the others left the drafting to him. His initial draft was amended, after consultation with Benjamin Franklin and John Adams, and was further altered by Congress, which struck Jefferson’s reference to the voluntary allegiance of colonists to the crown and a clause that censured the monarchy for imposing slavery on America.

While a member of the Virginia House of Delegates, Jefferson introduced a number of bills that were resisted fiercely by conservative planters. In 1776, he succeeded in obtaining the abolition of entail. He proposed to abolish primogeniture, which eventually became law in 1785. Jefferson proudly noted that “these laws, drawn by myself, laid the ax to the foot of pseudoaristocracy.”

Jefferson devised a major revision of the criminal code, although it was not enacted until 1796. His bill to create a free system of tax-supported elementary education for all except slaves was defeated, as were his bills to create a public library and to modernize the curriculum of the College of William and Mary.

In June 1779, Jefferson introduced a bill on religious liberty, which caused intense controversy in Virginia until it was adopted. No other state or nation at that time provided for complete religious freedom. The bill stated “that all men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinions on matters of religion, and that the same shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect their civil capacities.” Many Virginians considered the bill as an attack on Christianity. It did not pass until 1786, mainly through the perseverance of James Madison. Jefferson, by then in France, congratulated Madison, adding that “it is honorable for us to have produced the first legislature who had the courage to declare that the reason of man may be trusted with the formation of his own opinions.”

Jefferson discussed the bill in his 1821 Autobiography:

The bill for establishing religious freedom, the principles of which had, to a certain degree, been enacted before, I had drawn in all the latitude of reason and right. It still met with opposition; but, with some mutilations in the preamble, it was finally passed; and a singular proposition proved that its protection of opinion was meant to be universal. Where the preamble declares, that coercion is a departure from the plan of the holy author of our religion, an amendment was proposed, by inserting the word “Jesus Christ,” so that it should read, “a departure from the plan of Jesus Christ, the holy author of our religion;” the insertion was rejected by a great majority, in proof that they meant to comprehend, within the mantle of its protection, the Jew and the Gentile, the Christian and Mahometan, the Hindoo, and Infidel of every denomination.

While a member of Congress in 1784, as chairman of the committee on the government of western lands, Jefferson proposed an ordinance that provided that the western territories should be self-governing and, when they reached a certain stage of growth, should be admitted to the Union as full partners with the original thirteen states. Jefferson also proposed that slavery should be excluded from all of the American Western territories, including those that would become the southern states west of Georgia, after 1800. Although he himself was a slave owner, he believed that slavery was an evil that should not be permitted to spread. In 1784, the provision banning slavery was narrowly defeated. Had one representative, John Beatty of New Jersey, not been too ill to be present, the vote would have been different. “Thus,” Jefferson later reflected, “we see the fate of millions unborn hanging on the tongue of one man, and heaven was silent in that awful moment.” Although Congress approved the amended ordinance of 1784, it was never put into effect. Its main features were incorporated, however, in the Ordinance of 1787, which established the Northwest Territory, in which slavery was prohibited.

As Minister to France, Jefferson sought commercial treaties with European nations, but only succeeded in getting a pact, drafted by him, with Russia. He complained in a letter that “They seemed, in fact, to know little about us...They were ignorant of our commerce, and of the exchange of articles it might offer advantageously to both parties.” That letter is evidence that the word “commerce” originally meant only trade in tangible commodities.

Jefferson witnessed the beginnings of the French Revolution and even contributed to it by helping the Marquis de Lafayette draft the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, which inspired the French republican movement. However, Jefferson foresaw that the French were not prepared to emulate the American Revolution and advised them to make more modest reforms.

Jefferson followed the ratification debates on the Constitution from France, and in letters to James Madison, urged him to propose a Bill of Rights, which seem to have helped overcome Madison’s initial opposition to doing so.

One of the most important of Jefferson’s writings was the draft of the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798, secretly written while he was Vice-President, which was unanimously adopted with minor modifications. It was followed a year later by the Kentucky Resolutions of 1799. They were part of an effort, in which James Madison joined, to oppose the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. Their main point was that states should refuse to cooperate in the enforcement of unconstitutional acts of Congress, a doctrine called nullification. Its force relied on the fact that the central government depended heavily on state cooperation to enforce its laws. But in the 1798 Resolutions he also made the critical point that the Constitution contained only four delegations of criminal powers: treason, counterfeiting, piracy and felonies on the high seas, and offenses against the laws of nations. (He overlooked discipline of military and militia personnel in federal service, which includes criminal penalties.) His argument was that there was no power delegated to make sedition a crime. Although some states rejected the arguments for nullification, no one disputed that the delegated criminal powers were limited to those few. This is the key to understanding the commerce and necessary and proper clauses and why they do not authorize criminal powers.

Jefferson called his election in 1800 “the second American Revolution,” because it established the “doctrine of 1798” of constitutional interpretation represented by the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798 and 1799, the Virginia Resolution of 1798, and the Virginia Report of 1800, the latter two of which were authored by Madison. His two successors, James Madison and James Monroe, continued that doctrine, and the period 1800–1824 is often called the “Jeffersonian Era” by historians.

Jefferson wrote in 1811 the Manual of Parliamentary Practice, which became the basis for the rules of procedure of Congress, and eventually of Robert’s Rules of Order, which have served to enable deliberative assemblies to be successful ever since. His longest work was Notes on Virginia, and he wrote numerous letters to others, most notably to John Adams, a former rival, using a pantograph to make a duplicate of his letters so that they would be preserved.

It would be difficult to adequately characterize Jefferson’s philosophy. It comes closest to what was called “liberalism” in the nineteenth century, and “classical liberalism” after that term was appropriated by the progressive movement, or to what we call “libertarianism” today, but we should recall his own rejection of such labeling. In a letter to Francis Hopkinson, March 13, 1789, he wrote,

I never submitted the whole system of my opinions to the creed of any party of men whatever in religion, in philosophy, in politics, or in anything else where I was capable of thinking for myself. Such an addiction is the last degradation of a free and moral agent.

However, there is a persistent theme throughout his work and writings that any form of government control, not only of religion, but of individual mercantilism, without strictly construed constitutional authority, was tyranny.

This theme was expressed in a 1787 letter to Abigail Adams, the wife of John Adams:

The spirit of resistance to government is so valuable on certain occasions, that I wish it to be always kept alive. It will often be exercised when wrong, but better so than not to be exercised at all. I like a little rebellion now and then. It is like a storm in the atmosphere.

In a letter to William Smith, Nov. 13, 1787, in which Jefferson expressed approval of Shay’s Rebellion in Massachusetts,

...god forbid we should ever be twenty years without such a rebellion...the tree of Liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots & tyrants. it is natural manure. ...What country can preserve its liberties if its rulers are not warned from time to time that their people preserve the spirit of resistance? Let them take arms. The remedy is to set them right as to facts, pardon & pacify them.

Although it reflects his views, the quote often attributed to Jefferson, “that government is best which governs least” has not been found anywhere in Jefferson’s recorded writings or speeches. It first saw print in 1837, in the editor’s introduction to the first issue of United States Magazine and Democratic

Review, and Henry David Thoreau later used it, without attribution, in “On Civil Disobedience.” Another quote often attributed to Jefferson, “Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty” has also not been found.

Jefferson made many important contributions to religious liberty. He believed in a Creator, but his concept of it seems to have resembled the god of deism. His use in the Declaration of Independence of the terms “the laws of nature and of nature’s God” reflects terms commonly used by deists of the time. However, he was skeptical or opposed to many of the influences and practices of organized religion and their efforts to impose their doctrines on people or on the operations of government.

He is often quoted on the subject from several letters. In one to Dr. Benjamin Rush, Sept. 23, 1800, he stated,

They [the clergy] believe that any portion of power confided to me, will be exerted in opposition to their schemes. And they believe rightly; for I have sworn upon the altar of god, eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man. But this is all they have to fear from me: and enough, too, in their opinion, . . .

In his 1802 letter, as President, to the Danbury Baptist Association of Connecticut, he stated, Believing with you that religion is a matter which lies solely between man and his God, that he owes account to none other for his faith or his worship, that the legislative powers of government reach actions only, and not opinions, I contemplate with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their legislature should ‘make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof,’ thus building a wall of separation between church and State.

It was written to answer a letter from them, asking why he would not proclaim national days of fasting and thanksgiving, as had been done by Washington and Adams before him. In the letter he took the position that the First Amendment forbade not only financial support for religious organizations but also any indication of official support or preference for any religious position. This was a stronger interpretation than had previously been understood by many for the establishment clause and laid the basis for later Supreme Court decisions, beginning with the Everson case.

In a letter to John Adams, April 11, 1823, Jefferson wrote,

The truth is that the greatest enemies to the doctrines of Jesus are those calling themselves the expositors of them, who have perverted them for the structure of a system of fancy absolutely incomprehensible, and without any foundation in his genuine words. And the day will come when the mystical generation of Jesus, by the supreme being as father in the womb of a virgin will be classed with the fable of the generation of Minerva in the brain of Jupiter. But we may hope that the dawn of reason and freedom of thought in these United States will do away with all this artificial scaffolding, and restore us to the primitive and genuine doctrines of this the most venerated reformer of human errors.

Jefferson’s political views were influenced by many political philosophers and writers, especially John Locke, Second Treatise on Government, Algernon Sidney, Discourses Concerning Government, Charles Montesquieu, Spirit of Laws, and the Scottish Enlightenment writers like David Hume, Adam Ferguson, Samuel Rutherford, and Andrew Fletcher. His legal thinking was based on the common law ideas expressed by Edward Coke and the decisions of Lord Camden (Charles Pratt), called “Whig” at that time and opposed to the “Tory” ideas of William Blackstone and Lord Mansfield (William Murray), who divided on several issues, especially the role of the jury in deciding the law as well as the facts in bringing a general verdict, after hearing all arguments on law being made in their presence, a practice that has been abandoned in modern times. He was apparently an admirer of the reform ideas of the English Society for Constitutional Information, the suppression of the leaders of which, through prosecutions for criminal libel, sedition, and treason, inspired several of the provisions of the Bill of Rights. He also admired the English writer James Burgh, who called for reforms in parliamentary representation and recommended everyone read his Political Disquisitions.

In his later years some of his followers called on him to publish more complete guidance to the interpretation of the Constitution, but Jefferson declined, passing that duty to others such as John Taylor of Caroline, “Col. Taylor and myself have rarely, if ever, differed in any political principle of importance,” and expressed his approval of Taylor’s Construction Construed and Constitutions Vindicated as “the most logical retraction of our governments to the original and true principles of the Constitution creating them, which has appeared since the adoption of the instrument.”

Toward the end of his life, however, Jefferson became increasingly concerned that the principles of the Revolution were not being preserved. In a letter to Spencer Roane, Sep. 6, 1819, Jefferson wrote:

. . .the pieces signed Hampden [from the Enquirer] . . . contain the true principles of the revolution of 1800, for that was as real a revolution in the principles of our government as that of 1776 was in its form; not effected indeed by the sword, as that, but by the rational and peaceable instrument of reform, the suffrage of the people. . . .if I understand rightly your quotation from the Federalist, of an opinion that “the judiciary is the last resort in relation to the other departments of the government, but not in relation to the rights of the parties to the compact under which the judiciary is derived.”...The constitution, on this hypothesis, is a mere thing of wax in the hands of the judiciary, which they may twist, and shape into any form they please....My construction of the constitution is very different from that you quote. It is that each department is truly independent of the others, and has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the constitution in the cases submitted to its action;...

In a letter to William Johnson, June 12, 1823, he wrote:

On every question of construction [of the Constitution] let us carry ourselves back to the time when the Constitution was adopted, recollect the spirit manifested in the debates, and instead of trying what meaning may be squeezed out of the text, or intended against it, conform to the probable one in which it was passed.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- Bergh, Albert Ellery, ed. Writings of Thomas Jefferson. 19 vols. (1905). <http://www.constitution.org/tj/jeff.htm>
 Original Rough Draught of the Declaration of Independence. <http://www.constitution.org/tj/tj-orddoi.htm>
Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, Marquis de Lafayette and Thomas Jefferson, 1789. http://www.constitution.org/fr/fr_drm.htm
Manual of Parliamentary Practice. <http://www.constitution.org/tj/tj-mpp.htm>
Robert's Rules of Order Revised—Online version of 1915 edition. <http://www.constitution.org/rror/rror-00.htm>
 See the draft and final versions of the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798, and the Kentucky Resolutions of 1799, in The Virginia Report, Ed. J.W. Randolph. <http://www.constitution.org/rf/vr.htm>
 Wall of separation letter to the Danbury Baptist Association, January 1, 1802. http://www.constitution.org/tj/sep_church_state.htm
Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947).
 “Mansfieldism Reconsidered”, by Jon Roland, 2005. http://www.constitution.org/lrev/jdr/mansfield_recon.htm
 “Presumption of Nonauthority and Unenumerated Rights”, by Jon Roland, 2005. <http://www.constitution.org/911/schol/pnur.htm>

See also Federalization of Criminal Law

JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Inveterate litigators who have been involved in hundreds of criminal and civil cases over the past century, the Jehovah's Witnesses have prompted courts to establish or reinforce judicial safeguards shielding a number of core freedoms, including religious liberty. Their formidable contributions in this realm have aided Americans of all faiths.

The Jehovah's Witnesses, whose faith was founded late in the nineteenth century, are millennialists who believe that the temporal world will soon end with a climatic battle pitting Satan against Jehovah God. After the forces of evil are vanquished in this clash, according to Witness doctrine, a kingdom of heaven will exist on earth for most of those who have maintained fidelity to the teachings of the Scriptures. A select group of others will ascend into heaven and sit at the right hand of God.

Among the Witnesses' more controversial beliefs is their conviction that saluting the American flag amounts to idolatry. Members of the faith traditionally have refrained from participating in flag-salute exercises, because they believe that such ceremonies clearly violate Scriptural prohibitions on worshipping any “graven image.”

The Jehovah's Witnesses controversial position on flag saluting helped to spark perhaps the worst outbreak of religious persecution seen in the United States in the twentieth century. Throughout the early and mid-1940s, Witnesses throughout the United States were pummeled in everything from riots involving hundreds of people to scuffles among a handful of men. Witnesses were so widely abused during the World War II era that many observers compared their plight to the persecution of religious minorities in Nazi Germany.

The U.S. Supreme Court's controversial ruling in Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), contributed to the anti-Witness violence of the period. In an opinion written by Justice Felix Frankfurter, the court denied a claim that the enforcement of a public school district's compulsory flag-salute regulation violated the Witnesses' religious liberty. The perceived anti-Witness tenor of Frankfurter's opinion (combined with the nation's wartime anxieties) proved to be an incendiary combination for the Witnesses. In the months immediately after the Gobitis ruling was handed down, anti-Witness rioting was reported in all but four states.

The Witnesses' persecution went beyond vigilante attacks. Authorities many states and communities enacted new laws or applied existing ones to suppress their constitutional freedoms. Employers and coworkers often discriminated against Witnesses in their workplaces. Expulsions of Witness pupils from public schools became so widespread that members of the faith in dozens of communities were forced to operate their own makeshift schools. Witness parents were charged with neglect or disorderly conduct after the flag-salute expulsions of their children.

In response to this onslaught of intolerance, the Witnesses pursued judicial recognition of their rights, mounting a sustained legal counterattack against all forms of religious discrimination. The Witnesses' legal efforts resulted in hundreds of favorable rulings in municipal, state, and lower federal courts. A group of Witness attorneys worked tirelessly in courtrooms throughout the country to combat the manifestations of religious bigotry that plagued members of their faith. Although their many lower court victories were significant both practically and symbolically, the Witnesses' most noteworthy accomplishments came before the final arbiter of American constitutional rights, the U.S. Supreme Court. From 1938–1946, the high court handed down twenty-three opinions covering a total of thirty-nine Witness-related cases. Among the most significant of these were West Virginia v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943) (in which the Supreme Court reversed its unfortunate decision in the Gobitis flag-salute case) and Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942) (in which the justices established the “fighting words” doctrine in free speech cases). Such decisions profoundly affected the evolution of constitutional law by helping to bring minority and individual rights into the forefront of constitutional jurisprudence. Barnette in particular was a watershed for American civil liberties. Justice Robert Jackson's majority opinion, in which he eloquently defended the Witnesses' First Amendment liberties, has been cited in numerous subsequent cases involving state encroachment on individual freedoms.

Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940), was a particularly significant Witness case of the World War II era. Before Cantwell, the U.S. Supreme Court's opinion in Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878), controlled its religious liberty jurisprudence. Under Reynolds, religious beliefs were inviolable, but religious conduct could be subject to state regulation. This doctrine essentially removed religious conduct from the purview of the First Amendment. Impeded by the Reynolds precedent, litigants pursuing safeguards for religious conduct were forced to seek shelter under other constitutional protections.

The Jehovah's Witnesses were particularly successful in evading the strictures of Reynolds and gaining judicial protections for their religious conduct. When the members of the U.S. Supreme Court shielded the religious conduct of the Jehovah's Witnesses, they typically cited the protections afforded by the First Amendment to speech, press, and assembly rights. In Cantwell, however, the Court more directly addressed a religious liberty claim brought by a Witness.

Police in New Haven, Connecticut, arrested Witness Newton Cantwell and his sons Jesse and Russell in 1938 for disturbing the peace and soliciting money for a charitable cause without having first received approval of the state's public welfare council. They were convicted on both charges in local court, and Connecticut's highest court upheld all of their convictions on the permit requirement charge. (It dismissed the disturbing the peace charges against Newton and Russell Cantwell but upheld Jessie's conviction on that count.)

Witness attorney Hayden Covington appealed the Cantwells' convictions to the U.S. Supreme Court. In two previous cases involving Witness appellants—Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444(1938) and Schneider v. New Jersey, 308 U.S. 147 (1939)—the Court had continued its piecemeal incorporation of First Amendment freedoms into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The First Amendment applied only to actions by the federal government, but the absorption of some of its protections into the Fourteenth Amendment meant that they now applied to actions by the states as well. Those cases, however, had involved speech and press freedoms; the right to free exercise of religion had not yet incorporated.

In Cantwell, the Supreme Court continued the process of incorporation and barred states from abridging the right to free exercise of religion. Justice Owen Roberts's majority opinion in Cantwell by no means indicated that the Supreme Court was totally abandoning its reasoning in Reynolds. Roberts echoed Chief Justice Waite's opinion in that earlier religious liberty case by writing that the free exercise clause encompassed “two concepts—freedom to believe and freedom to act. The first is absolute, but in the nature of things, the second cannot be.” In short, the state might exercise control over some forms of conduct even though they were motivated by an individual's religious beliefs. In the context of the Witnesses proselytizing, this regulation might involve the nondiscriminatory regulation of the time, place, and manner of their public solicitation.

Cantwell differed from Reynolds in the level of scrutiny applied to the actions taken by the state to limit religious conduct. In the Jehovah's Witness case, the Supreme Court viewed the state's regulation under heightened judicial scrutiny. Using this more rigorous standard, the Court determined that the application of the permit requirements to the Cantwells' religious conduct represented an unconstitutional infringement on their religious liberty. Although the Connecticut permit law at issue was neutral on its face, Justice Roberts wrote for the Court, it was so broadly drawn that public officials had wide latitude to take actions infringing on religious liberty.

Cantwell marked a turning point for religious liberty. Never before had the Supreme Court recognized constitutional protections for religious conduct. But Cantwell did not signal that the justices were enthusiastic about claims made strictly under the free exercise clause. In subsequent Jehovah's Witness cases, the Court seemed willing to strike down generally applicable laws only if they were challenged as infringements of multiple First Amendment freedoms.

A handful of Jehovah's Witness cases reached the U.S. Supreme Court in the late 1940s and early 1950s, including Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395 (1953), but their collective impact on constitutional jurisprudence was relatively modest. A smattering of cases followed in the late twentieth century, including, most recently, Stratton v. Watchtower, 536 U.S. 150 (2002). In that case, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down on free speech grounds an Ohio municipality's efforts to regulate the Witnesses' religious proselytizing.

The many cases litigated by the Jehovah's Witnesses have had a formidable impact on the expansion of judicial protections for civil liberties. Many of the seeds of the "rights revolution" of the 1960s were sown as they repeatedly tested the boundaries of the Bill of Rights during the World War II era. By making it more difficult for states and municipalities to regulate religious conduct and speech, the law they helped to create benefited members of all religious faiths.

SHAWN FRANCIS PETERS

References and Further Reading

- Newton, Merlin Owen. Armed with the Constitution: Jehovah's Witnesses in Alabama and the U.S. Supreme Court. Tuscaloosa, AL: University of Alabama Press, 1995.
- Penton, M. James. Apocalypse Delayed: The Story of Jehovah's Witnesses, 2nd Ed. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997.
- Peters, Shawn Francis. Judging Jehovah's Witnesses: Religious Persecution and the Dawn of the Rights Revolution. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)
- Lovell v. Griffin*, 303 U.S. 444 (1938)
- Minersville School District v. Gobitis*, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
- Poulos v. New Hampshire*, 345 U.S. 395 (1953)
- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
- Schneider v. New Jersey*, 308 U.S. 147 (1939)
- Stratton v. Watchtower*, 536 U.S. 150 (2002)
- West Virginia v. Barnette*, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

JENKINS V. GEORGIA, 418 U.S. 152 (1974)

Jenkins was convicted of violating Georgia's obscenity law when he showed "Carnal Knowledge" in his motion picture theater. Although the film received considerable critical acclaim, appeared on many "Top Ten" lists of movies for 1971, and lacked explicit sex scenes (although there was nudity), a local jury found the movie obscene. Georgia's Supreme Court affirmed Jenkins' conviction after noting Georgia's statute was "considerably more restrictive" than the new standard contemporaneously set forth by Miller v. California (1973), raising questions as to jurors' interpretations of the standard and appellate review of their conclusions on the basis of these interpretations.

The Supreme Court unanimously reversed the lower court decision but disagreed on why. Rehnquist wrote the opinion that Burger, White, Blackmun, and Powell joined. Douglas and Brennan wrote separately concurring in the judgment but not the majority's reasons; Marshall and Stewart joined Brennan's concurrence.

Rehnquist seeks to clarify the Court's new approach in Miller. He agrees with Georgia's high court's conclusion that juries do not have to be instructed in state obscenity law when they apply the standards of a "hypothetical state-wide community." Miller approved such instructions but did not mandate them. Rehnquist also agreed with the Georgia court that juror instructions need not specify a "community" when applying "community standards." He points out, "A State may choose to define an obscenity offense in terms of 'contemporary community standards' as defined in Miller without further specification. . . or it may choose to define the standards in more precise geographic terms." The choice was up to the state.

The majority could not agree with Georgia, however, that after a jury decides a film appeals to a "prurient interest" and is "patently offensive" that Miller "virtually precluded all further appellate review" once the jury settles these "questions of fact." Rehnquist explains that "it would be a serious misreading of Miller to conclude that juries have unbridled discretion" in these matters. Moreover, he adds, the Court "took pains" in Miller to provide examples of what constituted patent offensiveness. The purpose of these examples was to "fix substantive constitutional limitations" on the depictions or descriptions of sexual conduct that would not be protected under the First Amendment. Juries were not free of appellate review if they ignored these limitations.

Rehnquist concludes by stating that on the basis of the Court's "own viewing" of "Carnal Knowledge" that it did not depict "hard core" sexual conduct nor did it portray the nudity in the film in a patently offensive way. The film thus fell under the protection of the First Amendment, which mandated that the Georgia court's decision be reversed.

Brennan's concurrence reminds the Court that, as he foresaw in Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973), the reformulated Miller test "does not extricate us from the mire of case-by-case determinations of obscenity." The Court's task, moreover, is not confined under Miller to part (c) and whether a film or other material lacked serious literary or artistic value. Rather Miller, as shown in this present case which involved the screening of "Carnal Knowledge" for the justices, also requires independent appellate review of part (b) and an independent assessment of whether a jury erroneously declares a film or work to be patently offensive. Miller, he concludes, has neither reduced the uncertainties of the process nor the "inevitable stress upon the judiciary."

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Jenkins v. Georgia*, 418 U.S. 153 (1974)
- Miller v. California*, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
- Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton*, 413 U.S. 49 (1973)

JEWS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Both as individuals and as a group, Jews have stood in the forefront of many important struggles for religious liberty in the United States. The dedication of Jews to American religious freedom reflects their long history of persecution abroad; their position until recently as the only numerically significant non-Christian group in the United States; and their prominence in the legal, political, and intellectual life of the nation. As members of the nation's most visible religious minority, they have been important beneficiaries of the free exercise and establishment clauses. Their treatment by the Christian majority has provided a measuring rod of the limits of American religious toleration.

Since colonial times, Jews have found in America a haven from persecution. Even here, however, Jews have suffered from prejudices and until recent times have encountered various forms of legalized discrimination. The small number of Jews who settled in the colonies gradually acquired freedom of worship, but all of the colonies at least formally barred Jews from voting and holding public office. In most of the colonies, Jews were required to contribute to the financial support of established churches. The hope of full political emancipation under a republican government may help to explain why Jews tended to favor independence during the American Revolution.

Although most states after the Revolution removed at least some disabilities from Jews, many forms of institutionalized political discrimination lingered for a long while. Since the establishment and free exercise clauses of the federal constitutions served only as limitations on federal power until the middle of the twentieth century, states were not bound by the free exercise and establishment clauses of the U.S. Constitution, even though many state constitutions contained similar provisions. Until well into the nineteenth century, several New England states imposed taxation for the support of Christian religions. Jews could not vote or hold public office in Connecticut until 1818, in Rhode Island until 1842, and in North Carolina until 1868. Meanwhile, many states continued to restrict legal testimony by Jews. Some state courts upheld discrimination against Jews on the ground that Christianity was part of the common law.

Although the Jewish population grew steadily throughout the nineteenth century and burgeoned early in the twentieth century, Jews continued to encounter many painful and ominous reminders that their legal status was precarious. Jewish insecurity was exacerbated by the continuation of persecution of Jews in other nations and by the persistence of anti-Semitic prejudices in the United States. Discriminatory hiring practices and quotas on admission of Jewish students to universities remained widespread until after the Second World War.

Widespread laws requiring the closing of most businesses on Sundays were a special source of frustration throughout the nineteenth century and most of the twentieth. These laws imposed special hardships on the many Jewish business owners who closed their shops on Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath. Although most legal challenges were unsuccessful, the ongoing campaigns against these so called "blue laws" helped to forge a tradition of legal activism in support of religion and strict separation of church and state.

Jewish opposition to Sunday closing laws culminated in two U.S. Supreme Court decisions, Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market of Massachusetts (1961) and Braunfeld v. Brown (1961), in which the Court rejected arguments by Orthodox Jewish merchants that the closing laws violated both the establishment and free exercise clauses and constituted a denial of equal protection of the laws. A narrowly divided Court held that the statutes were primarily secular in purpose and that they advanced a legitimate state interest by encouraging a uniform day of rest. The Court contended that exceptions would confer unfair economic advantages and present difficult enforcement problems. In one of the dissents, Justice Potter Stewart complained that the Pennsylvania law "grossly violate[d]" the free exercise clause by offering an Orthodox Jew "a cruel choice" between "his religious faith and his economic survival." Although Sunday closing laws have continued to survive constitutional challenges, legislatures have tended to eliminate them in response to the growing secularism and commercialization of society.

Jews also have been sensitive to Protestant Christian practices in the public schools. Unlike Roman Catholics, who established a widespread network of parochial schools, Jews generally preferred to remain in the public schools, which they regarded as providing unique opportunities for assimilation and the erosion of anti-Semitism. Only since the late twentieth century have Jews created significant number of Jewish day schools. Jewish support for an 1869 Cincinnati ordinance that prohibited religious instruction in public schools culminated in a landmark decision of the Ohio Supreme Court, Board of Education v. Minor (1873), which upheld the law on the ground of religious freedom.

Jewish opposition to religious exercises in the public schools contributed to the U.S. Supreme Court's decisions during the early 1960s prohibiting prayer in the public schools and the reading of the Bible for devotional purposes. Jewish individuals and groups were active in opposing the New York Board of Regents' prayer that the Court's decision in Engel v. Vitale (1962) found to violate the establishment clause. Two of the five plaintiffs in that case were Jewish, and amicus briefs were submitted to the Court by the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council (NJCRAC), the Synagogue Council of America (SCA), the American Jewish Committee (AJC), and the Anti-Defamation League (ADL). The same organizations were the only religious organizations to submit briefs in School District of Abington Township v. Schempp (1963), in which the Court declared that the Pennsylvania Bible reading law violated the establishment clause. Jews have remained vigilant in their opposition to religious intrusions in public education.

Even though Jews often have benefited from judicial decisions concerning religious freedom, Jews generally have lost cases before the Supreme Court concerning public accommodation of their special religious concerns. In addition to their rulings in the Sunday closing cases, the Court in Goldman v. Weinberger (1986) upheld an Air Force prohibition on unauthorized head covering that had been challenged by an Air Force psychologist who wore a yarmulke. In its five-to-four decision, the Court emphasized that the judiciary should exercise special deference to the needs of the military. In a sharp dissent, Justice William J. Brennan dismissed as "totally implausible" the military's argument that the wearing of a yarmulke threatened group identity, declaring that "a yarmulke worn with a United States military uniform is an eloquent reminder that the shared and proud identity of United States servicemen embraces and unites religious and ethnic pluralism." The Air Force later repealed the prohibition.

In a 1994 decision, Kiryas Joel School District v. Grumet, the Court invalidated a New York law that had created a special public school district for the education of handicapped children who were members of the Satmar Hasidic sect. The state had created the school district because the Orthodox children were uncomfortable attending public schools with persons whose traditions differed from their own. The Court held that the statute violated the establishment clause by conferring governmental benefits and powers on a group that defined itself in terms of religion in a manner that did not necessarily prevent religious favoritism. Three dissenting Justices emphasized that the statute involved no public aid to religion and did not mention religion.

Jewish organizations have achieved widespread acclaim for their active participation in a broad spectrum of cases involving legal and moral issues. Early in the twentieth century, Reform Rabbi Stephen S. Wise was instrumental in establishing the Joint Committee on Social Action, and Conservative Judaism soon formed a counterpart. As early as 1925, the AJC submitted an amicus brief in Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925) in successfully opposing the constitutionality of an Oregon law that required all children to attend public elementary schools. Jewish organizations were particularly vocal in demanding the dissolution of segregation and other barriers to equality for African Americans. Various Jewish organizations have frequently filed briefs on their own behalf and jointly with non-Jewish organizations such as the American Civil Liberties Union. Briefs submitted by Jewish organizations in civil liberties cases have received much praise for their superior quality.

Despite widespread Jewish support for scrupulous separation of government and religion, Jews during recent years increasingly have expressed fear that rigid separation will undermine all religions, erode public morality, and exacerbate interfaith conflict. Although misgivings about separationism have appeared in all branches of Judaism, hostility against strict separation has been most pronounced among Orthodox Jews. Many Orthodox Jews opposed the Supreme Court's prayer and Bible reading decisions, and others have actively supported public aid to yeshivas and other non-public schools, the placement of menorahs on public property, and school vouchers.

Jews have made major contributions to American law as lawyers, judges, and academics. Seven Jews have served as associate justices of the U.S. Supreme Court: Louis D. Brandeis (1916–1939); Benjamin N. Cardozo (1932–1938); Felix Frankfurter (1939–1962); Arthur J. Goldberg (1962–1965); Abe Fortas (1965–1969); Ruth Bader Ginsburg (since 1993); and Stephen J. Breyer (since 1994).

WILLIAM G. ROSS

References and Further Reading

- Borden, Horton. Jews, Turks, and Infidels. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Cohen, Naomi W. Jews in Christian America: The Pursuit of Religious Equality. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Dalin, David G., ed. American Jews and the Separationist Faith: The New Debate on Religion in Public Life. Washington, D.C.: Ethics and Public Policy Center, 1993.
- Dinnerstein, Leonard. Anti-Semitism in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Feldman, Egal. Dual Destinies: The Jewish Encounter with Protestant America. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990.
- Sachar, Howard M. A History of the Jews in America. New York: Knopf, 1992.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education v. Minor*, 23 Granger (23 Ohio St.) 211 (1873)
- Braunfeld v. Brown*, 366 U.S. 599 (1961)
- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Gallagher v. Crown Kasher Super Market of Massachusetts*, 366 U.S. 617 (1961)
- Goldman v. Weinberger*, 475 U.S. 503 (1986)
- Kiryas Joel School District v. Grumet*, 512 U.S. 687 (1994)
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
- School District of Abington Township v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)

JIMMY SWAGGART MINISTRIES v. BOARD OF EQUALIZATION OF CALIFORNIA, 493 U.S. 378 (1990)

Many states impose a sales tax on retail sellers for the tangible personal property they sell, California among them. Between 1974 and 1981, Jimmy Swaggart Ministries, a religious evangelical organization, held numerous religious events across the country, twenty-three of them in California. At these events the Ministries sold books and other merchandise, both religious and nonreligious.

In 1980, California's Board of Equalization informed the Ministries that its sales were not exempt from California's Sales and Use Tax. The Ministries objected, saying that the First Amendment exempted its products from the tax but eventually paid the money it owed. It then filed a petition for redetermination—essentially, a request that the Board review its objection—and petitioned for a refund of the paid amount. The Board denied, and the Ministries sued for a refund.

The lower California courts ruled that the Ministries was entitled to no tax refund, and the California Supreme Court denied a request to use its discretionary review. The United States Supreme Court agreed with the state courts.

For the First Amendment to be violated, the tax would have had to place a “substantial burden on the observation of a central religious belief or practice” that would require a “compelling governmental interest” to withstand the Ministries' challenge. The Court had phrased it so in Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue the previous year.

The Ministries relied primarily on Murdock v. Pennsylvania and Follett v. Town of McCormick to argue that a state could not require a religious organization to pay taxes on the religious materials it conveyed to people through evangelical distribution. In Murdock, the Court had held unconstitutional a city ordinance requiring licenses to canvass or solicit, because of the burden it placed on Jehovah's Witnesses. The Court said that the practice of handing out religious materials was protected conduct. In Follett, the Court struck down an ordinance requiring all booksellers to pay a flat license fee to be permitted to sell books.

The Court distinguished these two cases, saying that although flat licensing fees are unconstitutional because they impose prior restraints on religious liberty, general taxation on activities that might be religious, however, is permissible. Because the tax imposed in this case was on items sold, not general exercise of religious liberty, the Court held the Ministries were not exempt. The Court further noted that the tax was not on the right to exercise religious freedom but rather on the privilege of earning money from selling tangible personal property. The court did not find that implementation of the tax would cripple the Ministries' evangelical efforts or excessively entangle government in its affairs.

The ruling here went against the cases that have been called the Court's “separationist” cases, because it permits increased state regulation of religious affairs, giving religious organizations less independence from generally applicable laws. This trend culminated in Employment Division, Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, where the Court held that generally applicable laws that incidentally burden religious exercise are constitutional.

ADAM GITLIN

References and Further Reading

- Green, Steven K., Shifting into Neutral? Emerging Perspectives on the Separation of Church and State, Boston College Law Review 43 (2002): 1111–1112.
- Scharffs, Brett G., The Autonomy of Church and State, Brigham Young University Law Review 2004 (2004): 1217–1282.
- Smolla, Rodney A., and Melville B. Nimmer. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech: A Treatise on the First Amendment. Vol. 2, section 22:23, 3rd Rd. New York and Oakland, Calif.: Matthew Bender, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Employment Division, Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Follett v. Town of McCormick*, 321 U.S. 573 (1944)
- Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue*, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)
- Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Commissioner of Revenue*, 460 U.S. 575 (1983)
- Murdock v. Pennsylvania*, 319 U.S. 105 (1943)

See also Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Follett v. Town of McCormick, S.C., 321 U.S. 573 (1944); Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)

JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY

The John Birch Society (JBS) carried the mantle of post-World War II extreme anticommunism into later decades. Robert Welch founded this grassroots political organization in 1958. Four years to the month after the censure of Wisconsin Senator Joseph McCarthy, Welch assembled eleven of his prominent conservative friends in Indianapolis. The JBS resulted from this two-day meeting. Welch, a retired candy-maker and former vice-president of the National Association of Manufacturers, led the Society from its inception until his death in 1985.

The “Birchers” took their name from a Baptist missionary to China, who became an intelligence operative for the U.S. Air Force during and after World War II. The Society regarded John Birch as a martyr and the first casualty of the Cold War because of his death at the hands of Chinese Communists. However, unlike its namesake’s reputation as a staunch guardian of theological precision, the John Birch Society was not primarily concerned with religious matters. The gospel message of the Society at its founding consisted of vehement opposition to Communism.

Much like Senator McCarthy before them, the leadership of the organization indulged in sweeping and imprecise accusations. The group suspected that even the most prominent conservatives acted on behalf of a great Communist plot. In 1960, the Chicago Daily News published a letter written by Welch and circulated to Society members. In it Welch expressed his conviction that former President “Dwight Eisenhower is a dedicated, conscious agent of the Communist conspiracy.” Such accusations caused many within the Republican Party to question the Society’s intentions. Even still, the group continued to participate within national politics. The John Birch Society reached its political zenith with its mobilization in support of the unsuccessful Presidential campaign of Barry Goldwater in 1964. The estimated membership of the group peaked between 60,000 and 100,000.

The Society depends on conspiracy theories for its continued existence. Since its inception, the group expressed its opposition to such activities as the United States’ participation in the United Nations on grounds that it was a front for Communist activity. In 1966, Birchers began shifting their focus to another conspiracy against American freedom. Welch and other Society leaders through the rest of the twentieth century elaborated on a 200-year-old theory that a small group of individuals actually control global economics and politics and were behind the rise of Communism itself. This alleged group, often referred to as the Illuminati or the Insiders, still receives attention in JBS publications. Ironically, the right-wing organization is often an integral part of left-wing conspiracy theories as well.

In 1989, the organization moved its headquarters from Belmont, Massachusetts, to Appleton, Wisconsin, Senator McCarthy’s hometown. It continues to oppose internationalism and civil rights initiatives. The JBS is not anti-Semitic, unlike many other radical right groups, and includes Jewish members. Upswings in right-wing populism during the 1990s caused an increase in membership; however, the John Birch Society remains significantly less influential than its heyday during the 1960s.

KEVIN JAMES HOUK

See also McCarthy, Joseph

JOHNSON, FRANK MINIS JR. (1918–1999)

Born in the hill country of Winston County, Alabama, Johnson came to nationwide prominence as one of the most effective and progressive federal judges in the 1960s and 1970s. As the son of the only Republican member of the Alabama Legislature, he knew from an early age that it took strength and self-confidence to espouse unpopular views. He graduated from the University of Alabama Law School, served in the U.S. Army in World War II, and joined a small general law practice in northern Alabama. In 1953, President Eisenhower appointed Johnson the federal prosecutor in Birmingham, where he successfully prosecuted modern-day slavery charges against white farmers who held African-American workers in involuntary servitude. Two years later, Eisenhower appointed him to become the federal judge in Montgomery, the Alabama state capital. At thirty-six, he was the youngest federal judge in the country. Within six months, he ruled on litigation stemming from the Montgomery bus boycott, issuing the first opinion that extended to public transportation the Brown v. Board of Education rationale that had prohibited racial discrimination in education. Many famous civil rights cases followed, with Johnson ruling on a parade of successful efforts to desegregate public parks, public schools, public facilities, and public employment, including the state troopers, and to expand voting rights. In addition, he issued opinions upholding the right of women to serve on juries and to receive equal treatment in the military.

Although recognized in the national press as a civil rights judge, Johnson also left a profound mark on civil liberties litigation. In 1965, Alabama refused to allow civil rights demonstrators to rally to protest against the state's interference with the right to vote until Johnson ruled that the massive march could use major portions of the public highways to walk from Selma to Montgomery to petition the state government for redress of grievances. In subsequent years Johnson's rulings in cases involving speech and association regularly favored freedom of expression. For example, he reinstated a student editor expelled for criticizing the president of a state university, prevented a public high school from firing a teacher for assigning satirical stories, prohibited university officials from canceling anti-war speakers on campus, and overturned a state law requiring journalists to file financial interest statements before covering the legislature.

Johnson's most important impact on civil liberties appeared not in First Amendment cases, however, but in his rulings affecting institutionalized individuals. In a series of groundbreaking opinions, he ruled that patients committed to state mental institutions have a constitutional right to adequate and effective treatment. "To deprive any citizen of his or her liberty . . . for . . . therapeutic reasons and then fail to provide adequate treatment violates the very fundamentals of due process," he wrote in Wyatt v. Stickney, and issued orders setting minimum constitutional standards for the care of the involuntarily confined mentally ill and mentally retarded. In related litigation, he overturned the Alabama civil commitment statute.

In addition, extensive hearings on prison conditions led Johnson to conclude that Alabama unconstitutionally confined prisoners in facilities unfit for human habitation where they received no medical care and lived in constant fear of violence. His detailed court orders establishing standards to eliminate the persistent unconstitutional conditions in the prisons and mental institutions were innovative and assuredly controversial. As the first judge to enforce the rights of confined individuals by structural injunctions, remedial orders requiring thoroughgoing overhauls of entire state institutional systems, Johnson's precedents had influence on courts and legislatures around the nation. His rulings inspired Congress to authorize the U.S. Department of Justice to sue on behalf of institutionalized persons anywhere in the nation to remedy a pattern of constitutional violations.

Although criticized vituperatively in Alabama and threatened with death so frequently that federal marshals provided around-the-clock protection from 1961–1975, Johnson ultimately received both local and national acclaim as a courageous and fair judge. In 1979, President Carter appointed Johnson to the federal appellate court where he displayed his continued concern with civil liberties. He overturned the Alabama statutes authorizing voluntary prayer in public schools. He wrote the first opinion asserting that undocumented children have the constitutional right to a free public education. His opinion in Hardwick v. Bowers emphasized autonomy and privacy rights in striking down the Georgia sodomy statute; it was reversed by the Supreme Court in 1986 but was ultimately approved seventeen years later by the Supreme Court in Lawrence v. Texas.

Johnson reduced his judicial workload in 1991, when he took senior status as a judge. He died in Montgomery, Alabama, in 1999.

MARYELLEN FULLERTON

References and Further Reading

Bass, Jack. Taming the Storm: The Life and Times of Judge Frank M. Johnson, Jr., and the South's Fight over Civil Rights. New York: Doubleday, 1993.

Sikora, Frank. The Judge: The Life & Opinions of Alabama's Frank M. Johnson, Jr. Montgomery: Black Belt Press, 1992.

Yarborough, Tinsley E. Judge Frank Johnson and Human Rights in Alabama. University: University of Alabama Press, 1981.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)

Hardwick v. Bowers, 760 F. 2d 1202 (11th Cir. 1985), vacated 804 F. 2d 622 (11th Cir. 1986)

Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)

Wyatt v. Stickney, 325 F. Supp. 781 (M.D. Ala. 1971)

JOHNSON, LYNDON BAINES (1908–1973)

Lyndon B. Johnson, thirty-sixth president of the United States, took office on November 22, 1963, after the assassination of President John F. Kennedy and served until 1969. From the beginning of his presidency, Johnson had issues in regards to wiretapping and privacy. On one hand, Johnson was seemingly unconcerned with government intrusion into privacy. In more than five years in office, he secretly recorded more than 10,000 conversations without the other parties' knowledge both on the telephone and in his White House office. He did not hesitate to use the FBI to secretly record his political opponents during the 1964 Democratic party convention. He planted bugs in embassies and private residences to monitor Richard Nixon's presidential campaign in 1968. Both FBI and foreign intelligence was gathered by electronic means. Yet Johnson's papers and private conversations on wiretapping and bugging suggested a degree of disgust at the method of information gathering. When asked his preference on wiretapping, Johnson favored a complete ban on all taps, even in the interest of national security. He also wanted a law banning non-phone electronic bugging devices. In May 1966, when IRS commissioner Sheldon Cohen attempted to justify the IRS's use of eavesdropping and wiretapping, Johnson told him to stop all surveillance—microphones, taps, or other hidden devices—legal or illegal, if he was going to work for him. Ramsey Clark described Johnson's outrages about any wiretapping or bugging in domestic areas by saying he did not want to live in a country where people were allowed to use those surveillance devices.

In his 1967 State of the Union address, Johnson stated: "We should outlaw all wiretapping—public and private—wherever and whenever it occurs, except when the security of this Nation itself is at stake and only then with the strictest governmental safeguards.

And we should exercise the full reach of our constitutional powers to outlaw electronic 'bugging' and 'snooping.'" Despite this pronouncement, Johnson had his vice-president's phone, Hubert H. Humphrey, bugged out of fear he would deviate from the party's line on Vietnam during 1968, and he continued to tap him up to and including Humphrey's unsuccessfully bid for the presidency.

In early 1967, Johnson asked Congress to pass the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act, a bill described as increasing crime control. The act also recommended Congress pass the Right of Privacy Act outlawing all public and private wiretapping with the only exceptions being for national security "and then only under the strictest safeguards." Johnson's biographer Robert Dallek posed the question about whether Johnson opposed all tapping and bugging intrusions except for those done by or for himself and whether Johnson believed he alone had the right to monitor private conversations. Dallek argued that Johnson held a "genuine aversion" to wiretapping and the invasions of privacy the FBI had been committing for a long time. It deeply bothered him that anyone, including Hoover and the FBI, had black-mail control over political leaders through information obtained through secretive listening devices.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

Beschloss, Michael, ed. Reaching for Glory: Lyndon Johnson's Secret White House Tapes, 1964–1965. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2001.

Califano, Joseph. The Triumph and Tragedy of Lyndon Johnson: The White House Years. College Station, TX: Texas A&M University Press, 2000.

Dallek, Robert. Flawed Giant: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, 1961–1973. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

See also Privacy; Right to Privacy

JONES v. WOLF, 443 U.S. 595 (1979)

When a local church decides to leave its denomination or when it splits into factions, the underlying conflict frequently revolves around issues of religious doctrine. When the conflicting parties each claim ownership of the church's property, a court often must resolve the dispute and yet it must avoid inquiring into doctrinal issues. For a court to intrude into a doctrinal controversy would result in an entanglement with church affairs that would raise free exercise and establishment clause concerns. In Jones v. Wolf, the Supreme Court approved constitutionally valid methods for resolving these disputes without interfering with church autonomy.

By a majority vote, the congregation of the Vineville Presbyterian church of Macon, Georgia, left its denomination, the Presbyterian Church of the United States, to join a more conservative denomination, the Presbyterian Church in America. The congregation's majority, voting for the change, and the minority, still loyal to the liberal denomination, each claimed ownership of the congregation's assets. In the Georgia state courts, the majority faction prevailed.

The state courts avoided inquiring into church doctrine and instead considered the relevant deeds. All the deeds named the local church's trustees as grantees, except one that named the local church itself as grantee. The trustees complied with the wishes of the majority faction. The courts further agreed that there was no contradictory provision in the local church's corporate charter, state statutes, or the denomination's book of order. According to the courts, a religiously neutral analysis dictated that the majority faction owned the church property. The U.S. Supreme Court found the method of the state courts to be constitutional.

The Court thus reaffirmed its earlier holding in Presbyterian Church v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church that it violates the First Amendment for courts to decide theological issues in the process of resolving property disputes. Presbyterian Church, in turn, reaffirmed the main ruling in an earlier decision that was not decided on constitutional grounds but reflected an awareness of the philosophy of the First Amendment, Watson v. Jones.

The Court also expanded on its statement in Presbyterian Church that courts could resolve these disputes by applying the neutral principles of law developed for use in all property disputes, that is, the method used by the Georgia courts. Previously, the Court had also affirmed a case applying neutral principles, but only in a brief per curiam opinion, Maryland & Virginia Eldership of the Churches of God v. Church of God at Sharpsburg, Inc. Here, in a full opinion, the Court gave approval to using neutral principles of law to resolve a church property dispute.

The Court, however, also acknowledged another method that it had previously authorized for resolving the issue, deferring to the decision of church authorities. Under the deference method, in a hierarchical church, such as the Roman Catholic Church, the determination of the denomination would control. In a congregational church, such as a Baptist denomination, the majority of the local church normally would make the dispositive decision. In addition, a church could choose some other method for resolving the dispute. For example, a local church may have turned over control of its property to a regional or national board of the denomination. At the same time, the Court neglected to face the recurring issue of determining whether a church is hierarchical or congregational. The Presbyterian denominations, for example, seem to be hybrids of the two organizational models.

Furthermore, the Court stated that still other methods of determination might be permissible. According to the Court, "a State may adapt any one of various approaches for settling church property disputes, so long as it involves no consideration of doctrinal matters, whether the ritual and liturgy of worship or tenets of faith." At the same time, the Court voiced its expectation that churches would restructure and state their property relationships in secular terms to permit a court to resolve disputes without encountering ecclesiastical questions.

Jones v. Wolf gives courts some latitude in resolving these difficult disputes while still avoiding intrusion into doctrinal matters. However, the cases often remain difficult ones. The central issue is often doctrinal, and yet a court must find a solution without addressing that issue. With the neutral principles method, courts also often must look to nonreligious language in ecclesiastical documents, even when one party claims that the language is infused with religious meaning.

The Court thus has offered ways to protect religious rights in disputes over church property. However, whether these methods resolve the disputes accurately remains an open question.

LOUIS J. SIRICO, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Rotunda, Ronald, John E. Nowak, and J. Nelson Young. Treatise on Constitutional Law: Substance and Procedure. Vol. 3. St. Paul, MN: West, 1986, pp. 424-432.
- Sirico, Louis J., Jr., Church Property Disputes: Churches as Secular and Alien Institutions, Fordham Law Review 55 (1986): 3:335-362.
- , The Constitutional Dimensions of Church Property Disputes, Washington University Law Quarterly 59 (1981): 1:1-79.
- Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 2nd Ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988, pp. 1232-1242.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Maryland & Virginia Eldership of the Churches of God v. Church of God at Sharpsburg, Inc.*, 396 U.S. 367 (1970)
- Presbyterian Church v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church*, 393 U.S. 449 (1969)
- Watson v. Jones*, 80 (13 Wall.) 679 (1872)

See also Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 679 (1872)

JOSEPH BURSTYN, INC. v. WILSON, 343 U.S. 495 (1952)

Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson represents an important landmark in the development of First Amendment jurisprudence on expressive freedom in mass media. In the 1915 case of Mutual Film Corp. v. Industrial Commission, the first Supreme Court controversy involving the motion picture industry, the justices ruled that “the exhibition of moving pictures is a business pure and simple, . . . not to be regarded . . . as part of the press of the country or as organs of public opinion.” Almost contemporaneously, the Court reasoned in the 1922 case of Federal Baseball Club of Baltimore, Inc. v. National League that “exhibitions of base ball . . . are purely state affairs” and that transportation facilitating games “between clubs from different cities” is “a mere incident” to interstate commerce. Although oddly contradictory, these proclamations had the effect of insulating both movies and baseball from the jurisdiction of the federal courts. By declaring motion pictures outside the scope of the First Amendment, Mutual Film eliminated constitutional protection of the movie industry for a generation.

In the 1948 decision of United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., the Supreme Court treated “moving pictures, like newspapers and radio,” as part of the press whose freedom is guaranteed by the First Amendment.” Four years later, the Court would decisively resolve the tension between Mutual Film and Paramount in favor of constitutional protection of motion pictures. The 1952 decision of Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson concerned a New York statute that allowed the state department of education to forbid the exhibition of any “film or a part thereof?” that was “obscene, indecent, immoral, inhuman, sacrilegious, or . . . of such a character that its exhibition would tend to corrupt morals or incite to crime.” Joseph Burstyn, Inc., owned the exclusive rights to distribute throughout the United States an Italian film called The Miracle. In November 1950, after examining the film, the motion picture division of the education department, issued a license authorizing exhibition of The Miracle, with English subtitles, as part of a trilogy called Ways of Love. The Miracle proved quite controversial, and hundreds of letters, telegrams, and post cards, both protesting and supporting the film persuaded the New York State Board of Regents to review the film.

In February 1951, the regents determined that The Miracle was “sacrilegious,” and on that ground ordered the rescission of Burstyn’s license to exhibit the film. New York courts upheld the regents’ action.

On appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court recognized Burstyn as “the first to present squarely . . . the question whether motion pictures are within the ambit of protection which the First Amendment, through the Fourteenth, secures to any form of ‘speech’ or ‘the press.’” The Court held “that motion pictures are a significant medium for the communication of ideas.” Writing for the Court, Justice Tom Clark recognized that the movies “may affect public attitudes and behavior in a variety of ways, ranging from direct espousal of a political or social doctrine to the subtle shaping of thought which characterizes all artistic expression.” The movies’ significance “as an organ of public opinion,” the Court observed, “is not lessened by the fact that they are designed to entertain as well as to inform.” Nor would the Court dilute constitutional protection for motion pictures on the ground that they “are published and sold for profit.” Like “books, newspapers, and magazines,” motion pictures won recognition as “a form of expression whose liberty is safeguarded by the First Amendment.” The Court thereupon included “expression by means of motion pictures . . . within the free speech and free press guaranty of the First and Fourteenth Amendments” and overruled contrary language in Mutual Film.

Seven years after Burstyn, the Supreme Court’s decision in Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents invalidated a ban on nonobscene portrayals of “sexual immorality [as] desirable, acceptable, or proper . . . behavior.” Burstyn continues to influence contemporary First Amendment jurisprudence. Landmark cases such as Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC and FCC v. Pacifica Foundation have cited Burstyn for the proposition that “differences in the characteristics of new media justify differences in the First Amendment standards applied to them.”

JIM CHEN

Cases and Statutes Cited

FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
Federal Baseball Club of Baltimore, Inc. v. National League, 259 U.S. 200 (1922)
Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U.S. 684 (1959)
Mutual Film Corp. v. Industrial Commission, 236 U.S. 230 (1915)
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)
United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U.S. 131 (1948)
See also Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC*, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)

JOURNALISM AND SOURCES

It could be said that a journalist is only as good as his or her sources. Journalists carefully cultivate a variety of sources to provide their readers and viewers with diverse perspectives and fair, balanced, and complete news stories.

No journalist in a democratic society would be content to rely solely on a press release as the primary source for a story. Sources are not limited to people but can include documents and other fruits of news gathering, such as photographs, audio recordings, and videotapes.

Journalists may use government information such as judicial or executive branch agency records to provide an initial tip or story idea or to corroborate data provided informally by individuals. For example, statutes such as Freedom of Information and Sunshine Laws create affirmative rights of access to government records and proceedings for both the press and the public, and court rules and common law principles, as well as Constitutional provisions, guarantee Access to Judicial Records and Access to Courts. Similarly, a business reporter might consult industry spokespersons to obtain basic information about a corporation but will also contact current and former employees, contractors, government regulators, and consumers to flesh out the story.

Attempts by prosecutors and defense lawyers to issue subpoenas to reporters to obtain their testimony or to compel them to produce unpublished materials are usually resisted, often by relying on state Shield Laws that provide journalists with varying degrees of protection.

Journalists fiercely guard their sources, for competitive as well as ethical reasons. Although the Supreme Court, in Branzburg v. Hayes (1972), refused to recognize a comprehensive First Amendment testimonial privilege and in Herbert v. Lando (1979) was particularly skeptical of the existence of any privilege in libel cases, most reporters consider a promise of confidentiality to be sacred and will face sanctions, including jail or monetary fines, if necessary to protect the identity of a source. They realize that the failure to honor a promise to a source means that sources will “dry up” and that the public will receive less information as a result. In Cohen v. Cowles Media (1991), the Supreme Court held that a promise to conceal a source’s identity could be enforced by a court without violating the First Amendment rights of the journalist.

Sources may also be compromised through the execution of search warrants. In Zurcher v. Stanford Daily (1978), the Supreme Court ruled that news organizations are protected from unreasonable searches by the Fourth Amendment, but Congress subsequently passed the Privacy Protection Act (1980) to ensure that newsrooms would be subject to search only under very limited circumstances.

Journalists must always be on their guard to avoid being “used” by a source to transmit disinformation and must strive to remain sufficiently detached from a story or a source so that their ability to analyze it objectively is not compromised. Reliance on too many confidential or undisclosed sources can undermine the credibility of a story and erode the confidence of readers and viewers.

JANE E. KIRTLEY

References and Further Reading

- Blasi, Vince, The Newman's Privilege: An Empirical Study, Michigan Law Review 70 (1971): 229–284.
 Dalglish, Lucy A., ed. Agents of Discovery: A Report on the Incidence of Subpoenas Served on the News Media in 2001. Arlington: The Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 2003.
 Kirtley, Jane E. “Shield Laws and Reporter’s Privilege: A National Assessment.” in Surette, Ray, ed. The Media and Criminal Justice Policy. Springfield: Charles C. Thomas, 1990, pp. 163–176.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Branzburg v. Hayes*, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)
Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663 (1991)
Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153 (1979)
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978)

See also Access to Judicial Records; Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972); Cohen v. Cowles Media Company, 501 U.S. 663 (1991); Freedom of Information Act (1966); Freedom of Information and Sunshine Laws; Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153 (1979); Media Access to Information; Privacy Protection Act, 94 Stat. 1879 (1980); Reporter’s Privilege; Shield Laws; Subpoenas to Reporters; Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978)

JUDICIAL BIAS

Judges are required to be neutral, impartial, and free of influences that would tend to make it difficult for them to decide cases on their merits. At the same time, American judges do not form a distinct profession, trained and socialized apart from lawyers, as is true in most civil-law systems. When a lawyer becomes a judge, we expect him or her to draw to some extent from his or her personal and professional experience before taking to the bench. The reality is that judges have social and professional connections, financial and personal interests, and views on matters of public concern. This reality is in tension with the ideal of neutrality that is central to the judge’s role.

The law regulating judicial bias attempts to sort out “contaminating” influences from those connections and interests that are thought to be relatively innocuous. Most states have adopted some form of the American Bar Association’s Model Code of Judicial Conduct, which specifies circumstances under which a judge ought to recuse himself or herself from participating in a case. In addition, federal and state statutes and court rules create mechanisms for the litigants to challenge the impartiality of a judge.

The most straightforward cases of judicial bias involve financial entanglements and pecuniary interests that might cause the judge to favor one litigant over another in the hope of realizing personal gain. More difficult cases arise from civic and charitable activities, political and personal associations, and family relationships. It is unreasonable to expect judges to isolate themselves from social clubs and friendships, yet these associations may create the appearance of partiality in some cases. Judges are prohibited from belonging to organizations that practice invidious discrimination but may maintain extrajudicial associations as long as they do not cause the judge’s impartiality to be reasonably questioned. For example, in a memorandum in which he decided that he need not recuse himself from deciding a case in which he had gone duck hunting with Vice President Dick Cheney, Justice Scalia cited a long list of incidents in which judges had maintained cordial relationships with political officials who were parties in cases before those judges (Cheney v. U.S. District Court).

Perhaps the most difficult issue of all relates to the tension between the political values of accountability and impartiality. To enhance the accountability of judges to the democratic political process, many states have an elected judiciary, or at least require judges to stand for period retention elections. Although state codes of conduct have attempted to restrict judges from talking about their political views during election campaigns, the Supreme Court has held that some of these restrictions violate the First Amendment (Republican Party of Minnesota v. White). It would appear difficult to reconcile the ideal of judicial neutrality with the expectation of voters that candidates for judicial office have political beliefs that bear on how the candidates might decide cases. The White decision favors transparency over the approach of the state codes, which was to prohibit reference to political beliefs.

W. BRADLEY WENDEL

References and Further Reading

Shaman, Jeffrey M., Steven Lubet, and James J. Alfani. Judicial Conduct and Ethics. 3rd Ed. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law Publishing, 2000.

Stark, Andrew. Conflict of Interest in American Public Life. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.

Wendel, W. Bradley, The Ideology of Judging and the First Amendment in Judicial Election Campaigns, South Texas Law Review 43 (2001): 73–123.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Cheney v. United States District Court, 541 U.S. 913 (2004)
Republican Party of Minnesota v. White, 536 U.S. 765 (2002)

ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct (2004)

See also Due Process; Impartial Decisionmaker

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS AND REFERENCES TO THE DEITY

References to the deity are commonplace in American courtrooms. Perhaps the most familiar of these are oaths administered in court, by which jurors swear to perform their duties or witnesses swear to tell the truth “so help me God.” In addition, court proceedings themselves, including proceedings of the U.S. Supreme Court, sometimes begin with the formal invocation of divine aid: “God save this honorable court.” Less frequently, particular judges may sponsor prayers or the display of religious symbols such as the Ten Commandments in their courtrooms. Moreover, attorneys sometimes make arguments that touch on religious imagery, sacred texts—especially the Bible, and miscellaneous religious themes. These various practices raise issues under the free exercise and free speech clauses, as well as the establishment clause.

Concern for the free speech and religious free exercise rights of jurors and witnesses has gradually prompted revision to long-standing forms of oaths in many American courtrooms. Freedom of speech and free exercise of religion have frequently been understood to mean that individuals cannot be forced to utter sentiments to which they do not adhere. Consequently, many courtrooms now permit both witnesses and jurors to affirm their commitment to tell the truth or fulfill the obligations of a juror rather than to swear in the name of God a commitment to do so. Moreover, at least some courts have held that this kind of accommodation is mandated by the free speech clause, the free exercise clause, or both.

Formal or ritualistic references to the deity in court proceedings might also be thought of as violating the establishment clause of the first amendment, which the Supreme Court has variously interpreted as prohibiting government actions with the purpose or effect of significantly advancing religion or of endorsing religion. Nevertheless, the use of oaths invoking the deity or of formal invocations such as "God save this honorable court" has not been prohibited by the Supreme Court. Although it has not considered these issues specifically, the Court's general holdings concerning public religious practices would suggest that these formal invocations of divine aid would survive a challenge under the establishment clause. In Marsh v. Chambers (1984), the Court upheld the practice of having a chaplain chosen by a state legislature offer prayers at the beginning of a legislative session. There, the Court drew attention to the long tradition of such public prayers in American history, emphasizing that legislative prayers had become "part of the fabric of our society." Presumably, the Court would find similar historical blessing for the practice of oaths in the name of God or ritual invocations such as "God save this honorable court." The Court might also rely on the concept of "ceremonial deism" to analyze formal references to God in the courtroom. Justice William Brennan suggested in a concurring opinion to the decision in Lynch v. Donnelly (1984) that certain public religious references, such as the designation of our national motto as "In God we trust" and the inclusion of the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance, had "lost through rote repetition any significant religious content." References to the deity in formal oaths or ritual invocations at the beginning of court sessions might similarly be thought of as forms of "ceremonial deism" and thus immune from establishment clause challenges.

Less formal references to the deity in judicial proceedings, such as invited prayers from clergy or the display of religious symbols such as the Ten Commandments, pose more serious issues under the establishment clause. These practices can claim less shelter under the mantle of tradition. Moreover, their religiousness has not been blunted by formal repetition. Accordingly, at least some courts have found these kinds of references to violate the establishment clause. In Alabama, for example, in the summer of 2001, the chief justice of the state's supreme court attempted to install a permanent monument to the Ten Commandments in the state judicial building. Lower federal courts declared the display of this monument unconstitutional. When the chief justice refused to comply with a court order that he remove the monument, the other justices on the court intervened to have the monument removed from its public location, and the chief justice was first suspended and then later removed from his judicial office. A few courts have approved the display of the Ten Commandments in or around court buildings, but these have generally involved displays that have been in place for many years. The continued display of religious symbols with a more venerable local history may be thought of as respecting tradition rather than advancing particular religious sentiments.

Finally, religious references are not uncommon in arguments made by lawyers in the course of trials. Attorneys in death penalty cases, for example, will sometimes tender Biblical texts in support of, or in opposition to, the application of the death penalty; and the discussion of these texts will sometimes include references to God. A few jurisdictions declare these religious comments off-limits for lawyers. Nevertheless, the more common result has been for courts to permit lawyers to make passing references to God or to passages or illustrations from the Bible, treating these references as falling within the general rhetorical vocabulary of American culture.

TIMOTHY L. HALL

References and Further Reading

- Curry, Thomas J. Farewell to Christendom: The Future of Church and State in America. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- Levine, Samuel J., Religious Symbols and Religious Garb in the Courtroom: Personal Values and Public Judgments, Fordham Law Review 66 (1998): 1505-1540.
- Levy, Leonard W. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. 2nd Rev. Ed. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lynch v. Donnelly*, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
- Marsh v. Chambers*, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)

See also Ceremonial Deism; Civil Religion; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Forced Speech; Lemon Test; Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984); Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983); No Endorsement Test

JUDICIAL RESOLUTION OF CHURCH PROPERTY DISPUTES

Throughout American history, courts have been called on to adjudicate disputes between members of a religious organization, particularly disputes involving control of the organization's property. Such disputes typically arise when a local church splits into two factions over a theological issue and both factions claim ownership of the church's property. These cases pose serious difficulties for courts, because they raise concerns of judicial intrusion on the rights of the members of the religious organizations to define their own identity. Courts have differed with regard to the appropriate standard to apply when called on to resolve such disputes.

The U.S. Supreme Court first addressed the question of the role of courts in resolving such property disputes in Watson v. Jones (1872). The Watson case arose when the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church in Louisville, Kentucky, divided over its denomination's position on slavery. Both the proslavery and the anti-slavery factions claimed exclusive use of the church property. Litigation ensued, eventually reaching the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court in Watson articulated several principles that would have a significant impact on subsequent jurisprudence pertaining to the judicial resolution of church property disputes. First, the Court concluded that if the property in question had been given to the church with the express condition that the property be "devoted to the teaching, support, or spread of some specific form of religious doctrine or belief," then "it will be the duty of the court in such cases...to inquire whether the party accused of violating the trust is holding or teaching a different doctrine, or using a form of worship which is so far variant as to defeat the declared objects of the trust." In most cases, however, there is not an express trust in place; absent such a trust, the Court concluded that civil courts should not resolve the question whether there had been a departure from the doctrinal position of the original donor.

In taking this position, the Court rejected the English implied trust doctrine pursuant to which church property was deemed to be held in trust for the propagation of the particular religious doctrines of the church's founders. Under this implied trust doctrine, civil courts, when called on, had the responsibility to determine which group of contemporary church members maintained fidelity to those original religious doctrines—even if the founders had not expressly required such fidelity. The Court in Watson rejected this view that members of a church are impliedly bound to conform to the doctrines adhered to by the church founders and that civil courts must enforce that obligation—and that civil courts should determine whether there has been a substantial departure from such prior doctrines adhered to by the church.

The Court in Watson further held that absent an express condition, a civil court asked to resolve a church property dispute should examine the polity structure of the church in question. If the church has adopted a congregational polity, pursuant to which each local church independently governs its own affairs, then the conflict should be resolved in accordance with the principles that govern voluntary associations, such as majority rule. In such a case, therefore, the court should simply defer to the judgment of the majority, rejecting arguments that the majority has departed from the "true" doctrine of the church. On the other hand, if the church in question has adopted a hierarchical polity, as was the case with the Presbyterian Church, pursuant to which each local church is subordinate to a broader church structure, then the civil court must defer to the position taken by the church hierarchy. In sum, the Court in Watson concluded that civil courts should resolve church property disputes by deferring to the judgment of the highest appropriate authority in the church structure—which will vary depending on whether the church has adopted a congregational or a hierarchical polity.

The effect of the Watson decision was to limit the role of civil courts in the resolution of church property disputes. Although the Watson decision technically applied only to federal courts, the dictates of the decision were widely followed by state courts confronted with similar disputes. Moreover, although the Watson Court did not specifically consider the First Amendment, the Court in subsequent cases—in particular Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral (1952) and Kreshik v. St. Nicholas Cathedral (1960)—made clear that the First Amendment imposed limitations on the ability of civil courts to resolve ecclesiastical disputes that involve an interpretation of church doctrine.

The Supreme Court has continued to rely on the framework established in Watson, although in recent years, the Court has further clarified the proper role of civil courts in adjudicating disputes involving church property. First, in Presbyterian Church in the United States v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church (1969), the Court affirmed the principle articulated in Watson that civil courts should avoid resolving doctrinal disagreements when adjudicating disputes over church property, noting that "the First Amendment forbids civil courts from playing such a role." In the Blue Hull case, two local churches in the Presbyterian Church in the United States had sought to leave that denomination and take their church property with them. A state court in Georgia had awarded the local churches the property on the grounds that the national denomination, in the view of the court, had departed from the traditional doctrines of the Presbyterian Church. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that a civil court could not resolve doctrinal matters without infringing the religion clauses of the First Amendment. However, the Court did state, without elaborating, that a civil court could resolve religious property disputes if it could do so with reference to "neutral principles of law." A few years later, though, in Serbian Eastern Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevic (1976), the Court continued to use the deference approach articulated in Watson.

But in Jones v. Wolf (1979), the Court elaborated on the “neutral principles” approach mentioned in Blue Hull. Jones involved yet another schism in a local Presbyterian church and a dispute over which faction should possess the church property. In Jones, the Court held that although civil courts could continue to defer to the church hierarchy when resolving church disputes consistent with Watson, they were also free to resolve these types of disputes by reference to the “neutral principles of law” approach articulated in Blue Hull. Under this neutral principles approach, civil courts could examine deed language, state statutes governing church property, and terms in local church charters and general church constitutions as a means of resolving property disputes. The Court explained: “In undertaking such an examination, a civil court must take special care to scrutinize the document in purely secular terms, and not rely on religious precepts...[If] interpretation of the instruments of ownership would require the civil court to resolve a religious controversy, then the court must defer to the resolution of the doctrinal issue by the authoritative ecclesiastical body.” The four dissenters in Jones urged that the Court to retain the view first articulated in Watson that civil courts should defer to the judgment of the church hierarchy when called on to resolve church property disputes.

In the aftermath of Jones, civil courts resolving disputes over church property need not defer to the decisions of church authorities if the court can rely instead on authoritative documents that the court can interpret without having to make a religious judgment. In the wake of Jones, lower state and federal courts have adopted various approaches to the problem of church property disputes. Some courts continue to follow the deference principle first articulated in Watson, giving deference to the view of the highest appropriate authority in the church. Other courts have followed the neutral principles test developed in Jones and have sought to resolve property disputes by interpreting relevant documents in accord with general principles of property and trust law, so long as such interpretations do not require a religious judgment. After the Jones decision, either approach is acceptable under the First Amendment.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Gerstenblith, Patty, Civil Court Resolution of Property Disputes Among Religious Organizations, American University Law Review 39 (1990): 513–572.
Greenawalt, Kent, Hands Off! Civil Court Involvement in Conflicts Over Religious Property, Columbia Law Review 98 (1998): 1843.

Montgomery, Sarah M., Drawing the Line: The Civil Courts’ Resolution of Church Property Disputes, The Established Church, and All Saints’ Episcopal Church, Waccamaw, South Carolina Law Review 54 (2002): 203.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Jones v. Wolf*, 443 U.S. 595 (1979)
Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral, 344 U.S. 94 (1952)
Kreshik v. St. Nicholas Cathedral, 363 U.S. 190 (1960)
Presbyterian Church in the United States v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church, 393 U.S. 440 (1969)
Serbian Eastern Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevich, 426 U.S. 696 (1976)
Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. 679 (1872)

JUDICIAL REVIEW

Judicial review in the United States is generally understood to be the authority of a court to review legislative enactments and actions by governmental officials, and, if they are inconsistent with the constitution, to invalidate the challenged acts. A key factor that undergirds the notion of judicial review is acceptance of a hierarchy of laws and that those on the lower rungs must not conflict with those on the higher ones. Higher laws will always prevail over lower ones, and the Constitution is the highest law in the land.

Judicial review is typically regarded as an innovation in political institutions that had its origins in the United States, but there are earlier examples elsewhere of higher tiered laws gaining recognition as constraining monarchs and parliaments. English Lord Chief Justice Coke, speaking in Dr. Bonham’s Case in 1610, is frequently cited for his statement that “when an Act of Parliament is against common right and reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will control it and adjudge such Act to be void.” Judges and the judicially crafted common law or the higher law of right and reason could control acts of the legislature. Sweden in the seventeenth century may not have asserted that judges could police constitutional infringements, but the fundamental law or constitution was seen as holding a place above all other laws, everlasting and unchangeable.

Judicial Review in the United States

Judicial review cannot be found explicitly mentioned in the U.S. Constitution, but there is ample evidence that the authors of the Constitution understood and assumed its place. There are multiple allusions to such judicial authority recorded in the constitutional debates, but one example demonstrates the assumptions of the Framers. When a proposed Council of Revision that could revise unwise laws passed by Congress was debated, Elbridge Gerry argued that the judiciary should not be represented on the council since, as Max Farrand quotes in The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, the judiciary “will have a sufficient check against encroachments on their own department by their exposition of the Laws, which involved a power of deciding on the constitutionality.” The Council of Revision did not survive into the final constitutional text, but the expectation that the courts had the authority to police constitutional violations was clearly recognized. That understanding was echoed by the authors of the Federalist Papers. In Federalist No. 78, Alexander Hamilton unambiguously asserts that “no legislative act, therefore, contrary to the Constitution, can be valid,” and discusses the rights of the courts to pronounce such legislative acts void.

Judicial review was, in other words, presumed to be a feature of the Constitution. It was not, however, asserted for the purpose of invalidating an act of Congress until 1803 in the famous case of Marbury v. Madison. William Marbury, who was a Federalist Party appointee to a newly created justice of the peace court in Washington, D.C., did not receive his commission before the Federalist Party turned over power to the Jeffersonian-Republicans after the election of 1800. He sued under the original jurisdiction of the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus to order the new Secretary of State James Madison to deliver the commission to him. Marbury’s suit for the writ was filed in the Supreme Court, because Section 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 provided that the Court could issue such a writ under its original jurisdiction. Without belaboring the technicalities that led Chief Justice John Marshall to deny Marbury the writ, the Chief Justice declared Section 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 unconstitutional and therefore invalid. Mr. Justice Marshall’s tour de force opinion declared that Constitution was a “superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means” and that “a legislative act contrary to the constitution is not law.” The supremacy clause in Article VI of the Constitution clearly supported that position. The trickier question revolved around who had the power to make that determination, but Chief Justice Marshall boldly declared the “it is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each.” Thus, Marbury

v. Madison became the first instance in which judicial review was used in the United States to invalidate an action of Congress.

Marshall’s assertion of the power of judicial review was not universally accepted. A dissenting opinion by Justice John Bannister Gibson of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court in Eakin v. Raub is usually cited as embodying the major arguments against judicial review. Gibson argued that the judicial branch’s power to review legislation is restricted solely to the form of enactment, because the legislative branch represents the sovereign people and holds the power to construe the constitution and to determine the constitutionality of its own enactments. The legislature can be held accountable by the real sovereign, the people, at the ballot box and through public opinion. Should it act wrongly, its errors can be corrected by the public’s insistence on repeal of the offending law. The judiciary is subject to no such remedy, and “the judiciary is not infallible.”

The Supreme Court did not declare another congressional enactment unconstitutional until 1857, in Dred Scott v. Sandford. Scott was a Missouri slave who had accompanied his owner to military posts in Illinois and other federal territories north of the line demarcating slave from nonslave states, and, therefore, alleged that his presence in free states released him from slavery. In a highly controversial decision, both then and now, Chief Justice Roger Taney wrote for the seven-justice majority. He denied that Scott had standing to sue because he was Negro and a slave and, subsequently, not a citizen. Taney further declared the Missouri Compromise unconstitutional. Many observers claim that this decision hastened the onset of the Civil War, and it was overturned only after that war by the Thirteenth Amendment that abolished slavery.

The Supreme Court’s exercise of judicial review has been more sparse in some eras than in others and has not yet reached 175 congressional laws. In some time periods, the Court’s actions have been more controversial than in others. For example, the Court annulled some forty-seven U.S. statutes between 1874 and 1930, but these did not typically touch on topics that gave rise to significant political ire. However, in the first years of the Hughes Court (1930–1940) a handful of laws central to President Franklin Roosevelt’s New Deal were invalidated, and there was a hue and cry about undemocratic judges, “nine old men,” blocking the will of the majority. Indeed, the President called for saving “the Constitution from the Court.” The President proposed to alter the composition of the Court through a “court-packing” plan, whereby he would be allowed to appoint one additional justice for each justice seventy years of age or older, which would have increased the Court from nine justices to fifteen. The “court-packing” plan never was realized, but a majority of the Court began to view New Deal legislation favorably.

The Warren Court (1953–1969) was highly controversial because of its invalidation of laws on racial segregation, the rights of the criminally accused and church and state relations, but most of those involved state laws. In its fourteen years, the Warren Court overruled only twenty-five federal laws, but 150 state ones. The more moderate Burger Court declared far more congressional enactments unconstitutional (thirty-four) and almost 200 state laws. The Rehnquist Court (1986–present) through the end of 2003 had invalidated more than thirty federal laws and a much smaller number of state ones. In the more recent years of the Rehnquist Court, many of the federal laws that were struck down involved, according to a majority of the Court, encroachments into the sovereign immunity of the states protected by the Eleventh Amendment. Little political reaction followed.

Although judicial exercise of judicial review remains controversial in the United States, it is accepted as a reality. Lawyers, politicians, and scholars complain of judicial activists who fail to show proper deference to the democratically elected legislative branch, when programs they favor fall victim to judicial review. The labels of judicial activism and judicial restraint were created to describe the proper role of judges in their relationship with the other branches of government, but now have become laden with ideology. Champions of judicial review cite the importance of an unelected body to uphold the law, particularly when protecting the rights of minorities. Detractors refer to judges who impose their will over that of Congress as super-legislators. The debate will continue, undoubtedly, although its contours will alter as different issues are adjudicated before the nation’s highest court.

Judicial Review Abroad

Despite the debates that the exercise of judicial review breeds in the United States, it has been widely imitated abroad. The form and substance has varied dramatically, though, as the practice has been transplanted elsewhere. For example, another form of judicial review has emerged in Great Britain since the middle of the twentieth century, one that is quite different from understandings in the United States. “Judicial review” in the British context refers to a review by courts of the legality, not the constitutionality, of a decision by an administrative authority rather than a legislative enactment. It is a review, not an appeal, and does not extend to a decision on the merits of the complaint. It is a check on the executive rather than on the legislature.

What Americans call judicial review is more commonly known as constitutional review, particularly in Europe. Constitutional review was largely rejected on the European Continent until after World War II, because it was considered to interfere with parliamentary sovereignty. The exception was a brief experiment in Austria before the German occupation in the early twentieth century. The Austrian form of review was designed by jurisprudential scholar Hans Kelsen and involved what he called “centralized judicial review.” Kelsen saw the U.S. system of judicial review as a decentralized system, whereby any court could find a law unconstitutional even though the Supreme Court has the final say. Kelsen devised a system whereby a constitutional court was created separate from the rest of the judiciary. When a question of an unconstitutional law arose in the course of deciding a case, the court hearing the controversy would refer the question to the constitutional court for a definitive answer as to the constitutionality of the law or the proper interpretation of the constitution. After World War II, variations on Kelsen’s constitutional court were introduced in Germany and Italy and later in the European Union’s Court of Justice and in Spain.

Another variation was introduced in France in the 1958 Constitution of the Fifth Republic. A Constitutional Council, staffed by politicians rather than lawyers or judges, resides within Parliament. Once a law has passed, both chambers of the French Parliament, certain office-holders, or a percentage of members of either chamber can refer the law in question to the Constitutional Council for a determination of constitutionality before it is enacted into law. The Council has emerged as a tool of the parliamentary opposition but preserves at least a veneer of parliamentary sovereignty. Once a law has been duly enacted and signed by the President of the Republic, it cannot be declared unconstitutional.

Judicial institutions to review the constitutionality of laws that are more like the U.S. Supreme Court have been created in Japan, Portugal, and some of the new democracies of Central Europe and in a number of Latin American countries.

Although judicial/constitutional review will continue to be a controversial institution in democratic systems, many nations have obviously come to accept that democratically elected legislators need the check that it provides, particularly to protect minorities or unpopular positions. Judges exercising judicial review maintain the integrity of a hierarchy of laws, in which the constitution rates above normal laws and lend a permanence to constitutional structures; they check not only the legislature but also executives.

MARY L. VOLCANSEK

References and Further Reading

- Abraham, Henry J. The Judiciary: The Supreme Court in the Governmental Process. New York: New York University Press, 1996.
- O'Brien, David M. Constitutional Law and Politics: Struggles for Power and Governmental Accountability. New York: W.W. Norton & Company, 2003.
- Jackson, Donald W., and C. Neal Tate, (eds. Comparative Judicial Review and Public Policy. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1992.
- Schwartz, Bernard. A History of the Supreme Court. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Dred Scott v. Sandford*, 60 U.S. 393 (1857)
- Dr. Bonham's Case*, 8 Co. Rep 114a, at 118 (1610)
- Eakin v. Raub*, 12 Sargeant & Rawle 330 (PA. 1825)
- Marbury v. Madison*, 5 U.S. 137 (1803)

JUREK V. TEXAS, 428 U.S. 262 (1976)

Jurek v. Texas supplemented the Court's decision in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), by holding that statutory aggravating and mitigating factors were not required for a state's capital punishment scheme to be constitutional. A jury convicted Jurek of murder and sentenced him to death. The Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas affirmed the death sentence.

In upholding the constitutionality of the death penalty in Gregg, the Court approved of Georgia's statutory scheme, which provided aggravating and mitigating factors for the jury to consider. In Jurek, Justice Stevens found that Texas' legislative scheme was equally sufficient to guard against the arbitrary and capricious application of the death penalty. Because Texas provided a narrowed definition of capital murder, Justice Stevens said that Texas effectively required at least one aggravating circumstance to exist before a death sentence could be considered. Once in a sentencing hearing, the jury was required to answer three specific questions, one of which, according to Justice Stevens, allowed the jury to consider any and all mitigating circumstances. Therefore, Texas' death penalty statute appropriately focused the sentencing jury on the particularized circumstances of the individual offense and the individual offender.

The Jurek Court's approval of Texas' capital punishment scheme expanded on Gregg and provided further guidance for other states to follow in drafting or amending their death penalty statutes.

EARL F. MARTIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment Reversed; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics

JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS

Constitutional and Congressional Limitations on Federal Court Jurisdiction

A court's "subject matter jurisdiction" is its power (and duty) to adjudicate a case: without jurisdiction, the court lacks power to proceed, and whenever a defect in its subject matter jurisdiction is discovered, the court must dismiss the case without reaching the merits. Unlike state courts of first instance, which typically possess general jurisdiction over any case that comes before them, Article III of the Constitution and the federal statutes that implement it both strictly limit the subject matter jurisdiction of the federal courts. Thus, no federal court has jurisdiction over a case unless it falls within Article III's list of the kinds of "cases and controversies" that comprise the judicial power of the United States and Congress has enabled the constitutional provision by granting the court statutory jurisdiction over the case. From this it follows, as the Court held in Marbury v. Madison, (1803), that Congress may not expand the jurisdiction of the federal courts beyond the limits of Article III. As for the lower federal courts (district courts and courts of appeal), Article III has been interpreted to give Congress the power both to "ordain and establish" them and to control the kinds of cases that they can hear (Sheldon v. Sill, 1850). And although Article III directly establishes the institution of the Supreme Court and grants it original jurisdiction over certain narrow types of disputes, that article also gives Congress the power to make "exceptions" to, and provide "regulations" for, the Court's appellate jurisdiction. The Supreme Court has interpreted the latter language as authorizing Congress to define its appellate jurisdiction by statute. Hence, the Supreme Court will have appellate jurisdiction only if the case before it falls within Article III and Congress has granted it jurisdiction by statute (Ex parte McCordle, 1869).

All of this seems to leave the federal courts' jurisdiction vulnerable to Congressional abridgement for political reasons and has led to the introduction of literally scores of bills in Congress over the past fifty years seeking to restrict access to the Supreme Court and/or to the lower federal courts in such politically controversial areas as subversive activities, legislative apportionment, school busing, school prayer, abortion rights, and gay marriage. Although none of these bills has yet become law, there is an extensive debate in academic and political circles about the limits, if any, on Congress' power to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over cases involving the assertion of federal constitutional rights. At a minimum it is generally agreed that Congress lacks the power to give the federal courts jurisdiction to decide a case according to an unconstitutional rule of decision (United States v. Klein, 1871), especially if the rule of decision unconstitutionally impinges on the judicial power itself (Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 1995). Nor may Congress exercise its power to control federal court jurisdiction to deny aggrieved persons at least some access to courts (whether federal or state) for the assertion of their constitutional claims. And although Congress can and has given jurisdiction over certain cases falling within Article III to administrative agencies and legislative courts such as military tribunals, this power is limited and seems to require, at a minimum, that a duly constituted Article III court have jurisdiction to conduct judicial review of these entities' decisions (Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line, 1982). Finally, Article III's use of the practically synonymous terms "case" and "controversy" has been read to deny the federal courts the power to issue advisory opinions (Flast v. Cohen, 1968) and to require the adoption of the doctrines of standing, ripeness, and mootness to assure the existence of a concrete and live dispute—a "case"—between the parties (see Ripeness in Free Speech Cases, Standing in Free Speech Cases).

Jurisdiction of the Federal District Courts

The federal district courts are the courts of first instance (trial courts) in the federal judicial system. Much of their original jurisdiction derives from §1332 of the Judicial Code (28 U.S.C.), which deals with Article III's categories of controversies between citizens of different states and between a citizen of a state and foreign citizens or subjects (diversity jurisdiction). The "general federal question" jurisdiction of §1331 is far more important in the context of civil rights enforcement, however. Although §1343 specifically grants the district courts original jurisdiction over civil actions to enforce the substantive provisions of certain federal civil rights statutes, jurisdiction over these types of cases is also given by §1331, a fact that renders the former section essentially superfluous. Closely tracking the language of Article III, §1331 provides that "the district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States," without regard for the amount in controversy. In federal question cases the district courts also have supplemental jurisdiction (under §1367) over closely related claims based on state law. The general federal question jurisdiction provided by §1331 is not exclusive, which means that most civil rights plaintiffs can choose to file their claims either in federal court or in state court. On the other hand, claims brought in state court that fall within the district court's original jurisdiction, including claims brought under 42 U.S.C. §1983, are subject to Removal to Federal Court at the instance of the defendant. The district courts also have jurisdiction under §2241 over petitions for habeas corpus filed by prisoners held in custody in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, including prisoners detained by executive order and prisoners held pursuant to a judgment of conviction by a state court (§2254). A full description of this important heading of district court jurisdiction over claims for the deprivation of civil rights can be found in Habeas Corpus: Modern History.

There are many limitations on the district courts' federal question jurisdiction. To mention only a few of the most important ones: (1) §1331 itself creates no substantive claims but only provides jurisdiction for claims that have been created elsewhere, whether by statute, by treaty, by federal common law, or by Implied Rights derived from the Constitution itself, as in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents (1971); (2) original federal question jurisdiction is subject to the "well-pleaded complaint rule," Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co. v. Mottley, (1908), which requires that the federal question in the case arise as part of the plaintiff's claim and not merely by way of an anticipated defense to a state law claim; (3) the Anti-Injunction Act (§2283) prohibits federal courts from enjoining pending state court proceedings except in certain narrow circumstances; (4) several prudential (judge-made) rules require a federal district court with jurisdiction to abstain from exercising it, either because state law is unsettled and should be clarified before being attacked on federal grounds, Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., (1941), or because the federal plaintiff is seeking to interfere in an ongoing state criminal proceeding conducted in good faith, Younger v. Harris, (1971), or because the court deems it prudent to defer to parallel state court proceedings, Colorado River Water Conservation District v. United States, (1976); (5) the “political question doctrine” requires the federal courts to defer to Congress or the President if a particular constitutional question is committed by the text of the Constitution to another branch of government or if the courts lack judicially discoverable standards for resolving the question, Baker v. Carr, (1962); and (6) the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution has been interpreted to deny the federal courts jurisdiction over suits for damages brought by individuals against a state or state agency, unless the state has given its consent or Congress has effectively abrogated the state’s constitutional immunity.

Although 42 U.S.C. §1983 does not authorize suits against states or state agencies, it does permit civil rights claimants to seek damages in federal (or state) court against local governments and state and local officials in their “personal” capacity on account of their violations of constitutional rights. However, actual recovery of damages is often impeded by the defendant’s imposition of various doctrines of “official immunity” (see Harlow v. Fitzgerald [1982]). As for suits seeking purely prospective relief (including injunctions) against ongoing or future unconstitutional actions by the states, the Ex parte Young, (1908) doctrine avoids the bar of the Eleventh Amendment by allowing the plaintiff to sue the appropriate state official by name, in his “official” capacity. Because the United States also enjoys sovereign immunity to the extent that it has not been waived, the same rule applies to suits seeking injunctions or mandamus (§1361) against federal officials: the plaintiff is allowed to sue the federal official responsible for the allegedly unconstitutional federal practice by name, thus avoiding the bar of federal sovereign immunity (Shields v. Utah Idaho Central R.R., 1938). Moreover, in 1976, Congress amended 5 U.S.C. §702 of the Administrative Procedure Act to waive the sovereign immunity of the United States in any federal court action seeking an injunction against an “agency” of the United States. And in the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) the United States also waives its immunity for suits seeking damages against it for certain torts committed by federal employees, including some civil rights violations, although liability is subject to the many exceptions listed in §2680; exclusive jurisdiction over cases brought under the FTCA is granted to the district courts by §1346(b).

Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and Courts of Appeal

The Supreme Court has discretionary jurisdiction under §1257 to review, by writ of certiorari, any final judgment rendered by the highest court of a state in which judgment may be had (usually the state’s supreme court), but only to the extent that there is a dispositive federal question in the case. Generally speaking, the Court has no power to review state court decisions that only concern questions of state law (Murdock v. City of Memphis, 1875). Among other things, this means that state supreme courts are free to give broader protections to civil rights under their state constitutions than the Supreme Court has afforded under the federal Constitution, and so long as the state court makes it clear that its interpretation of state law does not rely on federal law, the Supreme Court is powerless to review (Michigan v. Long, 1983).

Within the system of federal courts, §1291 gives twelve of the thirteen current courts of appeal jurisdiction to review appeals from the final decisions of the district courts that are located within their respective geographical areas. Appeals before judgment (“interlocutory appeals”) are permitted only in certain narrow circumstances, such as the grant or denial of an injunction (§1292). The jurisdiction of the nonspecialized courts of appeal (the First through Eleventh Circuits, plus the D.C. Circuit) is limited by §1295, which gives the specialized Court of Appeal for the Federal Circuit exclusive jurisdiction to review the final decisions of the district courts in patent cases and in cases in which the United States is a party, and by §§2284 and 1253, which allow an appeal directly to the Supreme Court of any decision by a three-judge district court granting or denying an injunction in a legislative apportionment case. Cases in the courts of appeal are subject to discretionary review in the Supreme Court, pursuant to §1254, by petition for certiorari by any party, either before or after the rendition of judgment. The procedures and time limits for these various modes of seeking appellate review are specified in the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure and in the Rules of the Supreme Court of the United States.

LOUIS E. WOLCHER

References and Further Reading

- Fallon, Richard H., Daniel J. Meltzer, and David Shapiro. Hart and Wechsler’s The Federal Courts and the Federal System. 5th Ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2003.
- Hart, Henry M., The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic, Harvard Law Review 8 (1953): 1362:1362–1402.

Irmas, Sydney, and Erwin Chemerinsky. Federal Jurisdiction. 4th Ed. Boulder: Aspen Publishing, 2003.
 Wright, Charles A., and Mary Kay Kane. Law of Federal Courts. 6th Ed. St. Paul: West Group, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962)
Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971)
Colorado River Water Conservation District v. United States, 424 U.S. 800 (1976)
Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968)
Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982)
Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149 (1908)
Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803)
Ex parte McCordle, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506 (1869)
Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983)
Murdock v. City of Memphis, 87 U.S. (20 Wall.) 590 (1875)
Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line, 458 U.S. 50 (1982)
Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 514 U.S. 211 (1995)
Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496 (1941)
Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U.S. (8 How.) 441 (1850)
Shields v. Utah Idaho Central R.R., 305 U.S. 177 (1938)
United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 128 (1871)
Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908)
Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971)
 United States Constitution: Art. III; Eleventh Amendment
 5 U.S.C.: §702
 28 U.S.C.: §§1253; 1254; 1257; 1291; 1292; 1331; 1332; 1343; 1346; 1361; 1367; 2241; 2254; 2283; 2284; 2680
 42 U.S.C.: §1983

See also Civil Rights Act of 1866; Civil Rights Act of 1875; Habeas Corpus: Modern History; Implied Rights; Judicial Review; Removal to Federal Court; Ripeness in Free Speech Cases; Standing in Free Speech Cases

JURY NULLIFICATION

In essence, “jury nullification” implies the power to disregard the law and acquit a presumably guilty defendant. However, the term is something of a misnomer in the sense that juries do not actually “nullify” anything—especially not the law itself; what juries actually do, when what we refer to as “jury nullification” takes place, is exercise the discretion granted to them and refuse to apply the law to the defendant. The power to deliberately not extend the law to cover a situation where it technically applies is both highly controversial (in that it appears to flout our abiding legal principles) and enormously consequential (in that acquittals are final—because of the double jeopardy clause, the state may not bring charges a second time for the same offense).

The roots supporting the power to nullify run deep into the colonial era in this country and back to the early 1600s in England. At this time, juries were asked to both determine the facts of the case and to define the law as they deemed fit. Such role expectations were predicated on deeply populist assumptions, placing considerable power in the hands of citizens and thus allowing the people to maintain a check on the power of the government by perhaps acquitting even those who had technically violated the law. And, significantly—then and now—jurors could not themselves be prosecuted for acquitting “guilty” defendants, a doctrine that can be traced back to the trial in England against William Penn for preaching a Quaker sermon.

Perhaps the most noted historical example of jury nullification was the trial of John Peter Zenger in colonial New York. The essence of the story is that Governor William Cosby of New York had suspended the chief justice for political reasons and then replaced him with an ally whose strings he could pull from the executive mansion. This event, among many others, drew the attention of the people and those journalists willing to risk prosecution for seditious libel for criticizing an elected official. Zenger, the editor of the New York Weekly Journal, lambasted Cosby in his newspaper, and Cosby’s appointment to the court tried twice to convince a grand jury to indict Zenger for libel, but failed both times. Eventually, Cosby simply had Zenger arrested and the trial began. Zenger’s counsel, the noted Philadelphia attorney, Andrew Hamilton, conceded that the facts were not in question; Zenger admitted to publishing the material and was, therefore, technically “guilty” of libel in that the criticism did bring disrepute on Cosby. But Hamilton desired to demonstrate to the jury that the published claims were, in fact, true and should not thus be considered “libelous.” However, he was not allowed by the judge to introduce such evidence and so in the end he openly appealed to the jury to scrutinize the nature and implications of such a libel standard and, more importantly, the gross abuse of power exhibited by the governor and to then provide redress for Zenger. In finding Zenger not guilty, the jury set an important precedent for the power of the jury to send a message in such circumstances.

From the discussion of the theoretical basis and historical origins of jury nullification, it is important to also contemplate more modern examples—especially as issues of race have affected nullification tendencies. The Civil Rights Movement, for example, was fueled in large part by the consistent acquittals (by all white juries) in state criminal courts in the American South in the early 1960s. In examples ranging from rape to assault to murder, juries seemed reluctant to apply the law to defendants they knew to be guilty—as an effort, it seems, to maintain a particular social order and resist the unwanted federal presence and intervention by outsiders. Race also figured prominently in the trial of O. J. Simpson in 1995, in which a majority black jury found the defendant “not guilty,” leading to allegations of nullification by experts and members (primarily white members) of the general public. Perhaps the jury was sending a message to the Los Angeles Police Department with its verdict; or perhaps the prosecutors simply failed to prove their case “beyond a reasonable doubt”—and thus the jury was faithfully doing its job.

Indeed, the Simpson verdict portrays the mystery that still attaches to the practice of jury nullification, because other than postverdict interviews, books, or perhaps documentaries or studies conducted during the deliberative process, the public does not necessarily know why a jury returns the verdict it does. And thus, particularly in hot-button cases that receive extensive pretrial attention—where, for example, it seems that the verdict has already been rendered in (and perhaps by) the media—it is often difficult to understand why or how a jury came to its announced conclusion, whether it understood and accepted various facts, or whether it respected or dismissed the law as stated by the judge. The jury might have arrived at a result that strikes most people as egregiously wrong, but this does not necessarily imply that the jury engaged in “nullification.” The jury might simply have gotten it “wrong”; for “nullification” to have occurred, there would have to be a deliberate intent to disregard the law in the case at hand—and that is quite difficult to demonstrate.

For this reason it is difficult to gather data as to the prevalence of jury nullification. Evidence does suggest that certain urban areas (for example, the Bronx, Detroit, Washington, D.C.) have higher acquittal rates—especially for certain offenders—but the multitude of variables and the key missing information (justification from the jury itself) make it difficult to infer that some communities are more or less inclined to “nullify” than others. Questions regarding the frequency of this practice are at the heart of the active debate in the criminal justice community as to whether or not jurors should be made aware of their discretion in this regard. Members of the jury might know this from crime novels or TV shows, but should the system itself apprise them of this power? On this question, the jury is still out.

BRIAN K. PINAIRE

References and Further Reading

Butler, Paul., Racially Based Jury Nullification: Black Power in the Criminal Justice System, Yale Law Journal 105 (1995): 677.

Conrad, Clay. Jury Nullification: The Evolution of a Doctrine. Durham: Duke University Press, 1998.

Horowitz, Irwin, and Thomas E., Willging. Changing Views of Jury Power: The Nullification Debate, 1787–1988, Law and Human Behavior 15 (1991): 167.

Marder, Nancy, Deliberations and Disclosures: A Study of Post-Verdict Interviews of Jurors, Iowa Law Review 82 (1997): 480.

Cases and Statutes Cited

The People of the State of California v. Orenthal James Simpson (1995)

See also Jury Nullification and Capital Punishment; Jury Trial; Jury Trial Right; Jury Trials and Race; Zenger Trial (1735)

JURY NULLIFICATION IN CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Through jury nullification, the jury chooses to ignore the law as provided by the judge, and instead returns a verdict based on its sense of justice. This practice is infrequent, and although courts refuse to endorse nullification, they nonetheless recognize the jury’s power to do so. Reasons for nullification, which has roots in early England and America, are moral and religious considerations, preventing an unjust exercise of official power, and perceived unfairness of the law. Opponents argue that it is lawless and anarchic conduct, a violation of juror oaths to follow the law, allows the jury to apply their own notions of the law (quasilegislative function), and are based on out-of-court considerations like sympathy and prejudice.

In a capital case, the jury, after first assessing guilt in the trial phase, next moves to the penalty phase of the trial; where they weigh both “aggravating” and “mitigating” factors in determining whether the death penalty or life imprisonment is appropriate. Aggravating factors may include heinousness of the crime and prior record, whereas mitigating factors might address childhood exposure to physical abuse or parental alcoholism and drug addiction.

A capital jury, notwithstanding a preponderance of aggravating factors, may decide that life imprisonment is appropriate. Media depictions of the wrongfully convicted/incarcerated may persuade the jury to err on the side of caution. Recognition that other Western societies prohibit capital punishment may play a role. Defense counsel’s successfully “humanizing” the defendant may be an explanation. These and other considerations, known only to the jury, may account for why an abundance of “aggravating” factors, consistent with imposition of the death penalty, will nonetheless be ignored (nullified) by the jury.

RICK M. STEINMANN

References and Further Reading

- Clark, Sherman J., The Courage of Our Convictions, Michigan Law Review 8 (1999): 97: 2381–2447.
- Conrad, Clay, Jury Nullification the Evolution of a Doctrine. Durham: Carolina Academic Press, 1999.
- Haynie, Erick J., Populism, Free Speech, and the Rule of Law: The Fully Informed Jury Movement and its Implications, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 11 (1997): 1: 343–379.
- Nadler, Janice, Flouting the Law, Texas Law Review 83 (2005): 5: 1399–1441.
- Pepper, David A., Nullifying History: Modern-Day Misuse of the Right to Decide the Law, Case Western Reserve Law Review 50 (2000): 3 :599–644

See also Capital Punishment; Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976); Jury Trials and Race

JURY SELECTION AND VOIR DIRE

Juries are at the foundation of the American justice system. The U.S. Constitution's Sixth Amendment, applicable to the states since the 1968 case Duncan v. Louisiana, guarantees criminal defendants the right to be tried by an impartial jury drawn from a fair cross-section of the community. The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments' due process clauses are understood to similarly guarantee an impartial jury for civil litigants. The Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause also grants prospective jurors the right not to be excluded from a jury on account of race or gender. State constitutions provide similar guarantees.

How then are the people who serve on juries chosen? Generally, government officials create a source list of names and addresses from publicly available records. Some of these people, usually selected randomly, are sent jury qualification questionnaires to create a list of qualified prospective jurors, sometimes referred to as the jury wheel, who meet statutory requirements such as residency and citizenship. From the list of qualified jurors, prospective jurors, again usually selected randomly, are summoned to the courthouse to form a panel, commonly known as the venire. In voir dire, the judge or attorneys question members of the venire regarding their demographics and personal beliefs. The judge may excuse some potential jury members for cause, because of occupation, undue hardship, or because they are perceived as unable to be impartial. The judge may excuse others based on a party's exercise of a peremptory challenge. The remaining members of the venire will be eligible to serve on the jury, sometimes referred to as the petit jury to distinguish it from a grand jury. Each stage of this process might result in disproportionate inclusion or exclusion of different categories of people, resulting in concerns that minorities, women, and the economically disadvantaged are inadequately represented on today's juries.

Composing the Venire

The Supreme Court in Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co. observed that "[t]he American tradition of trial by jury, considered in connection with either criminal or civil proceedings, necessarily contemplates an impartial jury drawn from a cross-section of the community." This right to an impartial jury drawn from a cross-section of the community was codified federally by the Jury Selection and Service Act (JSSA).

Originally, jury service was often limited to white men who were property owners or taxpayers. In the landmark case of Strauder v. West Virginia, the Supreme Court said that blacks could not be prohibited from serving on juries on account of race. In contrast, however, the Court reached out to note that states could confine jury "selection to males, to freeholders, to citizens, to persons within certain ages, or to persons having educational qualifications."

It was not until 1898 that the first state, Utah, permitted women to serve on a jury. The Supreme Court did not rule until 1975 in Taylor v. Louisiana that laws that discriminated against women serving on juries were unconstitutional. Louisiana had prevented women from being called for jury service unless they had affirmatively stated that they wanted to be called for service. The JSSA now expressly provides that no citizen shall be excluded from jury service in United States district courts on account of not only sex but also of race, color, religion, national origin, or economic status.

Before an impartial jury can be selected, prospective jurors must be identified and summoned to the courthouse. The process of forming a venire varies in different jurisdictions. The JSSA governs the process for litigation in federal courts.

Government officials create source lists from databases like voter registration lists, lists of actual voters, telephone books, census lists, or driver license records. Source lists should be both inclusive and representative. Voter registration lists, used federally and in most states, tend to overrepresent the relatively wealthy and underrepresent racial minorities and women compared with the general population. Some contend that this overrepresentation is desirable, because it is based on excluding those uninterested enough in their government to bother registering to vote. Jurisdictions that are not persuaded by this logic sometimes use additional lists as a supplemental source of names. "Key man" systems have also been used, whereby prominent members of the community choose people they know to appear on the source lists.

Officials then create a master file of names selected from the source list. In federal courts and in most state courts, names are selected randomly. As master files are only created every fourth year, the master file may not remain representative of the community, as represented by the source list, if the community is changing rapidly. Some states update as frequently as every year. Officials then determine whether people on the master file are qualified to be jurors. Federally, this is determined through jury qualification questionnaires, but states may also use personal interviews or the official's personal knowledge.

To qualify for federal jury service, a prospective juror must be a U.S. citizen; eighteen years or older; able to speak, read, and write English; and have no prohibiting mental or physical infirmity. In addition, the prospective juror may not be a convicted felon, or even have a pending felony charge, or work in specified occupations, like the military, police, or firefighters. Prospective jurors who do not wish to serve may request exemptions from jury service on grounds such as undue hardship or extreme inconvenience. States add other criteria, like state or county residency or citizenship, or being of good character or sound judgment. Even the objective criteria may result in the disproportionate exclusion of different groups of people. For example, people who move frequently are less likely to receive questionnaires, and thus less likely to complete them and be selected.

People drawn from the list of qualified prospective jurors, or jury wheel, are summoned to a venire at the courthouse. Federally and in most states, the people selected must be chosen randomly. Prospective jurors are again screened for statutory qualifications. In a criminal trial a defendant may challenge a venire that fails to reflect the community under the Sixth Amendment's fair cross-section provision. Some courts have also adopted the Sixth Amendment procedure for civil trials as well. A party challenging the composition of the venire under the JSSA must show a substantial failure to comply with the Act.

To bring a fair cross-section challenge, the Court said in Duren v. Missouri that a defendant must show the systematic exclusion of a "distinctive group" in the community such that their representation on venires is not "fair and reasonable" in relation to the number of such persons in the community. The state then has the opportunity to show that attaining a fair cross-section of the community is incompatible with a significant state interest.

Alternately a defendant may challenge the composition of a venire against the states under Fourteenth Amendment equal protection grounds and against the federal government as incorporated by the Fifth Amendment's due process clause. The test is similar to the fair cross-section test; however, the defendant must also demonstrate that the underrepresentation of the distinctive group occurred over a significant period of time and resulted from intentional or purposeful discrimination. Underrepresentation of a group on the venire caused by group members' failure to respond to summons or complete questionnaires is inadequate. Discriminatory purpose may be presumed, however, based on the statistical showing of underrepresentation, which shifts the burden to the state to demonstrate that there was either no discriminatory purpose or effect.

A "distinctive group" must be sufficiently numerous and may not be singled out on the basis of an unreasonable classification. Race, color, and gender are obvious distinctive groups, and the Supreme Court has also accepted day laborers as a distinctive group. Social, religious, political, and geographical groups may also be distinct.

Underrepresentation of a distinctive group can be determined in several ways. Absolute disparity is the difference between the percentage of the group in the community and the percentage called to serve. Therefore if women make up fifty percent of the community but only thirty percent of those called to serve, there is an absolute disparity of twenty percent. A more sophisticated but rarely used measure involves statistical decision theory, which determines the likelihood of the underrepresentation occurring by chance. The composition of the community is often determined on the basis of the U.S. census, although these data reflect the community as whole rather than the community eligible to serve as jurors. Some have also argued that minorities are underrepresented in census data.

How much underrepresentation is not "fair and reasonable"? Although there is no absolute rule, some courts have held that a ten percent or greater absolute disparity passes the threshold. The Supreme Court in Jones v. Georgia held that a 14.7% absolute disparity was unacceptable. Arguably, a Sixth Amendment claim should require a lower threshold, because there is no requirement that the state harbor a discriminatory purpose.

Voir Dire

Voir dire, meaning “to speak the truth” in French, is the questioning of venire members to determine their fitness to serve on a jury. Courts administer voir dire in widely divergent ways. The judge, lawyers, or both may conduct voir dire. Proponents of judge-conducted voir dire argue that it is more efficient and that attorneys often use voir dire for inappropriate purposes, such as ingratiating themselves to a jury or to justify an improper peremptory challenge. Supporters of attorney-conducted voir dire note that attorneys will be more familiar with the case and thus better able to establish a prospective juror’s impermissible bias. Occasionally prospective jurors will complete questionnaires intended to speed up the voir dire process.

The Supreme Court recognized in Rosales-Lopez v. United States that voir dire plays a critical function in assuring an impartial jury able to follow the court’s instructions and weigh the evidence. That said, trial courts have broad discretion in determining the scope of voir dire. Voir dire must create a reasonable assurance of discovering whether a prospective juror is impartial, with reversal granted only if there was an abuse of discretion. For example, inquiries about prospective jurors’ racial prejudices are not necessarily required, even in situations where the defendant and victim are of different races. In general, questions regarding specific subjects, like racial prejudice, ethnic identity, or religious or political affiliation will only be required when they are particularly relevant to the case to be tried. One such case, Ham v. South Carolina, involved a black defendant with a beard whose defense was that he had been framed because of his race and civil rights activities. After the trial court refused to ask several questions about bias, the Supreme Court reversed Ham’s conviction on constitutional grounds. Questions about racial bias were constitutionally required; questions about prejudice against men with beards were not required.

The preceding is the constitutional minimum—states and the federal courts may require more. The Supreme Court has said, based on its power to supervise the federal courts, that questions about racial or ethnic prejudice should be allowed if the total circumstances suggest a reasonable possibility that such prejudice would affect the jury.

Challenges for Cause

Given that the Constitution requires a fair and impartial jury, a juror must be capable of objectively evaluating the evidence. The Supreme Court concluded in Reynolds v. United States that a prospective juror must be excused for cause if the prospective juror discloses an opinion likely to raise the presumption of partiality. Impartiality does not require neutrality; rather it simply requires a lack of inappropriate or overly strong biases. The trial court has broad discretion, however, in determining whether a prospective juror is or is not sufficiently impartial.

Potential jurors in capital cases are also “death-qualified.” Anyone with views on capital punishment that would prevent or substantially impair the performance of his or her duties in accordance with law is automatically excused from the jury for cause. Critics have long argued on the basis of empirical research that a death-qualified jury is much more likely to convict than one that is not death-qualified, and thus death qualification violates both the fair cross-section and impartiality requirements of the Constitution. The Supreme Court rejected this argument in Lockhart v. McCree.

The Court also explicitly held in Holland v. Illinois that a defendant has no constitutional right to a fair cross-section of the community on the actual jury, merely that the jury will be drawn from a fair cross-section.

Peremptory Challenges

A peremptory challenge is used to excuse a potential juror that a party believes may be less favorable to their position than the likely alternative. Traditionally, a party could exercise a peremptory challenge on an arbitrary or capricious basis without having to provide any reason at all. Often challenges were based on nothing more than invidious prejudice. Clarence Darrow himself advised lawyers on the use of racial and ethnic stereotypes for jury selection. Now, however, parties occasionally do have to provide reasons for their peremptory challenge.

In Swain v. Alabama the Supreme Court first held that the prosecutor’s peremptory challenge on the basis of race of a potential juror of the same race as the defendant would violate the Constitution. The Court imposed such an onerous evidentiary burden on the defendant, however, that the issue was revisited twenty-one years later in Batson v. Kentucky. In Batson, the Court established that the moving party must first present a prima facie case that the opposing party has used a peremptory challenge on the basis of race. The judge then asks the party exercising the peremptory challenge to provide neutral reasons for the challenge. If the reasons are nondiscriminatory, the judge must then decide whether the moving party has carried the burden of establishing purposeful discrimination. A nondiscriminatory reason is any reason, no matter how silly or nonsensical, not solely associated with a particular race. For example, in Hernandez v. New York, a plurality of the Court held that striking prospective Hispanic jurors because they spoke Spanish was a race-neutral reason, because some non-Hispanics also speak Spanish.

Later Supreme Court cases applied the Batson framework to civil cases and to peremptory challenges exercised by criminal defendants. Peremptory challenges are also no longer permitted on the basis of the prospective juror's gender or ethnic origin, in addition to race. Courts have split on the question of whether parties may exercise peremptory challenges on the basis of the potential juror's religious beliefs. These restrictions on the use of the peremptory challenge are not primarily to protect litigants' rights, but rather the potential jurors' equal protection rights.

The Court's approach to the discriminatory use of the peremptory challenge has been heavily criticized. The underlying criticism is that judges are not well equipped to detect a party's discriminatory use of the peremptory challenge. This can be because providing a nondiscriminatory reason is too easy for anyone who wishes to strike on the basis of race or gender.

Many commentators and judges have recommended abolishing or at least reconsidering the use of the peremptory challenge, including Justice Breyer in Miller-El v. Dretke and Justice Marshall in Batson. Although originally adopted from English common law, England and Wales abolished the peremptory challenge in 1989. Arguments against eliminating the peremptory challenge include the notion that participating in the selection of the jury assists with the losing party's and the community's acceptance of the verdict. In addition, some have asserted that the peremptory challenge is a necessary tool to prevent extremists from sitting on a jury, and thus the risk of hung juries is reduced.

Other commentators have recommended changes such as guaranteeing a minimum level of minority representation on the jury, or having parties affirmatively select jurors rather than reject them. Another suggestion is to guarantee places on the jury to people drawn from smaller areas, thereby likely increasing racial and economic diversity.

ANTONY PAGE

References and Further Reading

- Abramson, Jeffrey. We the Jury: The Jury System and the Ideal of Democracy, Cambridge: Harvard University Press (2000 reissue).
- Altschuler, Albert W., The Supreme Court and the Jury: Voir Dire, Peremptory Challenges, and the Review of Jury Verdicts, University of Chicago Law Review 56 (Winter, 1989) 153–233.
- Forde-Mazrui, Kim, Jural Districting: Selecting Impartial Juries through Community Representation, flanderbilt Law Review 52 (1999): 353–404.
- Fukurai, Hiroshi, and Richard Kroot. Race in the Jury Box: Affirmative Action in Jury Selection. Albany: SUNY Press, 2003.
- Goode, Barry P., Religion, Politics, Race, and Ethnicity: The Range and Limits of Voir Dire, Kentucky Law Journal 92 (2003–2004): 601–701.
- Hans, Valerie P., and Neil Vidmar. Judging the Jury. New York: Plenum Publishing, 1986.
- Howe, Scott W., Juror Neutrality or an Impartiality Array? A Structural Theory of The Impartial Jury Mandate, Notre Dame Law Review 70 (1995): 1173–1245.
- Jonakit, Randolph N. The American Jury System. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2004.
- Muller, Eric L., Solving the Batson Paradox: Harmless Error, Jury Representation, and the Sixth Amendment, Yale Law Journal 106 (October 1996): 93–150.
- Page, Antony, Batson's Blind-Spot: Unconscious Stereotyping and the Peremptory Challenge, Boston University Law Review 85 (2005) 155–263.
- Starr, V. Hale, and Mark McCormick. Jury Selection. New York: Aspen Law and Business, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Batson v. Kentucky*, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)
- Duncan v. Louisiana*, 391 U.S. 145, 149 (1968)
- Duren v. Missouri*, 439 U.S. 357, 364 (1979)
- Ham v. South Carolina*, 409 U.S. 524 (1973)
- Hernandez v. New York*, 500 U.S. 352 (1991)
- Holland v. Illinois*, 493 U.S. 474 (1990)
- J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B.*, 511 U.S. 127 (1994)
- Jones v. Georgia*, 389 U.S. 24 (1967)
- Lockhart v. McCree*, 476 U.S. 162 (1986).
- Miller-El v. Dretke*, 545 U.S. ___, 125 S.Ct. 2317 (2005)
- Rosales-Lopez v. United States*, 451 U.S. 182, 188 (1981)
- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
- Strauder v. West Virginia*, 100 U.S. 303 (1880)
- Swain v. Alabama*, 380 U.S. 202 (1965)
- Taylor v. Louisiana*, 419 U.S. 522, 528 (1975)
- Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co.*, 328 U.S. 217 (1946)
- Jury Selection and Service Act, Pub. L. No. 90-274, § 101, 82 Stat. 54 (1968) (codified at 28 U.S.C. §§ 1861-1869 (1994))
- See also Batson v. Kentucky*, 476 U.S. 79 (1986); Darrow, Clarence; Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968); Grand Jury; Holland v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 474 (1990); Jury Trial; Jury Trials and Race; Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162 (1986); Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878); Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. 182 (1981); Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202 (1965); Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975)

JURY TRIAL

Trial by jury has been part of our legal tradition from the time the colonists first settled in America. The colonists brought the jury trial with them from England, but it assumed particular importance when the colonists sought their independence from England.

Although judges were appointed by the Crown, jurors were selected by local authorities. Thus, the jury trial was one way to resist imposition of the law by the Crown and leave such decisions to local citizens. The jury trial also reassured citizens who were being prosecuted that twelve fellow citizens would decide their case, rather than a judge appointed by a ruler thousands of miles away.

In colonial times, the jury trial was seen as a bulwark against tyranny. As one U.S. Supreme Court Justice explained: "Providing an accused with the right to be tried by a jury of his peers gave him an inestimable safeguard against the corrupt or overzealous prosecutor and against the compliant, biased, or eccentric judge" (Duncan v. Louisiana 391 U.S. 145, 156 [1968] [White, J.]).

When the French writer Alexis de Tocqueville visited the United States in the 1830s, he observed the importance of the jury trial. The jury trial, according to Tocqueville, served as a "free school," teaching jurors important lessons about citizenship and allowing them to participate in self-governance.

Today, the jury continues to serve as a free school. Service and voting are the main ways in which citizens participate in democracy. Jurors see the parties before them and know that their decision will have significance. Thus, the jury trial allows jurors to see democracy in action.

The jury trial is important not only for the lessons that it teaches jurors but also for the assurance that it provides a defendant that he or she will receive a fair trial before an impartial decision maker.

In criminal jury trials in federal courts and in most state courts, juries consist of twelve jurors. These twelve jurors are ordinary citizens summoned for the purpose of serving on a jury.

They do not know the parties, and they have no stake in the outcome. They will listen to the evidence presented at trial, and, eventually, they will enter a jury room where they will deliberate in secret. In most criminal cases, the defendant can be convicted only if the jury reaches an unanimous verdict. If even one juror disagrees with the other eleven, the jury can be declared a hung jury. The prosecutor must then decide whether to retry the case.

Even today, when we no longer have to worry about the tyranny of the Crown, we still have the protection of the jury system, including its protection against government arbitrariness or overreaching. The defendant charged with a serious crime knows that he or she will be judged by twelve citizens, who have no connection to the case and who will decide whether the government has met its burden only after they have heard all the evidence, deliberated in secret, and reached an unanimous decision.

NANCY S. MARDER

References and Further Reading

- Abramson, Jeffrey, We, the Jury. New York: Basic Books, 1994.
 Tocqueville, Alexis de. Democracy in America. 13th Ed. Mayer, Jacob Peter, and Max Lerner, eds. New York: Harper & Row, 1969, 1850.
 Yeazell, Stephen C., The New Jury and the Ancient Jury Conflict, University of Chicago Legal Forum (1990): 87–117.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Duncan v. Louisiana*, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)
Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975)

See also Duncan v. Louisiana*, 391 U.S. 145 (1968); Grand Jury in Colonial America; Impartial Decision-maker; Jury Trial Right; Jury Trials and Race; Public Trial; Speedy Trial; Trial in Civil Cases (VII)

JURY TRIAL RIGHT

The right to a jury trial is guaranteed by two amendments to the United States Constitution. The Sixth Amendment guarantees a defendant charged with a serious crime the right to a "speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed." The U.S. Supreme Court has interpreted the Seventh Amendment to guarantee a jury trial to parties in a civil dispute if the action (or an analogous action) would have received a jury trial in 1791, when the Seventh Amendment was enacted.

Even though the Sixth Amendment provides that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial," the U.S. Supreme Court has explained that this right is limited to "serious crimes." A defendant has a right to a jury trial for a serious crime, but not for a petty one. The key question, then, is what constitutes a serious crime? Through case law, the U.S. Supreme Court has given guidance to lower court judges to help them determine whether the defendant has been charged with a serious crime. The defining feature of a serious crime is that the maximum penalty that the defendant can receive is more than six months of imprisonment. This focus on the maximum penalty takes into account whether the legislature considers the crime to be serious, because the legislature sets maximum penalties. Although a court can consider other penalties, such as fines or probation, in deciding whether a crime is serious, the main focus is the maximum authorized prison time. The reason for this, according to the U.S. Supreme Court, is that prison time is different from other penalties; it involves a loss of liberty.

Although the right to a jury trial in criminal and civil matters is guaranteed by different amendments, criminal and civil juries are selected in the same manner and afford parties many of the same protections. For example, in jury selection in both criminal and civil cases, the venire, or panel, from which the petit jury is selected must be drawn from a fair cross section of the community. The U.S. Supreme Court has interpreted this to mean that no group can be systematically excluded from the venire. The idea is that if the venire is drawn from a broad swath of the community, the petit jury will have a broad range of ideas and perspectives to consider when it deliberates. A venire drawn from a fair cross section also assures the defendant that the government cannot stack the jury in its favor. The defendant also hopes that there is at least one person on the jury who will view the case from the defendant's perspective.

Similarly, in the selection of both criminal and civil juries, both sides have a certain number of peremptory challenges that allow them to remove from the petit jury a certain number of prospective jurors without, in most cases, having to give a reason. The peremptory challenge allows each side to feel that it has "selected" its jury and removed those jurors less likely to be sympathetic to its case. The number of peremptory challenges that each side is given varies depending on whether the case is in federal or state court and whether it is a criminal or civil case. Although the peremptory challenge is not constitutionally mandated, it has been part of our legal tradition since before this nation's founding. Defendants, in particular, view the peremptory challenge as a protection; it allows defendants to feel comfortable with the jury selected. However, over the past forty years, there has been much debate about the peremptory challenge, particularly because for many years, lawyers used peremptory challenges to excuse African Americans from serving on juries. Because peremptory challenges do not require reasons, attorneys could use peremptory challenges to excuse African Americans without having to explain why. This led some critics of the peremptory challenge, including Justice Thurgood Marshall, to suggest their elimination. Instead, the Supreme Court decided that if it appears that an attorney is exercising a peremptory challenge on the basis of race, gender, or ethnicity, the other side could challenge this use of the peremptory. Attorneys can no longer exercise peremptory challenges on the basis of a prospective juror's race, ethnicity, or gender.

Another subject of debate is jury nullification. Jury nullification is when the jury decides not to follow the law as the judge has explained it to the jury. It is often difficult to know when a jury has engaged in nullification, because juries typically return only a general verdict (either guilty or not guilty in criminal cases or liable or not liable in civil cases). If the judge suspects that the jury engaged in nullification in a civil case or in criminal case in which it convicted the defendant, then the judge can take action to alter what the jury has done. However, in a criminal case in which the jury engaged in nullification and acquitted, the judge cannot take any further action.

The debate has centered on whether jurors should be told by the judge or attorneys that they have the power to nullify. The current practice is to tell the jurors the opposite. Jurors take an oath to follow the law, and the judge instructs them that it is their job to find the facts and to apply the law, as the judge explains it to them. There has been a movement to inform jurors of their power to nullify. Some grassroots organizations have distributed leaflets at the courthouse door, explaining to prospective jurors that they have the power to nullify, regardless of the instructions that the judge will give them. Some members of the African-American community have called for African-American jurors to nullify in certain victimless crimes when the defendant is African American. They have taken this position as a means of protesting the number of African-American men being sent to jail, particularly for violations of the drug laws.

All the federal circuit courts have held that judges should not instruct jurors on their power to nullify. Recently, the Second Circuit held that if a deliberating jury sends the judge a note indicating that a juror intends to nullify, the judge must interview that juror and determine whether that juror's view is based on nullification or reasonable doubt. If the juror intends to nullify, the judge must remove that juror and replace him with another, even though the jury is already deliberating.

A jury may be inclined to nullify when it does not agree with the law at issue, when it does not believe the law should be applied to the particular defendant, or when it wants to use its verdict to protest some aspect of the justice system. Judges, who have sworn to uphold the law, and legislators, who pass the laws, are generally opposed to nullification. However, a jury that engages in nullification after careful deliberation may provide an important safety valve, because laws are drafted for the general case and cannot always take account of a particular case, as a jury can do.

NANCY S. MARDER

References and Further Reading

- Butler, Paul, Racially Based Jury Nullification: Black Power in the Criminal Justice System, Yale Law Journal 105 (1995): 677–725.
- Hoffman, Morris B., Peremptory Challenges Should Be Abolished: A Trial Judge's Perspective, University of Chicago Law Review 64 (1997): 809–871.
- Marder, Nancy S., The Myth of the Nullifying Jury, Northwestern University Law Review 93 (1999): 877–959.
- U.S. Const. amend. VI.
- U.S. Const. amend. VII.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Batson v. Kentucky*, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)
- Blanton v. City of North Las Vegas, Nevada*, 489 U.S. 538 (1989)
- J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B.*, 511 U.S. 127 (1994)
- Local No. 391 v. Terry*, 494 U.S. 558 (1989)
- Peters v. Kiff*, 407 U.S. 493 (1972)
- Swain v. Alabama*, 380 U.S. 202 (1965)
- Taylor v. Louisiana*, 419 U.S. 522 (1975)
- United States v. Dougherty*, 473 F.2d 1113 (D.C. Cir. 1972)
- United States v. Nachtigal*, 507 U.S. 1 (1993)
- United States v. Thomas*, 116 F.3d 606 (2d Cir. 1997)
- See also Batson v. Kentucky*, 476 U.S. 79 (1986); Holland v. Illinois, 549 U.S. 474 (1990); Impartial Decisionmaker; Jury Nullification; Jury Nullification in Capital Punishment; Jury Selection and Voir Dire; Jury Trial; Jury Trials and Race; Marshall, Thurgood; Public Trial; Race and Criminal Justice; Sex and Criminal Justice; Speedy Trial; Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975); Trial in Civil Cases (VII); War on Drugs; Zenger Trial (1735)*

JURY TRIALS AND RACE

Jury trial was an early development of the English common law. Under the Magna Carta, which was implemented in 1215, no freeman could be detained and incarcerated unless he had been judged by his peers. As such, to decide, on reasonable grounds, who was deemed as suitable to be tried, a group of freemen from the area where the crime was committed would be brought together to examine the facts of the case and establish whether the charges had any merits. Hence, the grand jury was created as a check against arbitrary prosecution by a judge who might be co-opted by the power elite. The notion of the grand jury was transported by the early settlers of the American colonies. Later on, with the ratification of Bill of Rights in 1791, the first ten amendments to the American Constitution, the Fifth and Sixth Amendment of the United States Constitution guarantee the right to a jury trial for all defendants accused of serious crimes. However, it is important to examine jury trials and race.

During 1863–1877, the period of Reconstruction in the South, the abolitionists viewed juries as the guardian of the rights and liberties of Americans. Yet, in many instances, in trials where all of the juries were white, the juries would refuse to impeach or convict white defendants accused of crimes against blacks. One main reason why blacks were not a part of the jury system was because of peremptory challenges, which were used to exclude African Americans from hearing cases in which the defendants were also African Americans. Swain v. Alabama is a case in point. In 1965, Swain, a black man, was convicted in Talladega County, Alabama, of raping a white woman. He was sentenced to death. The case was petitioned to the Supreme Court on the basis that there were no blacks on the jury. The Supreme Court denied the appeal. In fact, the Court based its decision, as provided by Alabama's law, that the jury was selected from a panel of 100 persons including eight blacks. The Supreme Court ruled that the presence of eight blacks showed "the overall percentage disparity has been small and reflects no studied attempt to include or exclude a specified number of blacks."

The exclusion of blacks from jury trials made it impossible to achieve justice in the courts, especially southern courts. Nevertheless, the courts did not see it as necessary or desirable to abandon the jury trials. Eventually, there were some attempts by the government to eliminate the many barriers that prevented blacks' participation in the legal system and the rights of blacks to serve as jurors. However, the justice system continued to overlook peremptory challenges and for many years; there were two competing views among the Supreme Court Justices on whether a juror's race might sway his or her view of a case. It was not until 1986, in the landmark case of Batson

v. Kentucky, that the Court claimed that the equal protection clause prohibits a prosecutor in criminal cases from using his peremptory strikes against a potential juror on the basis of race. Since this decision by the court, many defendants have raised the issue of race discrimination in the use of peremptory challenges. The Court extended Batson v. Kentucky to a variety of related cases.

In the 1991 case of Powers v. Ohio, the Court held that it was unconstitutional to exclude juries on the basis of race even when the defendant and the juror were of different races. Also, it asserted that a white defendant could challenge the discriminatory striking of black jurors. As is expected, these cases continued to provoke the prevailing disagreement among the Justices on whether a juror's race might influence his or her view of a case. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy flatly rejected such a notion that a jury's race matters in the determination of the outcome of a case. This was emphasized in Powers v. Ohio, in which he claimed that any acceptance that a jury's race matters would be to recognize "the very stereotype that the law condemns."

In the same year, in the case of Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., the Court held that a private party in a civil action might raise peremptory challenges on the basis of race by defendants' attorneys in criminal cases. As such, in Edmonson v. Leesville, Justice Kennedy concluded that our "progress as a multiracial democracy" authorizes that public prosecutor "satisfy themselves of a jury's impartiality without using skin color as a test." Although Kennedy's position, during this period, coincided with the majority of the Justices' views, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor took the opposite view. She contended that race should never be relevant in jury trials, but we cannot delude ourselves "of the painful social reality that, sometimes, it may be." In the 1992 Georgia v. McCallum decision, the Court prohibited the exercise of peremptory challenges on the basis of race by defense attorneys in criminal cases.

In the end, concerns about jury trials and race remain a huge element of America's justice system. Many minorities are angered because of white juries' verdicts in the acquittal of white defendants of crimes against racial minorities. The Rodney King's trial is a case in point.

SHERROW O. PINDER

References and Further Reading

- Foner, Eric. Reconstruction America's Unfinished Revolution 1863-1877. New York: Harper and Row Publishers, 1988.
- Haden, George, Joseph Senna, and Larry Siegel., Prosecutorial Discretion in Peremptory Challenges: An Empirical

Investigation of Information Use in the Massachusetts Jury Selection, New England Law Review 13 (1978):768.

Siegel, Larry, and Joseph Senna. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, a Division of Thomas Learning, 2004.

JUSTICE, WILLIAM WAYNE (1920-)

Williams Wayne Justice, senior judge on the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Texas, is best known for his decisions for his controversial decisions on school desegregation (U.S. v. Texas), prison reform (Ruiz v. Estelle), the treatment of juveniles in Texas reform schools (Morales v. Turman), and public school education for undocumented aliens (Doe v. Plyer). In his more than thirty years on the bench, Justice recognized those whose voices were rarely heard in the Courts, and he received enormous criticism as a result.

Born in 1920 in Athens, Texas, Judge Justice attended the University of Texas School of Law, graduating in 1942. He served four years in the Army before joining his family's law practice in Athens, where he remained in private practice for fifteen years. During that time, Justice began to dip into the pond of public service, serving twice as City Attorney for Athens. In 1961, he was appointed U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Texas, where he served until his appointment to the federal bench by Lyndon Johnson in 1968.

Shortly after taking his seat on the bench, Justice made it obvious that he was willing to take on controversial issues, crafting consent decrees requiring the State of Texas to make a multitude of changes to various institutions. In a 1992 speech at the George Washington University National Law Center, Justice claimed "my name has appeared on the 'ten most wanted list' of judicial activists for much of my nearly quarter century on the bench." In fact, he has never shied away from this label, wearing it as a badge of honor instead.

In 1969, the U.S. Justice Department filed suit in Judge Justice's Court arguing that the Tatum Independent School District was out of compliance with federal civil rights law. In 1970, Justice issued orders in the case of U.S. v. Texas requiring that the Texas Education Agency cease approving discriminatory school district boundaries and withhold funds from school districts for noncompliance, a position the Agency firmly opposed.

Judge Justice used the consent decree throughout his career to force the Texas state government to make changes that they did not necessarily support. He required Texas to overhaul its juvenile reform schools in 1974 (Morales) and required the Texas Department of Corrections to revamp its prisons in 1980 (Ruiz). In fact, the Texas prison system was run under Justice's consent decree for two decades.

Judge Justice is well aware that his decisions are often contentious, pointing out that "[s]everal of my own decisions have been made into campaign issues in Texas gubernatorial races and numerous local political contests," but such controversy doesn't seem to scare Justice. As Texas civil rights lawyer David Richards put it, "[t]here were two federal judges in the South who kicked ass and took names" in the late 1960s and '70s. "They were Frank Johnson and Wayne Justice."

ERIC J. WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

Kemerer, Frank. William Wayne Justice: A Judicial Biography. Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1991.
Wayne, Justice William., The Two Faces of Judicial Activism, George Washington University Law Review 61 (1992): 1:1–12.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Doe v. Plyer, 458 F. Supp. 569 (E.D. Texas 1978)
Morales v. Turman, 383 F. Supp 53 (E.D. Tex. 1974)
Ruiz v. Estelle, 503 F. Supp. 1265 (S.D. Tex. 1980)
U.S. v. Texas, 321 F. Supp. 1043 (E.D. Tex. 1970)

K

KAMISAR, YALE (1929–)

Yale Kamisar began teaching law at the University of Minnesota in 1957. He joined the University of Michigan faculty in 1965, where he quickly distinguished himself as one of the nation's two or three greatest criminal justice scholars and where he taught until his retirement in 2004. For more than forty-five years, he has been a leading influence on the ways in which the judiciary, the legal academy, practicing lawyers, and law students thought about constitutional criminal procedure.

Since 1964, Kamisar has been a co-author of a widely popular constitutional law casebook—now in its ninth edition—and, since 1965, the lead author of the most widely used and most frequently cited criminal procedure casebook—now in its eleventh edition. Over the past forty-five years, at least thirty-two Supreme Court decisions and more than 100 decisions of the federal courts of appeals have cited Kamisar's scholarship. Most impressive are several landmark criminal procedure decisions that have rested—at least in part—on Kamisar's work. Foremost among them is Miranda v. Arizona, where the Court adopted the reasoning and doctrinal framework of Kamisar's article, Equal Justice in the Gatehouses and Mansions of American Criminal Procedure, en route to holding that the Fifth Amendment right against compelled self-incrimination requires police to advise a suspect of his or her right to remain silent and to counsel before any inculpatory statements made by the suspect may be used against him or her at trial.

In addition to the law of interrogation, Kamisar has written extensively on the law of search and seizure, the exclusionary rule, and challenging social policy issues, such as mandatory drug testing, flag burning, and euthanasia.

JEAN-CLAUDE ANDRÉ

References and Further Reading

- Choper, Jesse H., et al., eds. Constitutional Law: Cases, Comments, and Questions. Ninth Edition. St. Paul: West, 2001.
- Kamisar, Yale. "Equal justice in the gatehouses and mansions of American criminal procedure." in Howard, A.E. Dick, ed. Criminal Justice in Our Time. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1965.
- Kamisar, Yale, et al., eds. Modern Criminal Procedure: Cases, Comments, and Questions. 11th Ed. St. Paul: West, 2005.
- Tributes. Yale Kamisar, Michigan Law Review 102 8 (August 2004): 8:1673–1792.
- Tributes. Yale Kamisar, Ohio State Journal of Criminal Law 2 (Fall 2004): 1:1–66.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Exclusionary Rule; Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Rights of the Accused; Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution

KATZ V. UNITED STATES, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)

The Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution prohibits the government from engaging in "unreasonable searches and seizures." Before courts ask whether a given search is “reasonable,” however, they must determine whether a “search” or a “seizure” occurred. The Supreme Court’s decision in Katz v. United States revolutionized the constitutional analysis of when governmental action amounts to a search and thus implicates the protections of the Fourth Amendment.

The FBI (correctly) suspected Charles Katz of being involved in an illegal gambling operation, whereby he would make calls from a public telephone to transmit information concerning bets. The FBI tapped the phone by attaching a receiver to the outside of the booth and recorded Katz’s voice during one such call. Katz was tried and convicted of the interstate communication of wagers and appealed his conviction, alleging that the conversation was illegally intercepted and, therefore, should not have been admitted against him at trial.

Justice Potter Stewart authored the majority opinion, which was joined by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices William Douglas, John Harlan, William Brennan, Byron White, and Abe Fortas. The Court held that tapping the phone was a search, even though there had been no entry into the phone booth. Thus, the opinion rejected the “trespass” doctrine, which had prevailed until Katz in cases such as United States v. Olmstead, whereby government action did not trigger the Fourth Amendment unless there was a physical invasion of a private space.

Although the Court was clear that physical trespass was no longer the sole factor for determining whether a search occurred, it was less clear about how future cases should be resolved. It stated that someone who enters a phone booth “shuts the door behind him, and pays the toll that permits him to place a call is surely entitled to assume that the words he utters into the mouthpiece will not be broadcast to the world.” And the Court also stated that something that a person “knowingly exposes to the public” is not private, and, therefore, police discovery of it does not constitute a search. But these statements were unhelpful in providing police and lower courts with a test to apply to future cases.

That test came in Justice Harlan’s concurrence, which has routinely been applied by the Supreme Court in subsequent decades. Under the test stated by Justice Harlan, a search occurs whenever the government invades an individual’s “reasonable expectation of privacy.” That question, in turn, is composed of two subsidiary questions: whether the individual had an expectation of privacy in the area searched, and whether society treats that expectation of privacy as “reasonable” or “legitimate.” Justice Harlan’s test has been enormously influential but raises difficult analytical problems. Most seriously, it invites the Justices to write their ideas of privacy into constitutional law in determining when a particular expectation of privacy is “reasonable.” As Justice Scalia wryly commented in Minnesota v. Carter, “unsurprisingly, those ‘actual (subjective) expectation[s] of privacy’ ‘that society is prepared to recognize as “reasonable,”’ bear an uncanny resemblance to those expectations of privacy that this Court considers reasonable.

Having determined that a “search” occurred, the Court then had to assess whether the “search” was “reasonable.” The Court held that the police’s failure to obtain a warrant made the search unreasonable, and for that reason the Court reversed Katz’s conviction. The Court maintained that searches conducted “without prior approval by judge or magistrate[s] are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment—subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions.” Because no exception was applicable here, the search was unconstitutional.

Justice Hugo Black dissented. In his view, the Fourth Amendment protects against only tangible items—things that can be “searched” or “seized.” Because a conversation is not tangible, he would have held that the Fourth Amendment does not regulate police eavesdropping, electronic or otherwise.

Post-Katz cases have asked whether certain expectations of privacy are “reasonable.” United States v. White held that a person has no reasonable expectation of privacy in conversations if the other party to the conversation consents to its being recorded or transmitted to others. California v. Greenwood held that one has no legitimate expectation of privacy in garbage left on the curb. United States v. Miller held that one’s bank records are not something about which one has a reasonable expectation of privacy, and Smith v. Maryland applied Miller to hold that there is no reasonable expectation of privacy in the numbers one dials on a home telephone. United States v. Place and Illinois v. Caballes held a trained dog’s sniff for the scent of contraband is not a search. United States v. Knotts held that police use of a beeper to trail a suspect along public roads infringed on no reasonable expectation of privacy, but United States v. Karo did find a reasonable expectation of privacy if a similar beeper disclosed information about movements in the interior of a home, and Karo was expanded in Kyllo v. United States to cover thermal imaging of houses.

MICHAEL DIMINO

References and Further Reading

Amsterdam, Anthony G., Perspectives on the Fourth Amendment, Minnesota Law Review 58 (1974): 3:349–477.

Hall, John Wesley, Jr. Search and Seizure. 3rd Ed. Charlottesville, VA: LEXIS Law Publishing, 2000, vol. 1, pp. 20–23, 58–91.

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. 4th Ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson-West, 2004, vol. 1, pp. 422–445.

Sundby, Scott E., ‘Everyman’s’ Fourth Amendment: Privacy or Mutual Trust Between Government and Citizen?, Columbia Law Review 94 (1994): 6:1751–1812.

Cases and Statutes Cited

California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988)
Illinois v. Caballes, 543 U.S.?, 125 S. Ct. 834 (2005)
Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)
Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. 83 (1998)
Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979)
United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705 (1984)
United States v. Knotts, 460 U.S. 276 (1983)
United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976)
United States v. Olmstead, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696 (1983)
United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745 (1971)

See also Exclusionary Rule; Privacy; Search (General Definition)

KAUFMAN, IRVING ROBERT (1910–1992)

Irving Robert Kaufman was the presiding judge over one of the most controversial trials in American history, the trial of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg. At the age of eighteen, Kaufman graduated from Fordham College, then graduated from law school two years later (one year before he was even eligible to take the Bar Exam). As a judge, Kaufman gained a reputation for imposing harsh rulings and strict sentences, although he was also considered a champion for civil liberties. In 1961, Kaufman was promoted to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, where he finished his judicial career.

The Rosenberg trial began on March 6, 1951, at the height of the infamous McCarthy Era in the United States. In what seemed an unusually harsh sentence, Kaufman sentenced the Rosenbergs to death in the electric chair after finding them guilty of conspiring to deliver atomic-bomb secrets to the Soviet Union. They were the first American civilians to be put to death for espionage in the United States. Although the fairness of the Rosenberg proceedings was questioned at the time of the trial, the later publication of an autobiography by one of the prosecutors, Roy Cohn, served to discredit the proceedings further. Cohn claimed that his influence led to Kaufman (a family friend) being appointed to the case and that Kaufman had imposed the death penalty on Cohn’s personal (and ex parte) advice. Extrajudicial contacts between judges and prosecutors are unethical under rules of professional conduct.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

Burnett, Betty. The Trial of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg: A Primary Source Account. New York: Rosen Publishing Group, 2003.

Hoffman, Nicholas Von. Citizen Cohn. New York: Bantam Books, 1988.

Meeropol, Robert. An Execution in the Family: One Son’s Journey. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 2003.

Radosh, Ronald, and Joyce Milton. The Rosenberg Files. 2nd Reprint Ed. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997.

Zion, Sidney. Autobiography of Roy Cohn. Secaucus, NJ: Lyle Stuart, 1988.

KENDALL, AMOS (1789–1869)

Amos Kendall was born in Dunstable, Massachusetts, to an old New England family and spent much of his youth working on his father’s farm. Despite minimal primary education, he enrolled at Dartmouth College at age eighteen and, in 1811, graduated at the top of his class. After studying law with William Merchant Richardson in Groton, Massachusetts, Kendall moved to Kentucky, working first as a tutor in the home of Henry Clay and then cultivating an eclectic career that would ultimately encompass the law, journalism, politics, and business. Formerly a Clay Whig, Kendall shifted his political allegiance to Andrew Jackson in 1826 and helped Old Hickory carry Kentucky in the presidential election of 1828. For his part in the Democratic ascendancy, Kendall was chosen to take his adopted state’s electoral votes to Washington, D.C., where he loyally served the Jackson regime for over a decade. Acting as fourth auditor for the treasury and, later, as postmaster-general, Kendall eventually became the most trusted and influential member of Jackson’s famous cadre of advisors, popularly known as the “Kitchen Cabinet.”

At the height of Kendall’s influence in the White House, antislavery petitions were being successfully tabled by southern representatives. Stymied in the House, the American Anti-Slavery Society decided to flood the country, and particularly the South, with their tracts and periodicals. On July 29, a steamship carrying bundles of this literature arrived in Charleston Harbor. After discovering and confiscating the “incendiary” cargo, the city’s postmaster-general, Alfred Huger, promptly wrote to Kendall for advice. Although an angry mob seized and publicly burned the tracts, Kendall’s response to Huger’s letter more or less defined the federal government's policy toward controversial mailings up to the Civil War. Acknowledging that he had no legal authority to censor the mail, regardless of its contents, Kendall nonetheless concluded that the security of communities, which he assumed abolitionist propaganda threatened, superseded the law. Although the mailings were designed to persuade whites of the evil of slavery rather than to incite slave rebellion, such distinctions failed to impress white southerners, for whom the memory of Nat Turner was all too fresh.

Despite the passage of a federal mail law prohibiting state interference, southerners continued to censor and destroy abolitionist literature, even as its flow ebbed after 1835. In the southern interpretation of the law, federal protection ended at the point of reception; once mail reached its destination, that is, local authorities withheld the right to review and dispense with it as they saw fit. Most northerners shared southerners' distaste for abolitionists, and they initially supported Kendall's policy of federal noninterference. Many in the North, however, eventually came to see sinister implications in the censorship and destruction of literature that southern authorities deemed "incendiary."

The mail controversy ultimately helped to link the abolitionist cause more firmly than ever with civil liberties as they applied to white Americans. The constitutional provisions for freedom of speech and freedom of the press commanded national attention during Kendall's tenure as postmaster-general, and in the controversy over abolitionist mailings, in particular, he played a prominent, albeit ignoble, role.

JAMES CORBETT DAVID

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Frank Maloy. Amos Kendall. Dictionary of American Biography. Vol. 5, Dumas Malone, ed. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1933, pp. 325–327.
- Kendall, Amos. Autobiography of Amos Kendall. William Stickney, ed. Boston: Lee and Shepard, Publishers, 1872.
- Nye, Russel B. Fettered Freedom: Civil Liberties and the Slavery Controversy, 1830–1860. East Lansing, MI: Michigan State College Press, 1949, pp. 54–69.
- Remini, Robert V. Andrew Jackson and the Course of American Democracy, 1833–1845. Vol. 3. New York: Harper & Row, Publishers, 1984, pp. 258–263.

KENNEDY, ANTHONY MCLEOD (1936–)

Both whom and what he knew made Anthony McLeod Kennedy an apt candidate for high judicial office. The best man at his parents' wedding was Roger Traynor, the groom's law school classmate, who would become the Supreme Court of California's greatest Chief Justice. As a boy in Sacramento, young Kennedy came to know the legal elite of California's government, including Earl Warren, Governor and eventual Chief Justice of the United States. At Stanford, Kennedy was elected to Phi Beta Kappa, and between university and law school, he spent a year at the London School of Economics. His law degree from Harvard was awarded cum laude. After brief sojourns practicing in San Francisco and serving in the army, he returned to Sacramento and his father's law practice. Soon afterward, he joined the faculty at McGeorge College of the Law where, on a part-time basis, he regularly taught constitutional law. Meanwhile, he had come to the attention of Ronald Reagan, and, when a vacancy occurred on the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, Reagan recommended him to President Ford.

Circuit Judge Kennedy was confirmed by the Senate in April of 1975. Only thirty-eight years old at the time, he became the youngest federal appellate judge in the country. He served on the court of appeals for more than twelve years and during that time wrote many influential opinions, including Chadha v. United States (1978), in which the court found unconstitutional a one-house congressional veto for administrative decisions. That decision was subsequently affirmed by the Supreme Court. In Pacemaker Diagnostic Clinic of America, Inc. v. Instromedix, Inc. (1984), Kennedy articulated a theory, based on a person's constitutional right to be heard by a life-tenured judge, for judicial review of Congressional assignment of claims to government tribunals other than courts. It would be adopted by the Supreme Court two years later in Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. Schor (1986). Dissenting in United States v. Harvey (1983), he advocated an exception to the exclusionary rule for evidence obtained by police unlawfully but in good faith. The Supreme Court made such an exception part of the law of the Fourth Amendment a year later in Massachusetts v. Sheppard (1984).

Kennedy was nominated for the Supreme Court on November 30, 1987, and confirmed by a unanimous Senate on February 3, 1988. He took his seat on the Court on February 18, 1988. He was nominated by President Reagan, as were Justices O'Connor and Scalia, but the three have hardly voted as a bloc. If Scalia's record tends to prove that, once on the Supreme Court, justices tend to vote in important cases harmoniously with the political values of the President that nominated them, Kennedy's record tends to prove the exception to that rule. After thirteen terms, his role in pivotal cases of constitutional rights has made him the Federal judiciary's lightning rod for the dissatisfaction of conservative Republicans.

Kennedy's independence of judgment might not have been a complete surprise to the White House. After all, he was only nominated for the seat opened by Justice Powell's retirement after two earlier and presumably preferred nominees, Circuit Judges Bork and Ginsberg, failed to win the Senate's advice and consent. Nevertheless, Kennedy came to Washington with a reputation for judicial restraint and a record that bespoke a preference for law and order. It did not take him long on the Supreme Court to act contrary to both. In the view of many, Kennedy has gone against type in cases arising in several constitutional contexts. Among the earliest of his disagreements with members of the Court with whom he was presumed to share ideology came in Texas v. Johnson (1989), where his vote was crucial to a decision that constitutional protection of political dissent extended even to burning the American flag.

In Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992), a coalition of those opposed to abortion mounted a spirited attack on Roe v. Wade (1973), anticipating its overruling by a Supreme Court repopulated by Presidents openly in their camp. The ensuing judgment of the Court proved for social conservatives a victory Pyrrhic at best. Roe was upheld because Kennedy, along with O'Connor and Souter, formed a majority with their more liberal brethren. The three issued a joint opinion upholding the judgment in Roe, but proposing a less stringent test for the constitutionality of government restrictions on abortion. After Casey, legislatures have in theory greater latitude to curtail abortion services; restrictive regulations are now unconstitutional only if they impose on pregnant women an "undue burden." But the decision was surely a bitter pill for abortion's enemies. Although Kennedy (and his two co-authors) might be said in Casey to have left the constitutional right to an abortion less secure as a matter of law, they also denied to its opponents the sweeping victory of an explicit overruling and left any legislative curtailing of abortion access for judicial scrutiny only on a case-by-case basis.

Perhaps for social conservatives nothing makes Kennedy more the maverick than the positions he has taken in cases about homosexuality. While on the Ninth Circuit, Kennedy wrote in Beller v. Middendorf (1980) that the Constitution permits the Navy to make dismissal from the service a consequence of homosexual conduct. In hindsight, this case deserves less attention for its holding than for the qualification that came with it, because Kennedy took care to make clear that the question of whether homosexual conduct was constitutionally protected private conduct turned on the military setting in which the question was presented. In the Supreme Court, Kennedy declined to join Rehnquist, Scalia, and Thomas in upholding an amendment to Colorado's constitution forbidding any action by state agencies or officials to protect homosexuals from discrimination or afford them special treatment as members of a disadvantaged minority. Instead, he wrote for the majority in Romer v. Evans (1996) that such an amendment violated the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause. Purporting to apply the tolerant test of constitutionality appropriate whenever no fundamental right is at stake and no constitutionally protected minority is disadvantaged, Kennedy's opinion for the Court nevertheless held the amendment to a higher standard, signaling sympathy for the homosexuals marginalized by Colorado's action. Seven years later, Justice Kennedy wrote for the majority in Lawrence v. Texas (2003) that the Supreme Court had misconstrued the claims of the homosexual defendant in Bowers v. Hardwick (1986) that his conviction for sodomy violated the Fourteenth Amendment and that, in light of Casey and Romer, Bowers had to be overruled. According to the Court in Lawrence, for homosexual adults sodomy is a liberty protected from government interference by the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause.

In the eyes of its critics, not the least of the faults to be found in Kennedy's opinion in Lawrence is its proposition that what ought to be constitutionally protected as a fundamental human right can be ascertained by reference to values America "shares with a wider civilization." Kennedy's readiness to listen to the viewpoints of jurists and experts elsewhere appears also in his opinion for the Court in Roper v. Simmons (2005), in which it was held that the Eighth Amendment ruled out the death penalty for juvenile offenders. Kennedy's was truly the "swing" vote. He had earlier been one of the bare majority in Stanford v. Kentucky (1989) that had held to the contrary.

If Kennedy has on several occasions disappointed those who saw him at the time of his Supreme Court confirmation as a champion of judicial restraint and law and order, he has not always disappointed them. His was the deciding vote in Bush v. Gore (2000) against a recount of the Florida ballots in the presidential election of 2000. For Kennedy, the First Amendment's establishment clause does not dictate a wall between church and state. In his view, expressed first in County of Allegheny v. ACLU (1989) and later, for the Court, in Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District (1993), government is free to endorse religion in general as long as it refrains from favoring any religion in particular and so long as government does not coerce participation. He has turned out to be no fan of affirmative action, joining the Court in City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co. (1989) in its ruling that the equal protection clause forbids a city from favoring minority vendors in the award of municipal contracts, and refusing in Grutinger v. Bollinger (2003) and Gratz v. Bollinger (2003) to sanction either of the University of Michigan's attempts to increase diversity through admissions programs favoring minority applicants.

His approach to issues of criminal procedure also defies easy labeling. He has played an important part in restricting the writ of habeas corpus, writing for the Court in McClesky v. Zant (1991) that the Constitution entitled a prisoner to more than one such review only when a subsequent claim of constitutional error could not have been part of the earlier petition, and he supplied the fifth vote in Murray v. Giarrantano (1989), in which the Court held that indigent death-row prisoners were not entitled to the assistance of counsel for habeas corpus petitions to state courts. On the other hand, in a speech to the American Bar Association in 2003, Justice Kennedy called into question much of the contemporary American system of corrections. He questioned the sheer number of persons incarcerated in America, the disproportionate presence in that population of African Americans, as well as the cost of such a penal system and its inadequate funding. He questioned the lengthening of sentences that resulted from the federal sentencing guidelines and lamented the atrophying of the pardon power. He argued for renewed attention to the goal of rehabilitation, and he challenged the entire American bar to pursue broad reforms in sentencing and clemency.

In the eye of a beholder, the constitutional progress of Anthony Kennedy has been either a disappointing detour from judicial restraint or else a laudable search for the higher path of judicial decision making. That choice is still history's.

JOHN PAUL JONES

References and Further Reading

- The Current Court: Anthony M. Kennedy.* The Supreme Court Historical Society, <http://www.supremecourthistory.org/myweb/justice/kennedy.htm>
- Ahmar, Akhil, Justice Kennedy and the Ideal of Equality, Pacific Law Journal 28 (1997): 515.
- Cushman, Claire, ed. "Anthony M. Kennedy" in The Supreme Court Justices: Illustrated Biographies, 1789–1993. Washington D.C.: Congressional Quarterly (1993): 516–520.
- Jones, John Paul. "Anthony McLeod Kennedy" in Urofsky, Melvin I., ed. The Supreme Court Justices:

A Biographical Dictionary. New York: Garland Publishing Co., 1994, pp. 277–279.

Review of the Supreme Court's Term. The United States Law Week (annually, in several serial installments). Washington, D.C.: The Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., 1992–2004.

Savage, David G. Turning Right: The Making of the Rehnquist Court. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1992.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Beller v. Middendorf*, 632 F.2d 788 (9th Cir. 1980)
- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Bush v. Gore*, 531 U.S. 98 (2000)
- Chadha v. INS*, 634 F.2d 408 (9th Cir.1978)
- City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co.*, 488 U.S. 469 (1989)
- Commodity Futures Trading Commission v. Schor*, 478 U.S. 833 (1986)
- County of Allegheny v. ACLU*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
- Gratz v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 244 (2003)
- Grutinger v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 306 (2003)
- Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District*, 508 U.S. 384 (1993)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
- Massachusetts v. Sheppard*, 468 U.S. 981 (1984)
- McClesky v. Zant*, 499 U.S. 467 (1991)
- Murray v. Giarrantano*, 492 U.S. 1 (1989)
- Pacemaker Diagnostic Clinic of America, Inc. v. Instromedix, Inc.*, 725 F.2d 537 (9th Cir. 1984)
- Planned Parenthood v. Casey*, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
- Romer v. Evans*, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)
- Roper v. Simmons*, 125 S. Ct. 1183 (2005)
- Stanford v. Kentucky*, 492 U.S. 361 (1989)
- United States v. Harvey*, 711 F.2d 144 (9th Cir. 1983)

KENT V. DULLES, 357 U.S. 116 (1957)

The Supreme Court's decision in Kent v. Dulles established the right to travel abroad as a liberty protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The case involved two passport applications that the Secretary of State, acting under statutes authorizing the President to regulate the issuance of passports, had denied on the basis of applicants' alleged affiliations with the Communist Party. In a five-to-four decision, the Court concluded that the Secretary was not authorized to adopt regulations that, in effect, denied passports to citizens on the basis of political belief and associations.

Because the petitioners' passport applications involved the exercise of a constitutionally protected activity, the Court applied a narrow rule of construction for the powers delegated to the Secretary of State. Accordingly, it concluded that without an explicit provision articulated by Congress, it was impermissible for the Secretary to use political belief and associations as a standard in restricting citizens' freedom of movement. With this conclusion, the decision did not address the constitutionality of the particular restrictions involved in the case. Allegiance to the United States and applicant's participation in illegal activity were recognized as valid grounds for refusing a passport. However, neither was found to be relevant to this case.

Kent established travel abroad as a constitutionally protected activity and became the basis for subsequent decisions involving regulation of passports and travel to certain countries. However, later cases emerging in the context of international crises upheld the President's authority to restrict international travel in accordance with foreign policy interests.

DIANA H. YOON

References and Further Reading

Laursen, Thomas E., Constitutional Protection of Foreign Travel, Columbia Law Review 81 (1981): 902–931.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1957)

See also Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500 (1964); Due Process; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981); Right to Travel

KENTUCKY AND VIRGINIA RESOLVES

The Kentucky and Virginia Resolves were issued in response to the Alien and Sedition Acts that, after continuous criticism by the Republicans during the Quasi-War with France, had been enacted by President John Adams and the Federalist majority in Congress. A fear that immigrants might spread the French Revolution to America inspired passage of the Alien Acts. The Sedition Act made criticism of government officials a crime. In the sedition trials, lawyers failed to persuade the Federalist federal judges, through judicial review, to strike down the Sedition Act as unconstitutional for violating the First Amendment. Federalists contended that the First Amendment was to be understood in a common law context wherein the right to freedom of the press would prevent prior constraint of publication by the government, such as censorship, but not subsequent constraint of publication, such as seditious libel. Furthermore, they defended the Sedition Act as an improvement on the common law by accepting truth as a defense, considering the defendant's intent, and allowing juries to determine both law and fact.

Republicans, using state legislatures where they had strong majorities, passed the Virginia Resolves in 1798 written anonymously by James Madison and the Kentucky Resolves in 1798 and 1799 written anonymously by Thomas Jefferson. The Virginia legislature also followed with a report, mostly written by Madison, that explained the resolutions. The documents attested to a strong attachment to the Constitution and the union and asserted that states through conventions were parties of the compact that ratified the Constitution and that the people of the states granted specific enumerated powers to the federal government (U.S. Constitution, Article I, Section 8) and reserved other powers to the states (Tenth Amendment).

The compact theory was used later for South Carolina nullification and for secession. Although Jefferson used the words “void, and of no force” and “nullification” in his resolutions, as Madison explained, they were not calling for actual nullification. Indeed, the Virginia government allowed a federal sedition trial to take place in the state. Instead, they were asserting the doctrine of interposition, that states, being parties of the compact, had the right to give an opinion on the constitutionality of an act of the federal government. In this case, they declared unconstitutional the Alien Acts for violating separation of powers by mixing executive, judicial, and legislative functions, and the Sedition Act, for violating the First Amendment.

The Sedition Act, according to the Virginia Resolves, exercises “a power not delegated by the constitution, but on the contrary expressly and positively forbidden by [the First Amendment]. . . a power which more than any other ought to produce universal alarm, because it is leveled against that right of freely examining public characters and measures, and of free communication among the people thereon, which has ever been justly deemed, the only effectual guardian of every other right.” In the Report, Madison added, the First Amendment should protect writers who intend to bring politicians into disrepute.

He wanted freedom of the press to be understood outside the context of the common law (which, being a law that covered the entire field of legislation, he considered to be unconstitutional at the federal level). By this interpretation, the First Amendment prohibited the federal government from engaging in either prior or subsequent constraint of publication.

Through the nineteenth century, the actions of Kentucky and Virginia took on mythical proportions as a grand states-rights stand for liberty against the abuse of power. At the time, however, given the popularity of the Federalists, the Kentucky and Virginia Resolves did not receive a consensus of support in America. Indeed, even in the Virginia legislature, a minority report written by John Marshall defended the Sedition Act as constitutional. Also, the Resolves did not initiate a movement to end seditious libel.

This was not a story of Republican “good guys” versus Federalist “bad guys.” Although the Sedition Act was not renewed after the election of 1800, Republicans in power prosecuted Federalist editors for seditious libel at the state level and in a federal case that led to United States v. Hudson and Goodwin.

The Kentucky and Virginia Resolves are significant, first, for the defense of federalism and an important role for the states. Second, in the twentieth century, the Supreme Court moved beyond the common law meaning of freedom of the press and accepted Madison’s interpretation that the First Amendment applied to both prior and subsequent constraint of publication. This has become the Resolves’ main contribution to civil liberties.

F. THORNTON MILLER

References and Further Reading

- Elkins, Stanley M., and Eric McKittrick. The Age of Federalism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Koch, Adrienne. Jefferson and Madison: The Great Collaboration. New York: Knopf, 1950.
- Levy, Leonard W. Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Miller, John C. Crisis in Freedom: The Alien and Sedition Acts. Boston: Little Brown, 1951.
- Rutland, Robert A. James Madison: the Founding Father. New York: Macmillan, 1987.
- Smith, James Morton. Freedom’s Fetters: The Alien and Sedition Laws and American Civil Liberties. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1956.
- Watkins, William J., Jr. Reclaiming the American Revolution: The Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions and Their Legacy. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States v. Hudson and Goodwin, 7 Cranch 32 (1812)

See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Constitution of 1787; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Jefferson, Thomas; Judicial Review; Madison, James; Marshall, John

KEVORKIAN, JACK (1928–)

Jack Kevorkian, the son of Armenian immigrants, graduated from the University of Michigan Medical School in 1952 with a degree in pathology and soon earned the name Doctor Death from his efforts to take pictures of the eyes of dying patients to determine what, if anything, they saw. By the 1980s, Kevorkian had published a number of articles on death and dying and began advertising in the Detroit newspapers as a “physician consultant” for “death counseling.” In 1988, he published “The Last Fear-some Taboo: Medical Aspects of Planned Death,” proposing that people who wanted to die should be allowed to do so in “suicide clinics.”

During the 1980s, the idea of a “right to die” began to be accepted by both the public and by the courts. The very first such case, In re Quinlan in 1976, had brought the issue of allowing terminally ill patients to die to the forefront of public opinion; in the Cruzan case (1990), the Supreme Court ruled that while a right to die existed, it could be regulated by the state’s interest in preserving life.

If terminally ill patients on life support had the right to end their treatment and suffering, Kevorkian argued, then sick people who were not on life support ought to be allowed to have a physician assist them in ending their lives. In 1989, using $30 worth of scrap parts, he built his “suicide machine,” and the following year helped Janet Adkins, a fifty-four-year-old Portland, Oregon, woman with early signs of Alzheimer’s disease, kill herself using his machine (consisting of three tubes containing lethal doses of medication, operated by the patient) in his 1968 Volkswagon van near Holly, Michigan. She would be the first of more than 100 people that Kevorkian helped to die, either through use of the machine or, after his medical license was suspended so he could not get the medications, by inhalation of carbon monoxide.

Kevorkian’s methods, disapproved by nearly all respectable physicians, nonetheless touched off a debate over individual autonomy. Suicide was no longer a crime in American jurisdictions, but assisting suicide remained a felony in many states. The AIDS crisis had focused attention of people who wanted to end their suffering yet were not on life support and so could not just “pull the plug.” While Kevorkian and his methods remained on the fringes, more respectable groups and individuals began lobbying for the idea that physician-assisted suicide, similar to what was available in The Netherlands, ought to be a part of the individual autonomy protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The idea of a constitutional right to physician-assisted suicide, however, was vetoed by the Supreme Court in 1997 in Washington v. Glucksberg.

Despite continued harassment by police, Kevorkian managed to avoid conviction on a variety of charges, because he had been careful not to administer the drugs himself. Then he decided to push the envelope, and on November 22, 1998, the CBS show 60 Minutes aired a videotape, provided by Kevorkian, showing him giving a lethal injection to Thomas Youk, age fifty-two, who suffered from Lou Gehrig’s disease. Kevorkian made it very plain that he expected the police to arrest him and that his trial would make it clear to the American people that physician-assisted suicide belonged among the inalienable rights of man.

At his trial, however, Kevorkian insisted on defending himself and threatened to starve himself if he was sent to jail. On April 13, 1999, a jury found Kevorkian guilty of second-degree murder, and the judge sentenced him to ten to twenty-five years in prison; he would be eligible for parole in six years.

Although Kevorkian apparently failed in his crusade, he did contribute to opening a dialogue on quality of life and a right to death. So far, only one state has decriminalized assisted suicide, and the statistics from Oregon show that relatively few people take advantage of the state's laws.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Betzold, Michael. Appointment with Dr. Death. Troy, MI: Momentum Books, 1993.
 Urofsky, Melvin I. Lethal Judgments: Assisted Suicide and American Law. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health*, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)
Quinlan, In re, 355 A.2d 647 (N.J. 1976)
Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)

KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR. (1929–1968)

On January 15, 1929, Martin Luther King, Jr. was born to Rev. and Mrs. Martin Luther King, Sr. As was the custom, MLK, Jr. was born in the family home located at 501 Auburn Avenue, N.E. in Atlanta, Georgia. He was the second child and first son born to Rev. and Mrs. King, Sr. At birth, MLK, Jr. was named “Michael” Luther King, Jr. after the Senior King. When MLK, Jr. was five years old, the Senior King changed both of their first names from “Michael” to “Martin.”

MLK, Jr. excelled in his studies from an early age—he skipped both the ninth and twelfth grades of high school, and, as a result, he entered Morehouse College (Atlanta, Georgia) at fifteen years old. In 1948, he earned his BA degree in Sociology from Morehouse. In 1951, he earned a Bachelor of Divinity degree from Crozier Theological Seminary (Chester, Pennsylvania). At Crozier, among his various accolades, he was both senior class president and valedictorian.

Four years later, in 1955, MLK, Jr. earned his Ph.D. degree in Systemic Theology from Boston University.

Having been ordained into the Baptist Ministry in 1948 (at nineteen years old)—that year, MLK, Jr. accepted the position of assistant pastor at Ebenezer Baptist Church (Atlanta, Georgia)—the “family” church. MLK, Jr. served as assistant pastor at Ebenezer for approximately seven years. Both MLK, Jr.’s grandfather and father—Rev. MLK, Sr.—served as pastor of Ebenezer (MLK, Sr. served as pastor for a total of forty-four years—even after MLK, Jr.’s death).

MLK, Jr. and Coretta Scott were married in 1953. They later had four children (born from 1955 through 1963). After completing his Ph.D. studies in 1954, Dr. King accepted the position of pastor at Dexter Avenue Church (Montgomery, Alabama). He served as pastor from 1954 until 1959.

In 1959, MLK, Jr. resigned as pastor of Dexter Avenue Baptist Church to return to Atlanta to become a more full-time director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) that he had founded in 1957. He remained associated with SCLC until his death in 1968. In addition, Rev. King, Jr. served as copastor (with his father) of Ebenezer Baptist Church from 1960 until 1968.

From the mid-1950s until his assassination in 1968, Dr. MLK, Jr. became internationally known for his incredible efforts and strides toward civil rights for those living in poverty and facing racial discrimination within the United States. Throughout his lifetime, MLK, Jr. espoused and followed the teachings and philosophy of “passivist resistance” or “non-violent noncooperation” as espoused by Mohandas Gandhi (1869–1948), who was known as the “Father of Nonviolent Agitation.”

It should be noted that Dr. MLK, Jr.’s activities, merits, and efforts are too numerous to completely detail in encyclopedic form. As president of the Montgomery Improvement Association, Dr. King launched the successful Montgomery Bus Boycott protesting the fact that black riders were forced to sit or stand in the back of the bus and use the back door for entry while White patrons sat in the front and used the front door (the front seats remained empty when no White riders were present). The protest was sparked by the refusal of Ms. Rosa Parks to remove herself to the back of the bus and relinquish her seat to a White patron. After a 381-day protest, black riders won equal access to public transportation services in Montgomery, Alabama.

During the boycott, Dr. King, Jr. was arrested—at that time, it was illegal in the State of Alabama to boycott. This would be the first of more than thirty arrests that Dr. King, Jr. would endure in his efforts to bring freedom and equality to all citizens.

In 1963, Dr. King led sit-in demonstrations to desegregate lunch counters and eating facilities in Birmingham, Alabama. He was arrested during one such demonstration, ironically that particular march was in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation—in April 1963; while imprisoned, he wrote his famous Letter from a Birmingham Jail. The Letter has been praised as “one of the most important documents of nonviolent protest in the civil rights movement.” As an apt illustration of Martin Luther King, Jr.’s philosophy of nonviolence and a Christ-like acceptance of personal responsibility, in part, the Letter states:

One who breaks an unjust law must do so openly, lovingly, and with a willingness to accept the penalty. I submit that an individual who breaks a law that conscience tells him is unjust, and who willingly accepts the penalty of imprisonment in order to arouse the conscience of the community over its injustice, is in reality expressing the highest respect for the law.

MLK, Jr. encouraged citizens from all corners of society to engage in nonviolent protest with equality for all as the goal. Assisting in the Birmingham march and sit-ins throughout the South were members of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), which had been founded in 1960 by college students to organize lunch counter sit-ins and other antisegregation demonstrations. In May of 1963, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Birmingham, Alabama, segregation ordinances (including lunch counters) were unconstitutional.

Decrying inequality between the races, on August 28, 1963, the now-famous “March on Washington” was held. At that time, Black unemployment was eleven percent, whereas White unemployment stood at five percent. Similarly, on average, White families earned $6,500 per year, whereas an average Black family earned $3,500 per year. During the March on Washington, MLK, Jr. made his historic I Have a Dream Speech from the steps of the Lincoln Memorial. This integrated protest march drew more than 250,000 protestors to the Washington Monument in Washington, D.C.—at that time, the largest march and protest of its kind.

To oppose racial inequality in voting rights, in March of 1965, Rev. King and about 4,000 members of the SCLC held a march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama (the “Selma-to-Montgomery March”)—with the protection of federal troops—before reaching their destination, nearly 30,000 supporters swelled the ranks of the march. At the capitol, Dr. MLK, Jr. gave his well-known How Long? . . . Not Long? Speech. During this time, and as a testament to the teachings and labors of MLK, Jr., the Voting Rights Act of 1965 was enacted by President Lyndon B. Johnson. In honorarium, MLK, Jr. and other civil rights activists were present at the Presidential bill signing.

In July of 1967, due largely to the efforts of Dr. King, Jr. and members of the SCLC, it was reported by the Justice Department that—in the states of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina—more than fifty percent of all eligible African-American residents were registered to vote.

In April of 1968, Dr. King was in Memphis, Tennessee, to help lead a protest by sanitation workers against low pay rates and substandard working conditions. In late-March, Dr. King, Jr. had led 6,000 protestors through downtown Memphis in support of the striking sanitation workers. With a predictive title, Dr. King delivered his final public speech—I’ve Been to the Mountaintop—in Memphis on April 3, 1968. In prophetic terms, The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. exclaimed:

Well, I don’t know what will happen now. We’ve got some difficult days ahead, but it really doesn’t matter to me now because I’ve been to the mountaintop. And I don’t mind. Like anybody, I would like to live a long time, longevity has its place. But I’m not concerned about that now. I just want to do God’s will. . . I may not get there with you. But I want you to know tonight that we, as a people, will get to the Promised Land! And so I’m happy tonight! I’m not fearing any man! Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord!

The following day, on April 4, 1968, Martin Luther King, Jr. was shot and killed by James Earl Ray while standing on the balcony of his room at the Lorraine Motel.

Four days after Dr. MLK, Jr.’s assassination, Rep. John Conyers (D-MI) introduced the first bill in the United States Congress proposing the creation of a federal holiday in honor of Martin Luther King, Jr. It would take another two decades for Rep. Conyers’ dream to become a reality.

During his lifetime, MLK, Jr. was awarded innumerable awards and honorary degrees—both nationally and internationally. For example, he was named Time Magazine’s Man of the year in 1963. In addition, as perhaps the ultimate testament to his efforts, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964. At thirty-five years old, he was the youngest man to earn this honor and was only the second American so awarded.

In addition to his public works for civil rights and peace, in a short ten-year time-span, Dr. King wrote and published six books and numerous articles. The titles, publication dates, and general topics of the books are as follows: Stride Towards Freedom, 1958 (Montgomery Bus Boycott); The Measure of a Man, 1959 (selected sermons); Why We Can't Wait, 1963 (Birmingham Campaign); Strength to Love, 1963 (selected sermons); Where Do We Go From Here: Chaos or Community?, 1967 (world-related issues); and The Trumpet of Conscience, 1968 (posthumously) (Massey Lectures).

States began to hold statewide (and state-sanctioned) celebrations of the MLK, Jr. Holiday beginning with Illinois in 1973. Finally, after nearly twenty years in the making, to commemorate the life and works of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in 1986, President Ronald Reagan signed the legislation enacting the Martin Luther King, Jr. National Holiday. Unfortunately, some states like Arizona, Mississippi, and New Hampshire took many years to acknowledge the holiday.

In August of 1994, President William Clinton enacted the Martin Luther King, Jr. Federal Holiday and Service Act. The intent of the law is to expand the purpose of the King Holiday to encompass "community service, interracial communication, and youth anti-violence initiatives." To this end, the King Center entreats every American "to commemorate this Holiday by making your personal commitment to serve humanity.... And with our hearts open to this spirit of unconditional love, we can indeed achieve the 'Beloved Community' of Martin Luther King, Jr.'s dream."

On December 8, 1999, a jury in Memphis, Tennessee, concluded that governmental agencies (including the City of Memphis, the State of Tennessee, and the federal government) were part of a conspiracy to assassinate The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

If we make the right choice, we will be able to transform the jangling discords of our world into a beautiful symphony of brotherhood. If we make the right choice, we will be able to speed up the day, all over America and all over the world, when justice will roll down like waters, and righteousness like a mighty stream.

MLK, Jr., Beyond Vietnam, (at the Riverside Church, NYC) April 4, 1967

CYNTHIA G. HAWKINS-LEÓN

References and Further Reading

- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years (1954–1963). New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.
- . Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years (1963–1965). New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.
- Carson, Clayborne, and David J. Garrow et al., eds. Eyes on the Prize Civil Rights Reader: Documents, Speeches, and Firsthand Accounts from the Black Freedom Struggle, 1954–1990. New York: Penguin Books, 1991.

- Frady, Marshall. Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Penguin Group, 2002.
- Hooks, Benjamin, with Jerry Guess. The March for Civil Rights: The Benjamin Hooks Story. Chicago: ABA Publishing, 2003.
- The King Center, <http://www.thekingcenter.org> (last accessed July 16, 2005).
- McWhirter, Darien A. The Legal 100: A Ranking of the Individuals Who Have Most Influenced the Law. Secaucus, NJ: Carol Publishing Group, 1998.
- Meacham, Jon, ed. Voices in Our Blood: America's Best on the Civil Rights Movement. New York: Random House, 2001.
- O'Reilly, Kenneth, and David Gallen, eds. Black Americans: The FBI Files. New York: Carroll & Graf Publishers, Inc., 1994.
- National Park Service. Martin Luther King Jr. Historic Site, <http://www.nps.gov/malu/> (last accessed July 16, 2005).
- Pepper, William F. An Act of State: The Execution of Martin Luther King. London: Verso, 2003.
- Quarles, Benjamin. The Negro in the Making of America. 3rd Ed. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987.
- Smith, Marcia A. Black America: A Photographic Journey—Past to Present. San Diego: Thunder Bay Press, 2002.
- Stanford University. The Martin Luther King, Jr. Papers Project. <http://www.stanford.edu/group/King/> (last accessed July 16, 2005).
- Washington, James M., ed. A Testament of Hope: The Essential Writings and Speeches of Martin Luther King, Jr. San Francisco: Harper Collins Publishers, 1986.
- Williams, Cecil J. Freedom Justice: Four Decades of the Civil Rights Struggle as Seen By a Black Photographer of the Deep South. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1995.
- Williams, Juan. Eyes on the Prize: America's Civil Rights Years, 1954–1965. New York: Penguin Books, 1988.

See also Demonstrations and Sit-Ins; Marches and Demonstrations; Segregation

KINGSLEY INTERNATIONAL PICTURES CORPORATION v. REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF NEW YORK, 360 U.S. 684 (1959)

The Motion Picture Division of the New York State Education Department was authorized to issue licenses for the exhibition, sale, lease, or distribution of motion pictures. Licenses could be denied to any motion picture portraying in whole or in part, either "expressly or impliedly" immoral, perverse, or lewd sexual acts as "desirable, acceptable, or proper patterns of behavior." When Kingsley International Pictures submitted a filmed version of H. D. Lawrence's novel, Lady Chatterley's Lover to the Education Division for a license, it was denied on the grounds that isolated scenes were immoral. The corporation appealed to the University of New York Regents who upheld the decision after they concluded the film presented adultery as acceptable and proper behavior. A lower court annulled the Regents' decision, but a sharply divided New York Court of Appeals reinstated the rescission and upheld the Regents. The Court of Appeals declared that although Lady Chatterley's Lover was not obscene, it nevertheless "alluringly portrays adultery as proper behavior."

The Supreme Court reversed the New York court and struck down the statute's new sections. As Justice Potter Stewart in his lead opinion stated, "Once again the Court is required to consider the impact of New York's motion picture licensing law upon First Amendment liberties." While Stewart delivered the Court's opinion, there were five written concurring opinions. Justices Black, Frankfurter, and Clark wrote separately. Justice Douglas' concurrence was joined by Justice Black. Justice Harlan's opinion was joined by Justices Frankfurter and Whittaker.

Justice Stewart's brief opinion quickly dismissed the notion that a motion picture could be denied a license because it approvingly portrayed an adulterous relationship "quite without reference to the manner of its portrayal." To conclude otherwise, he declared, would mean New York could suppress Lady Chatterley's Lover on the basis that it "advocates an idea—that adultery under certain circumstances may be proper behavior. Yet the First Amendment's basic guarantee is of freedom to advocate ideas. The State, quite simply, has thus struck at the very heart of constitutionally protected liberty."

Black and Douglas shared the view that New York's law involved prior censorship of motion pictures and thus violated the precedent set in Near v. Minnesota (1931) barring prior restraint. Black wrote separately to lament the Court's "individualized determination" of whether publications or motion pictures were obscene had converted it into a "Supreme Board of Censors." Frankfurter and Harlan agreed with the majority's judgment but not its rationale. Both thought the Court's opinion failed to address the issue of "vagueness," which had been the grounds for earlier decisions against New York's law; that the opinion misconstrued the views of the New York courts; and that even though they agreed, New York's law was constitutional its application to Lady Chatterley's Lover exceeded constitutional bounds.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Gossett, John S., and Juliet Dee. "Near v. Minnesota." in Parker, Richard A., ed. Free Speech on Trial. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2003.
- Rembar, Charles. The End of Obscenity: The Trials of Lady Chatterley, Tropic of Cancer, and Fanny Hill. New York: Random House, 1968.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents of the University of New York*, 360 U.S. 684 (1959)
- Near v. Minnesota*, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)

KIRBY v. ILLINOIS, 406 U.S. 682 (1972)

A suspect's right to counsel's presence during an eyewitness identification procedure was established in United States v. Wade in 1967 to avert suggestive procedures and prevent convicting the innocent. Wade and Gilbert v. California involved lineups conducted after the suspects were indicted. But in Kirby, the identification procedure took place just after arrest and before formally charging. Police often seek an identification to confirm police suspicions before formally charging. Kirby argued the suggestive influences at issue in Wade-Gilbert were equally likely in this time setting; indeed, the witness identified him in a highly suggestive one-on-one show-up confrontation. However, the Court majority refused Kirby's request to extend the Wade-Gilbert right to counsel to preformal-charging eyewitness identification procedures, although the Court had provided a right to counsel to persons during preformal-charging interrogation procedures in Escobedo v. Illinois and Miranda v. Arizona. The Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies "in all criminal prosecutions," and the Court majority finds the criminal prosecution begins only at or after the initiation of adversary criminal proceedings—whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment. Once a formal charge occurs, an identification procedure will constitute a critical stage in the criminal prosecution such that the right to counsel applies. Kirby's definition of the onset of the criminal prosecution in the Sixth Amendment forced a recharacterization of the Miranda right to counsel as a judicially created Fifth Amendment right to counsel and limited the availability of counsel in other settings. United States v. Ash later limits Wade-Gilbert-Kirby.

MARGERY M. KOOSSED

References and Further Reading

- American Law Institute. A Model Code of Pre-Arrestment Procedure, Proposed Official Draft and Commentary. (1975): 419–458.
- Grano, Joseph D., et al., Do Any Constitutional Safeguards Remain Against the Danger of Convicting the Innocent?, Michigan Law Review 72 (1985): 717–798.
- Levine, Felice J., and June L. Tapp, The Psychology of Criminal Identifications: The Gap from Wade to Kirby, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 121 (1973): 1079–1131.

Panel Discussion, The Role of the Defense Lawyer at a Lineup in Light of the Wade, Gilbert, and Stovall Decisions, Criminal Law Bulletin 4 (1968): 273–296.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263 (1967)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. 220 (1977)
United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300 (1973)
United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)

See also Eyewitness Identification; Line-ups

KLEINDIENST v. MANDEL, 408 U.S. 753 (1972)

If authorized by Congress, the Executive Branch can deny noncitizens entry into the United States on ideological grounds even when the denial is inconsistent with First Amendment norms.

Mandel, a Belgian journalist and self-described revolutionary Marxist, was invited to speak to academics in the United States. The government denied his visa application because he was excludable under the Immigration and Nationality Act, which barred advocates of the doctrines of world communism from entering the United States. The Attorney General refused to waive the exclusion provision on the ground that Mandel had flagrantly abused a previous visa by engaging in activities “far beyond the stated purposes of his trip.”

Mandel asked the Court to address the following question: “Does the [government’s] action in refusing to allow an alien scholar to enter the country to attend academic meetings violate the First Amendment rights of American scholars and students who had invited him?” Sidestepping that question, the Court concluded that Congress’ plenary power over issues of admission, exclusion, and deportation of aliens trumped the legitimate First Amendment rights at stake at least in this case where the government had provided a “facially legitimate and bona fide” reason for refusing to waive the exclusion ground.

The plenary power doctrine continues to give the political branches deference to shape immigration law and policy even in ways inconsistent with cherished constitutional values and civil liberties.

MICHAEL A. SCAPERLANDA

References and Further Reading

Scanlan, John, Aliens in the Marketplace of Ideas: The Government, The Academy and the McCarran-Walter Act, Texas Law Review 66 (1988): 1481–1546.

Scaperlanda, Michael, Justice Marshall and the Legacy of Dissent in Federal Alienage Cases, Oklahoma Law Review 47 (1994): 55–74.

Shapiro, Steven, Ideological Exclusions: Closing the Border to Political Dissidents, Harvard Law Review 100 (1987): 930–945.

See also Academic Freedom; Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Bill of Rights: Structure; Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889) and the Chinese Exclusion Act; Freedom of Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Marketplace of Ideas Theory; National Security; National Security and Freedom of Speech; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Noncitizens and Civil Liberties; Plenary Power Doctrine; Terrorism and Civil Liberties

KLOPFER v. NORTH CAROLINA, 386 U.S. 213 (1967)

More than a year after an individual’s state court trial ended in a mistrial because of the jury’s inability to reach a verdict, the prosecutor asked the court to permit him to take a “nolle prosequi with leave,” a procedural device that discharged the accused from custody but did not permanently terminate the proceedings against him. Even though the prosecutor did not offer any justification for his request, the trial court, over the accused’s objection, granted the request, thereby allowing the prosecutor to reinstate proceedings at a future date.

In Klopper v. North Carolina, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment incorporates the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial (which itself applies only to federal prosecutions) and makes that provision applicable to the States. It also held that the procedural device in question denied the accused his federally guaranteed right to a speedy trial. The Court noted that the right to a speedy trial “has its roots at the very foundation of our English law heritage,” and it traced the history of the right from the twelfth century into the jurisprudence of this country, pointing out that every State guarantees its citizens the right to a speedy trial. The Court concluded that the right to a speedy trial is “fundamental” and “one of the most basic rights preserved by our Constitution,” and it pronounced that it is to be enforced in state prosecutions according to the same standards as in federal prosecutions.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th Ed. St. Paul, MN: Thompson-West, 2004, pp. 858–859, 864.
Recent Decision, Brooklyn Law Review 34 (1968): 2:316-328.

See also Fourteenth Amendment; Incorporation Doctrine; Speedy Trial

KOIS V. WISCONSIN, 408 U.S. 229 (1972)

Kois edited the “Kaleidoscope,” an underground, radical newspaper in Madison, Wisconsin. He was convicted and sentenced to two consecutive one-year terms in prison and fined $2,000 for publishing two photographs that accompanied a story in the interior of the paper dealing with the arrest of the paper’s photographer for possessing obscene material and for publishing on a separate occasion a poem recalling the author’s recollection of sexual intercourse. The Supreme Court in a per curiam opinion reversed Wisconsin’s Supreme Court that had affirmed Kois’ conviction. Justice Douglas concurred only in the judgment.

The per curiam explained the Wisconsin court erred with regard to the first offense, because it failed to recognize that the photographs only illustrated the theme or point of the story. “We do not think it can fairly be said, either considering the article as it appears or the record before the state court, that the article was a mere vehicle for the publication of the pictures.” The opinion then added, “A quotation from Voltaire in the flyleaf of a book will not constitutionally redeem an otherwise obscene publication. . . .” In the instance of the “Kaleidoscope” article and the two photographs, however, no similar subterfuge had been attempted.

As for the sexually explicit poem, the second offense for which Kois was convicted, the lower court erred by ignoring Roth’s emphasis that “sex and obscenity are not synonymous. . . . The portrayal of sex. . . is not itself sufficient reason to deny material the constitutional protection of freedom of speech and press.” In essence, the lower court failed to “look at the context of the material as well as its content.” The opinion then added, given the placement and location of the poem in the paper, “we believe it bears some of the earmarks of an attempt at serious art.” Context and indications of seriousness might factor into assessments of whether the “dominant” theme of the material appeals to prurient interests, because “the ‘dominance’ of the theme is a question of constitutional fact.”

Douglas’ concurrence protested the problems he thought Roth and its progeny had created for the Supreme Court, lower courts, law enforcement, and private individuals by trying to carve out an exception to the First Amendment. This case, he pointed out, provided ample proof of “the morass in which this Court has placed itself in the area of obscenity. Men are sent to prison under definitions which they cannot understand and on which lower courts and members of this Court cannot agree.”

ROY B. FLEMMING

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kois v. Wisconsin, 408 U.S. 229 (1972)
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

KOLENDER V. LAWSON, 461 U.S. 352 (1983)

Terry v. Ohio 392 U.S. 1 (1968) permits police to stop and frisk persons on less-than-probable cause, so long as the police have at least “reasonable suspicion” that a crime may have occurred. A number of states have statutes that also purport to allow police to stop or arrest persons who appear to be loitering or wandering about without purpose. Between March 1975 and January 1977, Edward Lawson, a black businessman crowned with dreadlocks, was held and questioned by San Diego police at least fifteen times. Mr. Lawson enjoyed walking late through exclusive residential neighborhoods at night, a hobby that eventually resulted in two prosecutions, and a misdemeanor conviction for violation of California Penal Code § 647(e), a statute that required persons who loiter or wander the California streets to provide “credible and reliable” identification and to “account for their presence.” A number of states have similar statutes, sometimes referred to as “stop and identify” statutes. Lawson filed a civil action seeking a declaratory judgment that 647(e) was unconstitutionally vague.

The United States Supreme Court held the California statute was void for vagueness because it “vests virtually complete discretion in the hands of the police to determine whether the suspect has satisfied the statute and must be permitted to go on his way in the absence of probable cause to arrest.” In particular, the statute failed to specify what was meant by the requirement that a suspect provide “credible and reliable” identification and failed to give “fair and adequate notice” of the type of conduct prohibited. The statute allowed excessive police discretion in determining what constituted reasonable suspicion as to whether the suspect fulfilled the identification request.

PETER A. COLLINS

References and Further Reading

- Hallock, Alan D., Stop-and-Identify Statutes After Kolender v. Lawson: Exploring the Forth and Fifth Amendment Issues, Iowa Law Review 69 (1984): 1057–1080.
- Silvestrini, Leslie V. F., Kolender v. Lawson: Fourth and Inches on Fourth Amendment Issues and Supreme Court Punts, Journal of Contemporary Law 10 (1984): 239–253.
- Stormer, Dan, and Paul Bernstein, The Impact of Kolender v. Lawson on Law Enforcement and Minority Groups, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 12 (1984): 71: 105–125.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)

See also Stop and Frisk; Void-for-Vagueness

KONIGSBERG V. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA, 366 U.S. 36 (1961)

Argued December 14, 1960, decided April 24, 1961, by a vote of five to four, Justice Harlan delivered the opinion for the Court, with Justice Black, Chief Justice Warren, Douglas, and Brennan dissenting. The Court held that Konigsberg's application for admission to the State Bar, denied because of his refusal to answer questions surrounding his connection to the Communist Party, did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. The decision signifies the remnants of McCarthyism and the Court's refusal to connect free speech and association to the Fourteenth Amendment.

Under California law, the California Committee of Bar Examiners certifies those able to practice law in the State of California. The State Supreme Court may review any applicant's qualifications. In hearings by the Committee, Konigsberg refused to answer any questions pertaining to his membership in the Communist Party, not on the ground of self-incrimination, but on the ground that such questions were beyond the purview of the Committee's authority and infringed rights of free thought, association, and expression assured him under the State and Federal Constitutions. Konigsberg was denied admission to practice.

Justice Harlan argued that the Fourteenth Amendment's protection against arbitrary state action does not forbid a State from denying admission to a bar applicant so long as he refuses to provide unprivileged answers to questions having a substantial relevance to his qualifications. Harlan went on to explain that it was the responsibility of the State of California to determine whether an applicant for license to practice law might be interested in the violent overthrow of the government.

Justice Black, Chief Justice Warren, Douglas, and Brennan dissented. Black's dissent argued that the majority decision was now asking Konigsberg to defend himself against unsubstantiated accusations. Konigsberg's attempt to connect his First Amendment free speech issues with the protections of the Fourteenth Amendment was persuasive to Black. Black wrote, "Nothing in this record shows that Konigsberg has ever been guilty of any conduct that threatens our safety. Quite the contrary, the record indicates that we are fortunate to have men like him in this country for it shows that Konigsberg is a man of firm convictions who has stood up and supported this country's freedom in peace and in war. The writings that the record shows he has published constitute vehement protests against the idea of overthrowing this Government by force. No witness could be found throughout the long years of this inquisition who could say, or even who would say, that Konigsberg has ever raised his voice or his hand against his country. He is, therefore, but another victim of the prevailing fashion of destroying men for the views it is suspected they might entertain."

AARON R. S. LORENZ

KU KLUX KLAN

The organization known as the Ku Klux Klan has hidden behind many masks since its inception during the years after the Civil War. Behind the images of sheets, masks, and symbols, the Klan has targeted many different groups. In fact, the Ku Klux Klan has had several different phases. The Klan has evolved from being a strictly southern institution that targeted African Americans and the Republican Party to a nationwide organization with a wide variety of objectives. Ironically, the Klan has also faced many groups attempting to infringe on its civil liberties as well.

The first Klan became an important institution during the Reconstruction Era. The Klan was founded in Pulaski, Tennessee, in 1866 as a social fraternity designed to provide mutual aid to Confederate families devastated by the war. However, the Klan soon changed into a vehicle to challenge the emancipation and new political rights of the freed slaves. The name Ku Klux Klan was derived from a Greek word for "circle" or "band." Former Confederate soldiers and officers helped to convert the Klan into a more organized band with the purpose of challenging Republican government in the South. As more and more Southern states elected Republican governments, the Klan rapidly spread.

The leadership of the Klan usually came from the leaders of communities all over the South. Elite landholders easily persuaded many others to join their cause by “uniting” under the banner of being white southerners. Initially, the Klan used their outlandish outfits to play on the supposed superstitions of southern blacks. Some of the first Klan actions involved showing up on porches in the middle of the night and parading as ghosts to frighten innocent citizens. Soon, however, these “practical jokes,” turned into real night terrors, as Klan night riders dragged people from their homes and administered the whip or otherwise assaulted them. Blacks were not the only target of the Klan; white Republicans and others that sympathized with the former slaves also became targets.

In response to Klan activities, local governments were usually either themselves involved in the Klan or powerless to stop it. In most cases, federal intervention was needed to break up Klan activity. The federal government used many means to stop, or at least disrupt, Klan activity by congressional legislation, military action, and trials. In 1870 and 1871, the federal government began a concerted effort to stamp out Klan violence. Congress began by enacting laws designed to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, which guaranteed rights to all citizens. Congress also passed new legislation that made it a federal offense to interfere with voting rights. The most powerful initiative passed by Congress came in April of 1871, which was popularly called the Ku Klux Klan act, which enabled the president to suspend habeas corpus rights and send in federal troops to suppress armed resistance.

With these added powers, the Grant administration effectively ended the power of the first Ku Klux Klan movement. Grant only used his powers to suspend habeas corpus in nine South Carolina counties, but he did effectively use federal troops to arrest thousands of suspected Klansmen. With the onset of federal power, the Klan lost much of its momentum and appeal in the South.

The second Ku Klux Klan developed in an era of fear and upheaval in the years before World War I. The founder of the second Klan was the son of a poor Alabama physician, William Joseph Simmons. He was a man who had tried his hand in many occupations such as farming, preaching as a Southern Methodist Episcopal minister, and finally as the lead organizer for the Atlanta area chapter of the Woodmen of the World, a fraternal aid society. In October 1915, Simmons officially began the second Ku Klux Klan with a handful of followers. Part of the inspiration for the founding of the second Ku Klux Klan was a racist film entitled, Birth of a Nation, by D. W. Griffith, which hailed the early Klan as having saved the nation from freed slaves threatening to destroy the nation.

In the following years, Simmons struggled to expand his organization, but by 1920, with the aid of several strong organizers, the second Klan’s membership erupted. To sell the idea of the Klan, Simmons and his followers promised white supremacy, Christianity, and male bonding, but also played on national fears surrounding the atmosphere of World War I. The Klan proclaimed itself to be the great defender of everything American, such as patriotism, old-time religion, and morality. They played on the fears of organized African Americans, Jews, and the Catholic Church. The Klan also found a new enemy in Bolshevism. All these fears helped fuel Klan membership. The members proclaimed themselves to be part of a great movement to secure the birthright of all Anglo-Saxon Protestant Americans. With this message, the ranks of Klan expanded to include as many as 4 million Americans by 1924, including its female auxiliary, Women of the Ku Klux Klan.

The second Ku Klux Klan differed in many ways from the original. From its southern beginnings, the second Klan spread above the Mason-Dixon Line. As many blacks moved to northern cities, they soon faced much of the same racism as they did in the South. Besides African Americans, Klan literature told of vast conspiracies involving Jews and Catholics. According to many Klan texts, Jewish bankers were extorting the American public for millions of dollars. Catholics also became a target, as Klan members accused priests and nuns of preying on Protestant children in orphanages around the country. Much of the Klan’s literature was also directed toward changing attitudes in America. During the 1920s, there was a sexual awakening in many parts of the country, and Klan literature reflected their attitudes toward this opening up of sexual mores. The Klan railed against supposed sexual abuses of whites and Protestants at the hands of African Americans and Catholic priests in many of their writings.

One aspect of the second Ku Klux Klan that is often overlooked is the level of violence. Many historians have pointed out that the second Klan was much less violent than the first, and in many cases this is true. Most Klan members did not participate in violent acts, but they expressed their views in other ways. Many marched in parades and participated in such activities as Klan barbecues and rallies. The second Ku Klux Klan was also responsible for establishing the most famous image of the Klan, the burning cross. Contrary to popular belief, the first Klan did not burn crosses, but the idea seemed to have been born in the novel The Clansmen, by Thomas Dixon. The symbol of the burning cross is still an issue in the courts of the United States. Recently, the Supreme Court ruled in cases in Virginia that cross burnings are legal expressions of free speech as long as there is no intent to intimidate any group. The cross burning was deemed legal because it took place on private property with the owner's consent. The Court has upheld the idea that even hateful speech is constitutionally protected.

The second Klan also became much more politically involved than the first. The Klan ran its own political candidates for office, and in many cities prominent citizens backed the Klan candidates. Through 1926, the Klan elected many officials in states such as Texas, Oklahoma, Indiana, Oregon, and Maine.

Despite many of its members not participating in violent acts, the second Klan did have its share of violence, particularly in Southern areas. Many Klansmen turned to violence to "prove" that in a rapidly changing world, they still had power. They acted out of what they believed was the world's rejection of their values and turned to violence to assert their power. In many areas, one of the most effective violent tools the Klan used was lynching. The numbers of lynchings in the South were very low before 1915, but by the early 1920s the number was on the rise. One case, in 1921, involved a Georgia man by the name of John Lee Eberhart. Eberhart was sought for the murder of a white farmer's wife near the city of Athens. Until this point, the local NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) assured residents that Athens was an area where lynchings were very unlikely. There was very little evidence against Eberhart, but a gathering crowd of Klan members was certain of his guilt. He was abducted from the Athens jail while a crowd of police and sheriffs deputies looked on. At this point, he was taken by the mob and tortured to death by fire. Shortly after his death, conclusive evidence showed Eberhart was not guilty, but the mob and the Klan had already issued its sentence.

Another famous lynching case involved Leo Frank, who was wrongfully accused of the murder of a young girl, Mary Phagan. The girl was murdered in the basement of a pencil factory in Atlanta, Georgia, in 1913, and two years later, the Klan lynched Leo Frank for the murder. The Leo Frank case spurred many important Supreme Court rulings dealing with civil liberties. The Court has argued issues such as an inflamed public and the admissibility of perjured testimony, with its roots in the Leo Frank case.

Another target of Klan violence, especially in the South, was against those trying to organize labor. The Klan targeted labor leaders for trying to destroy "white harmony" by insinuating that white and African American workers should come together in an effort for better wages. Local Klan chapters harassed organized labor leaders with burned crosses in their yards or more extreme measures such as beatings. The attacks on labor became so frequent that the American Federation of Labor adopted resolutions condemning the activities of secret societies, and named the Klan specifically.

The Klan is most well known for its opposition to the Civil Rights Movement. Because many African Americans worked for Civil Rights in the South, the Klan rose up in opposition. The new Klan adopted violence early on as one its major tools, and African Americans, along with those hoping to secure their rights, became the target. The most infamous use of Klan violence against Civil Rights workers occurred in Philadelphia, Mississippi, in 1964. During that year, many northern whites working alongside southern blacks attempted to register new voters and push for the end of segregation. On June 21, 1964, three Civil Rights workers were murdered by the Klan. Their bodies were buried beneath a pond dam but later discovered. Events such as these prompted many Americans to despise the Klan and actually helped to further the Civil Rights Movement.

The Klan has also faced its own issues in regard to civil liberties. Often the Klan has argued that national, local, and state governments have violated its rights to free speech and the freedom to peacefully assemble. The principal accusations made by the Klan have involved laws not allowing them to march, as well as anti-mask laws.

Anti-mask laws in many states have been on the books since the mid 1800s. The Klan has argued before the courts that these laws violate the principles of free speech. One of the most famous cases was in the state of New York in 1999. The city of New York refused to issue the Klan a permit to gather if they would not remove their masks. The New York Civil Liberties Union sued on behalf of the Klan, but a federal district court upheld the 1845 anti-mask law. The Klan has successfully sued to remove anti-mask laws in the states of Tennessee and Pennsylvania, arguing that the masks were part of their right to free speech and expression.

The three eras of the Ku Klux Klan have all been an effort to stem the tide of diversification and democratization of the United States. The Klan has attempted through violence, fraud, and political motivation to further their goals. All three entities of the Klan have failed in their various missions. The first Klan was thwarted by the federal government, while the second and third often failed because of their own actions. Today, the Ku Klux Klan is a splintered organization that still vows to promote white supremacy and decries the actions of Jews and African Americans. However, the modern Klan lacks much of the broad-based support the organization once enjoyed.

CHRISTOPHER TINGLE

References and Further Reading

- Chalmers, David. Hooded Americanism: The History of the Ku Klux Klan. F. Watts Company, 1981.
- MacLean, Nancy. Behind the Mask of Chivalry: The Making of the Second Ku Klux Klan. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

KUNSTLER, WILLIAM M. (1919–1995)

A hero to some, an enemy to others, William M. Kunstler, was known for his extreme radical views of the antiwar and antidiscrimination movements of the 1960s and 1970s. Committed to social justice and social change, his practice and success in law has given him a formidable reputation, contributing to the effects of counterculture development in the United States.

Kunstler's progressive beliefs in the struggle against inequality and injustices have been a character trademark that he has carried through out his personal life and career. Identifying with his association to the less fortunate, in his book, Kunstler writes: "I developed a concern for people who seemed to be in a weaker position and who needed my help" (Kunstler, 56); Kunstler was an impassioned man for the minority.

Graduating from Yale Law School in June 1941, Kunstler went on to pursue a brief career in the military, where he would be employed as a cryptographer decoding overseas messages for the military. Kunstler remained in the military for four years and ended his term as a major.

Shortly after returning home, Kunstler and his brother Michael began a small family law practice in 1948, Kunstler & Kunstler. In 1950, William Kunstler went on to teach law at New York Law School, where he ironically was asked to draft a will for a friend's associate, Senator Joseph McCarthy, Kunstler's eventual nemesis.

The 1960s brought with it a wave of oppression and discrimination to the country. FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover was in hot pursuit of political rights activists, the Black Panther Party was driving violence-provoked riots, the antiwar movement was in full swing, and the government was targeted for precipitating civilian massacres and mass blood baths.

In October 1968, FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover issued warrants for the arrest of eight political rights activists who were all charged with conspiring against the Federal antiriot statute. Among the eight prosecuted were Abbie Hoffman, who was the founder of National Mobilization to End the War in Vietnam (MOBE), Dave Dellinger, Bobby Seale, a Black Panther chairman, and student, Lee Weiner. Kunstler was asked by Abbie Hoffman, one of the leaders of "Yippie," a youth international party whose purpose was to spur political upheaval, as defense lawyer. Kunstler's ability in tact to outfox a politically crafted and manipulated jury and judge using humanist expression was a talent he would continue to use and become known for through out his career.

February 18, 1970, the Chicago trial "turned out to be a monumental victory" (Kunstler 36). Defendants had been acquitted of charges, ultimately demonstrating to the country, nationwide, that the power of justice lay in the people. Among those who did receive sentences and fines were Abbie Hoffman and Dave Dellinger with a penalty of five years in prison and a $5,000.00 fine. The jury ultimately could not deny the defendants' expressions and beliefs in political freedom. Their exhibition of refusing to be silenced in the courtroom for what they believed in contributed to their release.

Kunstler would go on to represent many more significant individuals who have brought liberation to the justice system. Among them, Martin Luther King Jr., Lenny Bruce, El Sayyid Nassir (accused of murdering Rabi Meir Kohane), Marlon Brando's son, and Malcom X. In addition, Kunstler's fervor for seeking cases that involve obstruction of civil rights included those of convicted felons, namely the inmates of Attica Correctional Facility in New York.

September 1973 would mark another notch for the public rally for the war against civil injustices. One thousand two hundred inmates composed of a group of Latinos, African Americans, and whites protested the injustices and abuse of prisoners by the Administration in the institution. Public company included Congressmen, politicians, news people, and newspapers. The public was interested, and the country would witness another atrocity of maltreatment by the justice system.

According to Kunstler, who was nominated acting representative, the inmate party was surprisingly democratic about their deliberations and demands, one of which was amnesty from criminal prosecution. Tension was rising, and state troopers were shooting at inmates to control hostilities. Helicopters loomed above the facilities, and police officers were blaring orders over loudspeakers. On September 13, Governor Nelson Rockefeller issued commands to inmates, ordering the group to lie down and no violence would come to them. At that moment, state troopers rushed in scattering thirty-two-caliber bullets into both inmates and hostages, killing forty-three people, ten of whom were innocent bystanders. Millions of Americans watched the brutality of the police force, witnessing insurrection being counterbalanced by blatant and criminal acts on the part of the government. Kunstler's voice raises the question of government control over insurgency in the country, yet also expresses the government's inability to deal with and solve criminal behavior. As he has indicated, the crime rate is increasing and institutions are on the up rise around the country.

Kunstler worked with civil rights activists and pursued political agendas that reflected his passion for liberation. He has gone down in history for helping those with vision to speak openly and without fear toward the justice system. Among other civil rights groups Kunstler supported were Gay Rights activists, Islamic political leaders, and Hispanic minorities.

Before he died at age 76, Kunstler's last speech given at The School of Architecture and Planning, State University of New York, clearly expresses who he was and what he has endowed to the country: "We sit here today in the comparative freedom of this institution and, yea, I'll say this country for the moment (though I don't believe it, too much), but I will say it, because of better men and women than we who went down in the dust somewhere in the line. They died or rotted in prisons, were expatriated, but they kept going. They were the Ishmaels of their time and our time" (Jackson).

MARIA STILSON

References and Further Reading

- Bernstein, Dennis, and Julie Light. "The Life and Times of William Moses Kunstler: Interview by Dennis Bernstein and Julie Light." <http://zena.secureforum.com/Znet/zmag/articles/oct95bernstein.htm>
- Jackson, Bruce. "Bill Kunstler's Last Great Speech: Public Ethics and the Bill of Rights". <http://buffaloreport.com/articles/030427kunstler.html>. Online. October 1995.
- Kunstler William M., and Sheila Isenberg, eds. My Life as a Radical Lawyer: William M. Kunstler. New York: Birch Lane Press, 1994.
- WGBH Archives. http://main.wgbh.org/saybrother/programs/sb_0416.html

KYLES v. WHITLEY, 514 U.S. 419 (1995)

In Kyles, the Supreme Court clarified Brady v. Maryland by holding that the due process clause requires a retrial when the government withholds exculpatory information from a criminal defendant that, when viewed cumulatively, would have made a different outcome reasonably likely.

At Kyles' murder trial, the prosecution presented four eyewitnesses and physical evidence, including the murder weapon, found in Kyles' apartment and in his trash. Kyles claimed that a man known as "Beanie" committed the murder and framed Kyles.

After his conviction, Kyles discovered that the government had withheld exculpatory information, including statements from eyewitnesses whose descriptions did not match Kyles and contradictory statements from Beanie demonstrating that Beanie had inside knowledge about the murder. However, the lower courts denied Kyles a new trial.

The Supreme Court reversed Kyles' conviction by a vote of five to four, holding that the lower courts had misapplied the test developed in United States v. Agurs and United States v. Bagley for deciding whether a Brady violation requires a new trial. The Court held that the lower courts erred by deciding whether each piece of withheld evidence, in isolation, would have made an acquittal reasonably likely instead of evaluating the cumulative effect of the withheld evidence. The Court concluded that all of the withheld evidence, considered together, likely would have changed the outcome.

Kyles thus rejected an approach that some lower courts had applied to Brady violations. After Kyles, courts must consider the entire picture to decide whether withheld evidence requires a new trial.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

- Imwinkelried, Edwin, and Norman Garland. Exculpatory Evidence. 2nd Ed. Michie, 1996.
- Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brady v. Maryland*, 373 U.S. 83 (1963)
- United States v. Agurs*, 427 U.S. 97 (1976)
- United States v. Bagley*, 473 U.S. 667 (1985)

See also Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment; United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976)

KYLLO v. UNITED STATES, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)

Having been enlisted in a surveillance effort led by federal law enforcement agencies investigating alleged illegal drug operations, an Oregon National Guard sergeant used a thermal-imaging device to monitor heat emissions coming from inside the home of Danny Lee Kyllo. With the aid of the device, which is able to detect heat emissions from sources that are invisible to the naked eye (for example, people standing behind doors, ovens in use, steam from hot water), the sergeant noticed considerable heat loss coming through the roof and one wall, leading him to infer that Kyllo was growing marijuana. Federal agents then acquired a search warrant for the home and charged Kyllo with multiple drug offenses.

Writing for the Court majority, Justice Antonin Scalia found that the authorities had overstepped their bounds, exceeding the normal allowance for surveillance with the naked eye and violating one of the core principles of the Fourth Amendment: “the right of a man to retreat into his own home and there be free from unreasonable governmental intrusion.” Of note as well, however, is the dissent written by Justice John Paul Stevens, who asserted a constitutionally significant distinction between direct observations (that is, what one might see or hear) of a private area, on the one hand, and indirect deductions, or “thought processes used to draw inferences from information in the public domain,” on the other.

Although Kyllo makes a strong case for the assumption of privacy within the home, the debate over what constitutes an “invasion” will continue, especially as law enforcement agencies draw on ever-more sophisticated surveillance technology.

BRIAN K. PINAIRE

References and Further Reading

Amar, Akhil Reed. The Constitution and Criminal Procedure. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)

See also Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; Privacy; Search (General Definition)

L

LA FOLLETTE, ROBERT MARION, SR. (1855–1925)

Early Life and First Political Experience

Robert Marion La Follette was the supreme champion of progressivism in state and national politics at the turn of the twentieth century and an “agitator” for free speech during World War I. La Follette was born in Primrose, Wisconsin, on June 14, 1855, to a farming family with roots in both Indiana and North Carolina. His father died during his early years, and his stern stepfather raised him on the family farm in Dane County, Wisconsin. He was able to attend the University of Wisconsin due in part to farm profits and the help from a local benefactor. While in college, La Follette excelled in oratory, which brought him notice in the local and regional newspapers. He attended law school and passed the bar in 1880. During this time, he met and married Belle Case, who was the first female graduate of the University of Wisconsin Law School. Together, the La Follettes began to understand and to promote the ideals of racial and sexual equality within their communities. After graduation, he won his first political position as District Attorney for Dane County as a Republican. He would hold this position for four years, until his election to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1884.

During his tenure as a Republican member of Congress, Bob La Follette’s reform ideals continued to grow and mature in his work on the House floor. He promoted women’s suffrage and their involvement in politics. He was a friend of Booker T. Washington and other African-American leaders and spoke out against the actions of Southern Representatives to limit African-American participation in the political process. After being exiled on the Indian Affairs Committee, he pushed for greater protection of Native American property rights against lumber companies. He was soon appointed to the Ways and Means Committee and worked with Theodore Roosevelt on tariff legislation. In 1890, his support helped to ensure the passage of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Despite his excellent record, he was voted out of office in 1890 because of the Democratic sweep of political offices in Wisconsin, which was in part due to state Republican support of “English only” school policies.

Fight against Corruption and the Wisconsin Idea

Bob La Follette returned back to his growing law practice in Wisconsin and was content to work as a lawyer, until one event transformed his life and political career. His brother-in-law was a judge who was presiding over a case involving men connected to Senator and lumber millionaire Philetus Sawyer. On September 17, 1891, Senator Sawyer offered La Follette fifty dollars to personally intervene in the case, and La Follette refused this request. Quickly, La Follette spread the word of this attempted bribe to his supporters and local Republicans. This outrage energized La Follette to re-enter politics to limit the power of the old network political caucuses and local “bosses.” He believed that the direct election of candidates was the only way to ensure the survival of representative government. La Follette, through his oratory, became a force within the progressive wing of the local Republican Party. The “Madison Ring” of political bosses and businessmen became the primary target of his speeches and campaigning. He remained true to the state Republican Party and worked to support the candidacy of William McKinley in 1892.

After the re-election of Grover Cleveland, La Follette’s stature continued to grow within the state. He tapped into the large Scandinavian population in Wisconsin by supporting a Norwegian-born candidate for governor and being able to converse in their language. La Follette led the charge to support William McKinley for presidency in 1896, while the other Republican national candidate had the support of the Sawyer faction in the state. With McKinley’s nomination confirmed, “Fighting Bob” now focused his energy to win the governor’s office in his native state. In both 1896 and 1899, La Follette was defeated in his goal to lead his beloved state. In 1896, the old party faction bribed members of his delegation to the party caucus to swing the vote to Edward Scofield. In the gubernatorial campaign of 1899, La Follette pushed himself even harder to campaign directly to the people and to continue his active law practice, but his health failed him. An extended sickness and exhaustion cut short this second quest for the governor’s chair, as well as the efforts of the old political machine to remain in power. By his third attempt in 1899, La Follette’s support grew even more with conservative Republicans coming aboard his campaign. He directed his speeches closer to moderate Republican issues and picked up support from many of Governor Scofield’s party regulars. On November 5, 1900, Robert M. La Follette was elected the twentieth governor in the history of Wisconsin and its first native-born governor.

On January 10, 1901, Bob La Follette broke with political tradition and delivered his two-hour inaugural address to the Wisconsin legislature. This speech, in effect, declared war on the old system of running state government. His speech began a political thought known as the “Wisconsin Idea.” This idea was that state government was to be a servant of the people and a defender against political corruption. The state would have a new partner to assist its efforts to reform itself and that partner would be its public university. The University of Wisconsin would become a “fourth branch of government” to assist and supervise the actions of state government. Efforts were made to introduce professionalism into all branches of Wisconsin state government and to remove political patronage from the governance of the state. Even though La Follette continued to use patronage to reward supporters, the public believed that the governor and his government were truly dedicated to their welfare.

Governor La Follette spoke about nearly two dozen topics of reform for the Commonwealth of Wisconsin but zeroed in on two main reforms: railroad tax valuation and primary election reform. These two main issues would consume the legislative activities of the state and her governor for nearly five years and three gubernatorial terms. Much of his legislative battles would be an internal fight between La Follette’s “progressives” and the “stalwarts,” who represented the old party supporters in the legislature. For five years, the governor battled the stalwarts to pass these two reform measures and survived two attempts to unseat him in political caucuses during the gubernatorial elections of 1902 and 1904. The direct primary system of electing candidates was finally passed in 1903 and was approved by referendum during the 1904 election.

A New Political Stage

During the 1905 legislative session, railroad tax valuation was passed, and a railroad commission was established to regulate the industry after much political fighting. This final success was completed while La Follette served as both governor and U.S. Senator representing Wisconsin. In the final election by the Wisconsin legislature for the U.S. Senate, the state representatives and senators elected La Follette as U.S. Senator. He quickly chose to serve his first year as U.S. Senator in Madison, Wisconsin, to finish the work of the 1905 Legislative Session. By January 1906, he resigned his position of Governor of Wisconsin to begin his nineteen-year career in the U.S. Senate.

His arrival in Washington, D.C., marked the beginning of La Follette’s fight to push a more radical version of progressivism onto the national stage. His efforts quickly ran into problems with the “old guard” in the U.S. Senate and the national leadership of the Republican Party. Bob La Follette quickly broke with Senate tradition by giving long speeches against business trusts and the power of the railroad companies over interstate commerce. He became known for his long filibusters on the senate floor against legislation that was crafted under President Theodore Roosevelt’s legislative supporters. La Follette’s relationship with Roosevelt and William Howard Taft began to sour as “Fighting Bob” pushed them to forward “progressive” ideals further than their conservative positions. La Follette saw Roosevelt’s “Square Deal” as not going far enough to punish the big trusts and their “bosses” for their extreme profits and power. In the 1909 Republican national primary, La Follette came in second to William Howard Taft, and as with previous elections, but La Follette continued to support his Republican Party in the general election.

During the Presidential Administration of Taft, La Follette continued to work against trusts and pushed his progressive agenda aggressively on the national stage. Increasingly, La Follette saw President Taft as an incompetent leader and unwilling to push the progressive agenda advocated by Theodore Roosevelt and La Follette. Former President Roosevelt also shared his view of President Taft, and soon the progressive wing of the Republican Party had two rivals fighting over its direction. La Follette was seen as the radical leader with socialistic connections with friendships with Eugene V. Debs and Lincoln Steffens. Roosevelt became the leader of the moderate progressives, who sought to retake the White House to push “New Nationalism.”

In 1911, La Follette helped to create the National Progressive Republican League to challenge Taft for the Republican nomination for President. La Follette sought to get Roosevelt’s support for that organization, but the two leaders continued to argue over the direction of the progressive movement. In February 1912, La Follette gave a speech in Philadelphia, Pa., which was harsh, long, and unorganized in its content. Even though the speech was due to La Follette’s illness and stress, the local newspaper reporters described it as “political suicide.” The speech allowed Roosevelt to step in as the voice of reason within the progressives. The supporters of La Follette and Roosevelt split the progressive vote, which allowed William Howard Taft to win the 1912 Republican nomination for President. Instead of supporting his party, La Follette chose to support the Democratic candidate Woodrow Wilson for the general election, while Theodore Roosevelt attempted a Third party candidacy with the “Bull Moose Party.”

International Crisis and Free Speech

With the election of Woodrow Wilson, La Follette refocused his efforts to combat railroad companies and support American labor in the U.S. Senate. La Follette agreed with most of President Wilson’s progressive efforts, even though he was a Democrat. The rising international crisis began to overtake the domestic progressive agenda pushed by American politicians. La Follette had taken an antiwar stance earlier in discussions over the European conflict, which was similar to positions advocated by William Jennings Bryan and Woodrow Wilson.

Unrestricted German submarine warfare and the Zimmerman telegram inflamed pro-war supporters in the nation, such as Theodore Roosevelt. Senator La Follette continued to support President Wilson’s efforts to end the war in Europe and to maintain American neutrality. As President Wilson’s views turned toward a possible American involvement in World War I, La Follette saw himself as the lone campaigner for reason during this time of crisis. La Follette staged filibusters to stop efforts to position the United States toward military intervention. On April 2, 1917, President Wilson called the U.S. Congress into special session to consider a declaration of war against Germany and her allies. Senator La Follette took this opportunity to fight to keep his nation from going to war. With an American flag on his lapel, La Follette gave a long speech protesting the course leading to war and attacked the American press for calling for bloodshed. Despite his efforts, war was declared on Germany, and La Follette became a target of the press and the pro-war lobby.

With the war a forgone conclusion, he turned his efforts to protect individual liberties during wartime. He attempted to stop the passage of the Espionage Act and was concerned that his own newspaper, La Follette’s Weekly, could be subjected to closure. Starting in September 1917, pro-war senators worked to have La Follette expelled from the U.S. Senate based on the text of La Follette’s remarks given in St. Paul, Minn., against American participation in World War I. La Follette fought back with his fiery oratory through his speech on “Free Speech in Wartime” in October 1917. The efforts to remove La Follette lasted from 1917–1919, as President Wilson’s legislative supporters continued to push the issue to a vote. The expulsion charge failed, and the Senate voted to dismiss all charges. At the end of the conflict, Senator La Follette sought to limit the involvement of the United States in post-war treaties. He spoke against President Wilson’s attempts to negotiate the Treaty of Versailles and led the senatorial opposition against American involvement in the League of Nations.

One Last Charge

With the election of Warren Harding as President, Senator La Follette was riding a wave of popularity due to his opposition to Wilson's involvement in World affairs and his emphasis on domestic policies. He even entertained the notion for running for Governor of Wisconsin again. Unfortunately, the hard pace of his style of politics was bringing even more bouts of sickness, which was concerning his wife and his supporters. La Follette fought hard to repair the damage that his antiwar stance had caused him and his allies back in Wisconsin. He, again, focused his energies on monitoring the railroad and oil companies. His belief was that it was his duty to protect the common laborer against the sins of capitalism. He helped to initiate the investigation on leasing of public oil fields to private companies. His work led to the discovery of leasing of the Teapot Dome oil field to Monmouth Oil Company and the discovery of corruption in the Harding administration.

In preparation for a future run for the presidency in 1924, La Follette toured Europe and made an extended visit to the Soviet Union with Lincoln Steffens and Jo Davidson. With the rejection of progressive planks from both Democratic and Republican platforms, La Follette created the Progressive Party in 1924 to support his run for the Presidency. His efforts served only to pull votes away from the Democratic challenger, and Calvin Coolidge easily won re-election in 1924. "The Little Lion of the Northwest" found himself completely exhausted and weak from the constant campaigning. La Follette had been bothered by heart problems before World War I and suffered a series of heart attacks in the spring of 1925. Surrounded by his family, Robert La Follette passed away on June 19, 1925.

WILLIAM H. BROWN

References and Further Reading

- Buenker, John D. The History of Wisconsin. Volume 4: The Progressive Era, 1893–1914. Madison: State Historical Society of Wisconsin, 1998.
- Doan, Edward N. The La Follettes and the Wisconsin Idea. New York: Rinehart, 1947.
- Greenbaum, Fred. Robert La Follette. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1975.
- La Follette, Belle C., and Fola La Follette. Robert M. La Follette. 2 vols. New York: Macmillan, 1953.
- Thelan, David P. Robert M. La Follette and the Insurgent Spirit. Boston: Little, Brown, 1976.
- Unger, Nancy C. Fighting Bob La Follette: The Righteous Reformer. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

See also National Security and Freedom of Speech; State Constitutions and Civil Liberties

LABOR PICKETING

See Picketing

LAMBDA LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATION FUND

Lambda was the first, and remains the primary, legal advocacy group championing, according to its mission statement, the "full recognition of the civil rights of lesbians, gay men, bisexuals, transgender people and those with HIV." This task began immediately, when the group's 1973 application for state recognition as a public interest law firm was unanimously denied. Lambda became its own first client, challenging the court's denial of its right to exist.

Winning its appeal, Lambda became authorized to practice on October 18, 1973. Lambda's organizational highlights include a move from its original location in the Manhattan apartment of founder Bill Thom into shared offices with the New York American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) in 1979—an association that prompted the ACLU to create its Lesbian and Gay Rights Project—and finally into its own offices in 1987. An initial satellite branch in Los Angeles opened its doors in 1990, with more to follow in Chicago, Dallas, and Atlanta. Lambda ceased to be a purely volunteer organization in 1978 when it created its first paid staff position; a managing attorney was added to the roster in 1983. Whereas at its founding Lambda functioned "more or less on the edge of insolvency," for the 2004 fiscal year it reported income in excess of $11.6 million.

The talent of the organization to devise and implement a legal strategy over the long term is best evidenced through its attack on sodomy laws. From its inception Lambda had challenged the constitutionality of sodomy laws, scoring the occasional win such as that in People v. Onofre, 424 N.Y.S.2d 566 (1980), which struck down the New York sodomy statute. These early victories encouraged Lambda to support challenges in federal courts on privacy grounds, an argument that was rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986). Lambda persevered in its strategy, however, and, in a round of courtroom brinkmanship, won the reversal of Bowers in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003).

The cumulative impact of Lambda's courtroom challenges has secured greater recognition of civil liberties for its constituents outside the arena of sodomy legislation. For example, its arguments in Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), persuaded the Court to overturn Colorado's Amendment 2, which would have excluded gay men and lesbians from the legislative process.

Beyond the issues of sodomy laws and political participation amendments, the range of cases confronted by Lambda attorneys has been wide, whether in cases initiated by the organization or when working with others such as the Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders (GLAD). Topics include the stunning victory in securing same-sex marriage in Massachusetts (Goodridge v. Dept. of Public Health, 440 Mass. 309 [2003]), to recognizing second-parent adoptions, protection of students from harassment, as well as asylum and immigration problems. In short, practically every significant legal case advocating the rights of sexual minorities—both won and lost—has benefited from the active participation of Lambda.

JAMES M. DONOVAN

References and Further Reading

Andersen, Ellen Ann. Out of the Closets & into the Courts: Legal Opportunity Structure and Gay Rights Litigation. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2005.
Lambda Legal, www.lambdalegal.org.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
Goodridge v. Dept. of Public Health, 440 Mass. 309 (2003)
Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
People v. Onofre, 424 N.Y.S.2d 566 (1980)
Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)

See also Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1996); Gay and Lesbian Rights; Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003); Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996); Same-Sex Marriage Legalization; Sodomy Laws

LAMBERT v. CALIFORNIA, 355 U.S. 225 (1957)

Lambert v. California is one of the Supreme Court's most fundamental decisions in support of civil liberties, but also one of its most poorly understood. Virginia Lambert had been living continuously in California for seven and one-half years when she was arrested and charged under an ordinance that made it unlawful for a person with a felony conviction to be in Los Angeles for more than five days without registering with the police. The trial judge instructed the jury that Lambert's complete ignorance of the registration requirement was no defense, and she was convicted. The Supreme Court overturned her conviction in ringing language: "A law which punished conduct which would not be blameworthy in the average member of the community would be too severe for that community to bear." Id. at 229 (quoting Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., The Common Law 50 (1981)) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Most observers have agreed that the Court rightly overturned a profoundly unjust conviction. The puzzle, though, which the opinion did not answer, is why Lambert's conviction was unconstitutional. Was it because she did not realize what she did was wrong? Was it that, rather than doing something, she was being punished for failing to do something? Was it that her conduct was too "innocent?" Each of these principles has its defenders, but they share a common problem: taken seriously, each of these principles would eliminate a large number of crimes and conflict with a substantial body of law. For this reason, the dissent charged that Lambert would turn into "a derelict on the waters of the law." Id. at 232 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).

One possible answer, a novel one but one consistent with other Supreme Court cases, is that the statute in Lambert essentially punished a protected constitutional right—in this case the right to travel. In this view, assuming it would be unconstitutional for Los Angeles to bar convicted felons from the city entirely, it cannot make a crime simply by adding an element (failing to register), unless the defendant has some culpability (such as purpose or knowledge) with regard to that additional element.

ALAN C. MICHAELS

See also Due Process; Ex Post Facto; Right to Travel

LAMBERT v. WICKLUND, 520 U.S. 292 (1997)

Lambert v. Wicklund is one of a long line of abortion cases handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court. In the historic case of Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court determined that a woman has a right to an abortion, subject to some limitations. The question remained, however, as to whether a minor had the same right to an abortion as an adult woman. In Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, the Court recognized that a minor has a right to an abortion, but that the right is subject to more limitations than the right of an adult woman. The question remained as to what form these additional limitations could take. The case of Ohio v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health provided a partial answer. There the Court upheld as constitutional an Ohio statute that required a minor to notify one of her parents before obtaining an abortion. However, a minor could avoid the notification requirement through use of the statute's judicial bypass provision, which allowed the minor to petition a Court to waive the notice requirement.

The Lambert case at issue here continues to examine the question of which limitations on a minor's right to an abortion are permissible. The Lambert case originated in Montana, where, in 1995, the legislature enacted the Parental Notification of Abortion Act. Among other things, this statute required that, before performing an abortion on a minor, a physician notify one of her parents of the physician's intention. However, a minor could avoid the notification requirement if she could demonstrate to the Court that "the notification of a parent or guardian is not in the best interests of the [minor]." After its enactment, many persons found the statute to be objectionable. Consequently, some physicians who performed abortions, along with other medical personnel, sued to prevent enforcement of the act on the grounds that it violated the Constitution. In particular, they claimed that it violated a minor's right to an abortion.

In an opinion in which there were no dissenting justices, the Court found that, contrary to the contentions of the physicians and medical personnel, Montana's limitation on a minor's right to an abortion was permissible. It explained that Montana's statute was indistinguishable in any relevant way from the Ohio statute that the Court had upheld in the Akron case. Specifically, both statutes allow a minor to avoid the notification requirement if she can demonstrate that such notification is not in her best interests. Because the Court had previously found the Ohio statute to be permissible, by definition, the Montana statute was permissible.

Thus, the Court continued to uphold a minor's right to an abortion, subject to at least one limitation that would not have been permissible if it had been applied to an adult. Although the Court has found this one limitation to be permissible, a parental notification requirement with a bypass procedure, it has yet to determine the tougher question of whether a parental notification statute must include some sort of bypass provision to be constitutional.

JANET W. STEVERSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ohio v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 497 U.S. 502 (1990)

Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Reproductive Freedom; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

LAMB'S CHAPEL v. CENTER MORICHES UNION FREE SCHOOL DISTRICT, 508 U.S. 384 (1993)

Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District (1993) is an important case concerning religious speech on public property. In it the Supreme Court held that even in a nonpublic forum the state cannot discriminate against religious viewpoints when allowing use of public facilities. It also held that permitting religious speech, even in a public school facility, does not violate the establishment clause as long as religious and nonreligious speeches are treated the same. This dual holding of the Court, in which granting religious speech equal access is permissible under the establishment clause and required under the free speech clause, has been recognized in four other recent cases, demonstrating the Court's commitment to granting full protection to religious speech.

In Lamb's Chapel a church sought permission to use public school facilities to show a film series on child-rearing and family values from a Christian perspective. School district rules authorized use of school property during non-school hours for "social, civic, and recreational uses" and "use by political organizations," but prohibited use for religious purposes. The school district denied the church's requested use, considering the film series to be a church-related activity and therefore prohibited under its rules. The church sued, alleging a violation of the First Amendment.

A unanimous Supreme Court held that the church's free speech rights were violated. It began by noting that the school facility might well be a designated public forum, because a number of other community groups were allowed to meet there. For purposes of analysis, however, it treated the school as a nonpublic forum, saying that government can control access to nonpublic forum property if distinctions on who can use the property are reasonable and treat all viewpoints the same. Denying access to the church for its film series failed that test, however, because it constituted viewpoint discrimination. Showing a film series on child rearing clearly qualified as a social or civic use of the property, permitted under school district rules. The only reason the church's request was denied was because it would be shown from a religious perspective. Therefore, the effect of the school district rules was to permit discussion of child rearing from a secular perspective but prohibit discussion from a religious perspective. This constituted unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination.

The Supreme Court also held that permitting the church to show the film series on school property would not violate the establishment clause. It noted that the film would not be shown during school hours and was not sponsored by the school itself. In addition, a wide variety of community groups had repeatedly used school property. Under these circumstances, there was no realistic danger that the community would perceive that the school was endorsing religion, and any benefit to the church would be incidental.

Lamb's Chapel reflects the position taken by the Supreme Court in a number of recent decisions, such as Widmar v. Vincent (1981), Westside Board of Education v. Mergen (1990), Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia (1995), and Good News Club v. Milford Central School (2001). In each of these cases the Court held that the free speech clause prohibits schools from discriminating against religious viewpoints and that granting religious speech access to public facilities and forums on the same terms as other speech does not violate the establishment clause.

MARK W. CORDES

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Good News Club v. Milford Central School*, 533 U.S. 98 (2001)
Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)
Westside Board of Education v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)
Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)

LANZETTA v. NEW JERSEY, 306 U.S. 451 (1939)

Criminal laws that are vague and uncertain in scope, meaning, or application violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Lanzetta v. New Jersey, the Supreme Court considered whether a state law was void for vagueness. In 1937, seeking to crack down on criminal gangs of that era, the State of New Jersey enacted a law establishing the following crime: "Any person not engaged in any lawful occupation, known to be a member of any gang consisting of two or more persons, who has been convicted at least three times of being a disorderly person, or who has been convicted of any crime in this or in any other State, is declared to be a gangster" Lanzetta and others were convicted under this law and declared to be gangsters. They were sentenced to five to ten years of hard labor in prison. The state courts upheld their convictions.

The Supreme Court reversed the convictions, explaining that no one may be required at the peril of life, liberty, or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes. A statute creating an offense must be sufficiently explicit to inform those subject to the law what conduct will render them subject to penalties. A statute defined in terms so vague that people of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates due process of law.

LANZETTA v. NEW JERSEY, 306 U.S. 451 (1939)

The Supreme Court observed that the statute did not define the term "gang." Meanings in dictionaries and other sources were varied and numerous, and the term was not defined elsewhere in the law. The state courts relied on the prior state case of State v. Gaynor, which used dictionary definitions and descriptions to ascertain the legislative meaning of the terms "gang" (that is, a company of persons acting together for some purposes, usually criminal, or a company of persons who go about together or who act in concert, mainly for a criminal purpose) and "gangster" (that is, a member of a gang of roughs, hireling criminals, thieves, or the like). But the Gaynor decision was decided after the defendants' trial and did not provide a general statutory interpretation.

Moreover, the state courts' descriptions and illustrations were insufficient to constitute definitions for the terms. The adopted dictionary definitions of "gang" and "gangster" only extended to people acting together for some purpose "usually criminal" or "mainly for criminal purposes," meaning some gangs could have legitimate purposes such as groups of workers engaged in lawful activities. Also, the statute did not declare all members to be gangsters, only those with prior convictions as defined. The provision "known to be a member" was also ambiguous as to whether actual membership was required. It also failed to indicate what constituted membership or how one might join a "gang." The law, condemning no specific act or omission, was unconstitutionally vague.

Lanzetta was a seminal case stating the constitutional rule requiring that criminal statutes must be sufficiently certain so people have notice of what the law commands or forbids.

VINCENT L. RABAGO

References and Further Reading

- LaFave, Wayne R., and Austin W. Scott, Jr. Substantive Criminal Law § 2.3 (1986) (explaining the requirements of the void for vagueness doctrine).
Jeffries, John, Legality, Vagueness, and the Construction of Penal Statutes, Virginia Law Review 71 (1985): 189.
Note, Vagueness Doctrine in the Federal Courts, Stanford Law Review 26 (1974): 855.
Note, The Void-For-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 109 (1960): 67.

Cases and Statutes Cited

State v. Gaynor, 197 A. 360 (1938)

See also Due Process; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Fourteenth Amendment; Rights of the Accused

LATE CORPORATION OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS v. UNITED STATES, 136 U.S. 1 (1890)

The death-knell of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints' (Mormons) hope for accommodation of its religiously based practice of polygamy and its goal of statehood for a polygamous Utah came with the Supreme Court's decision in Late Corp. of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. United States (1890). This case was the capstone of a series of Court defeats that began in 1878 with Reynolds v. United States (1878) and which remain the law of the land today (see Reynolds v. United States). The case must also be seen in the context of a series of increasingly draconian federal laws enacted in response to the church's public espousal of polygamy, which began in 1852.

Although the case was primarily an exploration of the extent of Congressional power in the Territories, the Court also addressed and rejected the Mormons' claim that polygamy was protected by the free exercise clause of the First Amendment to the Constitution.

Acting pursuant to the Edmund-Tucker Act of 1887, the federal government had dissolved the church as an incorporated charitable entity and began proceedings to escheat virtually all property of the church over to the United States. When the church appealed the government's success at trial in Utah, the Supreme Court held that Congress had the power to repeal the church's charter, on the basis of its plenary power to govern the territories and that it also had the power to seize the church's property. Finally, after a lengthy discussion of the doctrine of charitable uses, it held that Congress could also use the church's property to benefit public schools in the Territory.

The Court again revealed its feelings toward the church and polygamy. Polygamy was "a crime against the laws, and abhorrent to the sentiments and feelings of the civilized world." Polygamy, the Court continued, "is contrary to the spirit of Christianity and of the civilization which Christianity has produced in the Western world."

Therefore, the church's free exercise argument as "altogether a sophistical plea." The Court warned that tolerance of polygamy would mean approval of the "Thugs of India" (the Hindu cult of assassin-priests who victimized travelers) and suttee (the Hindu practice of a widow throwing herself upon the funeral pyre of her husband), as well as the practice of "our own ancestors in Britain" of human sacrifice.

Largely as a result of this resounding judicial defeat the church renounced polygamy in 1890, and the territorial legislature enacted an anti-polygamy provision for the state constitution that remains part of Utah's constitution today.

KEITH E. SEALING

References and Further Reading

Ostling, Richard, and Joan Ostling. Mormon America: The Power and the Promise. Harper, 1999.

Sealing, Keith, Polygamists Out of the Closet: Statutory and State Constitutional Prohibitions Against Polygamy are Unconstitutional Under the Free Exercise Clause, Georgia State University Law Review 17 (2001): 691.

Van Wagoner, Richard. Mormon Polygamy: A History. Signature Books, 1989.

LAWRENCE v. TEXAS, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)

Justice Anthony Kennedy announced the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Lawrence v. Texas on June 26, 2003, the last day of the Court's term, in what David Savage reported as "a moment of rare drama and emotion." The decision sent a welcome message to the lesbian and gay community that their most intimate sexual expressions would no longer be criminalized by any state in the nation. The reach of Lawrence, however, extends to the private and personal liberty rights of all citizens.

A report of a weapons disturbance sent law enforcement officers in Harris County, Texas, to the apartment of John Geddes Lawrence. When officers entered the apartment, they found Lawrence engaged in a sexual act with Tyron Garner. The men were arrested and charged with a misdemeanor violation of the Texas statute that criminalizes "deviate sexual intercourse" by persons of the same sex. At trial, the defendants argued unsuccessfully that the Texas sodomy law violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and a similar clause in the Texas Constitution. Lawrence and Garner submitted a plea of nolo contendere and were fined $200 each in addition to court costs.

Represented by Lambda Legal, a national lesbian and gay rights advocacy organization, Lawrence and Garner appealed. A three-judge state court panel found the statute unconstitutional under the Equal Rights Amendment of the Texas Constitution. However, sitting en banc on rehearing, the intermediate court of appeals reversed the panel's decision. After the highest state court refused to hear their case, Lawrence and Garner sought review by the U.S. Supreme Court, which granted a writ of certiorari and set argument for March 26, 2003.

The Supreme Court was asked to decide three issues. First, did the Texas law violate the equal protection clause by criminalizing sexual activity by same-sex couples while not criminalizing the same behavior by different-sex couples? Second, does the due process clause protect the privacy and liberty interests of the petitioners in their intimate sexual relations? Finally, should the Court's 1986 decision in Bowers v. Hardwick, declaring that homosexuals have no fundamental right to engage in sexual acts, be overruled? Thirty-three amicus curiae briefs were submitted to the Court by organizations ranging from the Alliance of Baptists and the American Family Association to the National Lesbian and Gay Law Association and Human Rights Campaign.

By a six-to-three vote, the Supreme Court struck down the Texas law as unconstitutional. Five justices joined the majority opinion crafted by Justice Kennedy while Justice Sandra Day O'Connor concurred in the judgment, but on different grounds. Justice Antonin Scalia was joined by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Clarence Thomas in dissent. Justice Thomas also wrote separately.

The majority decision rests on an individual's broad right to liberty under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Relying heavily on Justice John Paul Stevens's dissent in the Bowers case, Justice Kennedy recognizes that the petitioners' right to liberty under the due process clause protects them from governmental intrusion into their private and personal conduct. Additionally, the Court finds that the statute did not further any legitimate state interest that could justify governmental interference with the private sexual conduct of consenting adults.

Justice Kennedy disputes the historical analysis of sexual regulations that the Court made so much of in Bowers, choosing instead to focus on an "emerging awareness that liberty gives substantial protection to adult persons" in their private sexual lives (521). He notes that two cases decided in the years since Bowers further undermine the earlier decision. In Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992), the Court recognized the constitutional protection afforded to personal liberty and autonomy under the due process clause. And in Romer v. Evans (1996), the Court used a class-based argument grounded on the equal protection clause to strike down an anti-gay amendment to the Colorado constitution.

Justice Kennedy acknowledges a nexus between the equal protection and equal treatment issues of Romer and the autonomy and liberty interests espoused by Casey. He opts to rely on the latter, however, suggesting that an equal protection argument would not go far enough in protecting personal liberty. In applying a due process argument, the Court thus recognizes a broader liberty interest that extends to both heterosexuals and homosexuals. In doing so, the Court directly overrules Bowers.

Justice O'Connor joined in declaring the Texas statute unconstitutional but did not agree with the majority's reliance on the due process clause nor did she vote to overrule Bowers. Instead, she based her argument on the equal protection clause and the failure of the state to satisfy the rational basis test. Although Texas had argued that the statute furthered the promotion of morality, a legitimate governmental interest, O'Connor rejected the state's argument outright and suggested that it was simply a claim "to justify a law that discriminates among groups of persons" (528).

The dissenting opinion by Justice Scalia takes issue with nearly every aspect of the majority and concurring opinions, from the majority's willingness to overrule Bowers on principles of stare decisis to the Court's alleged misapplication of the substantive due process doctrine and its reliance on the rational basis test. Arguing that because both men and women, regardless of their sexual orientation, are prohibited by Texas law from enjoying same-sex relations, Justice Scalia avows that no equal protection violation exists. He issues a pointed warning in his concluding comments that Lawrence "effectively decrees the end of all morals legislation" (539). More significantly, Justice Scalia views the Lawrence opinion as "the product of a Court . . . that has largely signed on to the so-called homosexual agenda" and "has taken sides in the culture war" (541).

Justice Thomas's two-paragraph dissent rests on his theory of judicial restraint, namely that the legislature should change the law rather than the judiciary, and on his continued rejection of a constitutional right to privacy or the "liberty of the person" (543).

Those concerned with the legal fragility of past privacy decisions are likely to view the expression of a broader liberty right in Lawrence as a positive development. Only time will bear out the full ramifications of the case for gay and lesbian rights in both the legal and political arenas, yet there is little doubt that the Lawrence decision will enter the history books as a landmark ruling.

REBECCA MAE SALOKAR

References and Further Reading

- Barnett, Randy E. "Justice Kennedy's Libertarian Revolution: Lawrence v. Texas." The Boston University School of Law Working Paper Series, Public Law & Legal Theory, Working Paper No. 03-13. <http://www.bu.edu/law/faculty/papers>.
- James, Bernard, Privacy and Education: 'Lawrence,' 'Bollinger,' The National Law Journal (August 4, 2003): S8-10.
- Turley, Jonathan, Not as Radical as All That, The National Law Journal (July 4, 2003): 31.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Lawrence v. State*, 41 S.W.3d 349 (Tex. App. Houston 14th Dist., 2001)
- Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey* 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
- Romer v. Evans*, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)
- See also Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986); Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Gay and Lesbian Rights; Kennedy, Anthony McLeod; Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund; O'Connor, Sandra Day; Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992); Privacy; Rehnquist, William H.; Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996); Same-Sex Marriage Legalization; Scalia, Antonin; Sodomy Laws; Stevens, John Paul; Thomas, Clarence***

LAWYER ADVERTISING

Lawyers in the United States have historically advertised their services, but before the end of the nineteenth century they had little need for mass-media advertising. Lawyers mostly attracted business through word-of-mouth referrals in the local community. The increasing size and diversity of the legal profession at the end of the century created the need in some cities for lawyers to use means of attracting clients other than enhancing their reputation.

The last few decades of the nineteenth century also witnessed the beginning of the organized bar movement. Elite lawyers were concerned that the country was awash in mediocre practitioners, many of whom were vigorously entrepreneurial, if only marginally competent. But the organized bar exercised relatively little control over the standards for entry to the profession, which was largely in the hands of local judges. Concerns about the quality of many newly licensed lawyers, as well as the competitive pressures created by these new entrants to the bar, is one plausible explanation for the antipathy toward advertising that arose around the beginning of the twentieth century.

The American Bar Association's Canons of Professional Ethics, published in 1908, declared circulars, advertisements, and in-person solicitation of prospective clients to be reprehensible and offensive to the traditions of the bar. State regulations and the ABA's Model Code of Professional Responsibility, adopted in 1969, were similarly restrictive. In general, lawyers were permitted to use unobtrusive, dignified signs, business cards, and professional announcements in newspapers, as long as they did not make any representations about the quality of their services, identify themselves as specialists in any field of practice, or otherwise make false, misleading, or deceptive claims. State rule makers and professionalism committees devoted considerable energy to policing the line between dignified announcements and prohibited hucksterism.

Starting with the Bates decision, the Supreme Court has significantly restricted the latitude of states to regulate advertising (Bates v. State Bar of Arizona). Consistent with the First Amendment, a state may prohibit deceptive or misleading claims but may not prohibit the provision of truthful information, including information about fees charged by the lawyer, areas of specialty, and the lawyer's willingness to represent clients in particular types of cases. Some states have read Bates more narrowly than others and continue to enforce regulations designed to ensure that advertisements are tasteful and dignified. In-person solicitation of prospective clients may be limited in circumstances in which the contact poses a risk of undue influence or intimidation by the lawyer (Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association).

Supporters of continued restrictions on lawyer advertising believe it diminishes the public's respect for the legal profession. The Supreme Court has appeared receptive to this argument in some situations and has upheld a state rule imposing a thirty-day waiting period before lawyers may contact accident victims (Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc.) Opponents of advertising restrictions emphasize the role of advertising in providing information about legal services to unsophisticated potential clients.

W. BRADLEY WENDEL

References and Further Reading

- Andrews, Lori B., Lawyer Advertising and the First Amendment, American Bar Foundation Research Journal 1986 (1986): 967-1021.
- Friedman, Lawrence M. A History of American Law. 2nd Ed. New York: Touchstone, 1985.
- Hazard, Geoffrey C., Russell G. Pearce, and Jeffrey W. Stempel, Why Lawyers Should Be Allowed To Advertise: A Market Analysis of Legal Services, NYU Law Review 58 (1983): 1084-1113.
- Wolfram, Charles W. Modern Legal Ethics. St. Paul, MN: West, 1986.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bates v. Arizona State Bar, 433 U.S. 350 (1977)

Florida Bar v. Went For It, Inc., 515 U.S. 618 (1995)

Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447 (1978)

ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rules 7.1–7.5 (2002)

See also Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977); Commercial Speech

LEE v. WEISMAN, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)

Thirty years after the Supreme Court ruled prayer in public schools to be inconsistent with the establishment clause in Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), the Court ruled, in Lee v. Weisman (1992), this prohibition included public school graduations. Secondary principals in the public schools of the Providence, Rhode Island, customarily invited members of the clergy to give invocations and benedictions at graduation ceremonies. Robert E. Lee, the Nathan Bishop Middle School principal, invited Rabbi Leslie Gutterman to offer prayers at the graduation of Deborah Weisman's class. Lee provided the rabbi with a pamphlet, "Guidelines for Civic Occasions" prepared by the National Conference of Christians and Jews. Furthermore, he advised him the prayers should be nonsectarian. The girl's parents disagreed with this practice, and four days before the ceremony sought a temporary restraining order to prevent it. The U.S. District Court for Rhode Island denied their motion and, despite their objections, the family attended the ceremony, where the rabbi's prayers were straightforward and simply thanked God for the freedom Americans enjoyed and asked for blessings on the students, teachers, and administrators of the school.

In July 1989, the month after the ceremony, the Weismans filed suit seeking to put an end to the practice of clergy-led prayers at graduation. The American Civil Liberties Union and other like-minded groups supported their suit. The Federal District Court for Rhode Island and the First Circuit Court of Appeals both found the prayers unconstitutional on the basis of Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), in which the Court had established a three-prong test to determine whether a governmental practice violated the First Amendment's establishment clause.

The issue for the Court was whether including clergy-offered prayers as part of the official public school graduation ceremony was consistent with the religion clauses of the First Amendment, as well as the Fourteenth Amendment, which makes the clauses applicable to states and their school districts. In the end, the Court held that the prayers were, indeed, a violation. Initially, it should be noted, Justice Anthony Kennedy was assigned to write the majority opinion for a five-to-four court upholding the prayers. After several months, he communicated to Justice Harry Blackmun that his (Kennedy's) opinion looked wrong, and his new draft became the opinion for a five-to-four court declaring the prayers unconstitutional.

The opinion held the prayers were a violation of the establishment clause and that the Court did not need to revisit relevant precedents, including Lemon. The school official, a surrogate of the state, had chosen to have prayers at graduation, invited clergy, provided the pamphlet, as well as provided advice about the prayers. The Court held that through the delivery of the pamphlet with instructions that Lee was directing and controlling the prayers' content. Kennedy's opinion held the government was failing in its duty to guard and respect that sphere of inviolable conscience and belief that is the mark of a free people, so subjecting citizens to state-sponsored religious exercises. It was an undeniable fact that the school district's supervision and control of the ceremony placed public and peer pressure on attending students to stand as a group.

For Kennedy, the critical issue was whether there was present coercion to attend and participate in the graduation ceremony that contained a religious element. The opinion relied quite heavily on the argument that there are heightened concerns with protecting freedom of conscience from subtle coercive pressure in the elementary and secondary public schools. Furthermore, the opinion cited psychological research supporting the common assumption that adolescents are often susceptible to pressure from peers toward conformity. The Court's reasoning was that the districts supervision and control of a middle or high school graduation ceremony places subtle and indirect pressures on attending students to stand as a group or maintain respectful silence during the invocation and benediction. A reasonable dissenter of high school age could believe that standing or remaining silent signified personal participation in, or approval of, the group exercise, rather than respect for it. In the opinion, the Court acknowledged that if the affected citizens were mature adults, the choice to stand or remain seated during the prayers could be viewed differently. It was the reasoning revolving around public and peer pressure that the dissenting opinion, authored by Justice Antonin Scalia, criticized strongly, arguing that most of the students would ignore the content of the prayer, thus it would not present any mental or psychological harm.

A position put forward by the school district cited the option of not attending the ceremony if one objects to the prayers. The Court held that claiming a teenage student in our society has a real choice not to attend his or her high school graduation is formalistic to the extreme. The opinion continued that the constitution forbid the school district to exact religious conformity from a student at the price of attending ones' own graduation. A basic tenet of the First Amendment is that the state and school district cannot require one of its citizens to forfeit his or her rights and benefits as the price of resisting conformity to state-sponsored religious practice.

The majority opinion concluded by making the point that no holding by the Court suggests that a public school district can compel a student to participate in a religious exercise and that was the effect of inviting clergy to offer prayers at graduation ceremonies.

Thousands of public high schools across the country had, for years, used prayers at graduation ceremonies. Since June 1992, if a school district is to be in compliance with the ruling of the Court, this is a practice that has ceased to exist. The reasoning in Lee continues to be used by the Court in guiding its decisions. In Sante Fe Independent School District v Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000), the Court struck down a district policy allowing for prayers at football games using the coercion and attendance reasoning used in Lee.

J. MARK ALCORN

References and Further Reading

- Fisher, Louis. Religious Liberty in America: Political Safeguards. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2002.
- Levy, Leonard. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
- Miller, William Lee. The First Liberty: America's Foundation in Religious Freedom. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Sante Fe Independent School District v. Doe*, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)

LEGAL AID SOCIETY OF NEW YORK

In addition to being the oldest and largest provider of legal services to the poor in the United States, the Legal Aid Society of New York has a long-standing reputation for zealous advocacy. Founded in 1876 to protect the rights of German immigrants in New York City, Der Deutscher Rechts-Schutz Verein (The German Legal Aid Society) initially focused on civil legal assistance, although early on the organization expressed an interest in criminal matters as well. Soon the organization extended beyond its initial client base, dropped the word "German" from its name, and solidified its financial footing by soliciting help from top-notch New York law firms and the Association of the Bar of the City of New York.

At present, the Legal Aid Society's work is divided into three major areas: Civil Practice, Criminal Practice, and Juvenile Rights Practice. According to data compiled by the organization, on an annual basis it handles more than 200,000 indigent criminal cases, serves as law guardian for children in more than 30,000 cases before the Family Court, and is involved in more than 30,000 civil cases for families, individuals, and community groups. Moreover, the Society conducts class action litigation on behalf of numerous groups, including foster children, elderly poor, and inmates at Rikers Island.

The Society represents its clients through offices located in eighteen facilities throughout New York City's five boroughs, and employs roughly 800 attorneys. With ninety percent of its funding stemming from public sources, the Society's fiscal fortunes have tended to ebb and flow with the political currents. Even in the face of financial obstacles, however, the Society's devotion to indigent New Yorkers seemingly never wavers.

DANIEL S. MEDWED

References and Further Reading

- "About the Legal Aid Society," available at <http://www.legal-aid.org/DocumentIndex.htm?docid=98> (last accessed July 27, 2005).
- Houseman, Alan W., Civil Legal Assistance for Low-Income Persons: Looking Back and Looking Forward, Fordham Urb. Law Journal 29 (2002): 1213.
- , Political Lessons: Legal Services for the Poor—A Commentary, Georgia Law Journal 83 (1995): 1669.
- Maguire, John. Lance of Justice: A Semi-Centennial History of the Legal Aid Society 1876–1926, 1928.
- Mirsky, Chester L., The Political Economy and Indigent Defense: New York City, 1917–1998, 1991 Annual Survey American Law 891.
- Tweed, Harrison. The Legal Aid Society: New York City 1876–1951, 1954.

LEGAL REALISTS

The Legal Realists were a group of influential early twentieth century lawyers and legal scholars who reacted against an orthodox style of legal reasoning known as “formalism.” Formalism holds that particular legal results are “objectively” deducible from abstract principles.

In contrast, Realists viewed legal outcomes to be a function of reasons not unique to law, including such factors as morality and social and economic perspectives. Realists also emphasized the importance of understanding law in practice: how do legal rules affect society? Realists attacked formalism both for its reliance on deductive reasoning, as well for the particular outcomes generated by classical judges. In result, formalist judges typically favored corporations over consumers, assisted businesses in their fight against collective labor organizing, and interpreted the “due process” clause of the Constitution to limit state legislation on economic matters such as setting minimum wages and maximum hours. Many, but not all, Realists were politically progressive.

The most famous precursor to the Realists and harsh critic of formalism was Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. Holmes urged that judges acknowledge explicitly what they inevitably did implicitly—to decide cases on the basis of legislative policy. One of Holmes’ most famous quotes, “The life of the law has not been logic, it has been experience,” has frequently been read as frontal assault on the formalist focus on deduction from abstract principles.

The early 1920s saw a remarkable increase in scholarship from what eventually became known as Legal Realists. Legal scholars such as Walter Wheeler Cook, Jerome Frank, Morris Cohen, Karl Llewellyn, and Underhill Moore, as well as the economist Robert Hale and the philosopher Felix Cohen, became identified with Legal Realism. Many Realists—including Frank, William O. Douglas, and Felix Frankfurter—served in government during the New Deal and helped develop many administrative agencies.

During the “Lochner era” of the early twentieth century, the Supreme Court invalidated social welfare legislation, outcomes frequently justified using formalist logic. Legal Realists challenged the Court’s judgment as wrongheaded, arguing that the Constitution did not embody a particular economic theory. Legal Realists provided intellectual grist that persuaded the Court finally, by 1937, to accept the judgment of Congress and state legislatures on most economic legislation.

In contrast, the early twentieth century Supreme Court gave scant protection to civil liberties. Two justices influenced by Realist thinking, Holmes and Louis D. Brandeis, both wrote dissenting opinions in free speech cases that proved extremely influential to justices who came later. Both Frankfurter and Douglas eventually served on the Warren Court that recognized many new individual rights.

The “school” of Legal Realism petered out in the 1940s in the United States. Yet the long-term impact of Legal Realism—especially on contemporary law and legal thinking—has been profound. Most legal scholars today embrace much Realist insight: that legal rules are derived from considerations such as moral perspectives, as well as economic and social principles; judges should consider carefully the impact of their decisions on society. Although the earlier Realists wrote little about Constitutional law, their influence can be seen in the ferment of the Warren Court era and the willingness of that Court to transform civil rights and civil liberties into their modern form.

JOHN T. NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

- Fisher, William, Morton Horwitz, and Thomas Reed. American Legal Realism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Holmes, O. W. The Common Law. 1881.
- Horwitz, Morton J. The Transformation of American Law 1870–1960: The Crisis of Legal Orthodoxy. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Kalman, Laura. Legal Realism at Yale, 1927–1960. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986.
- Leiter, Brian R. “American Legal Realism,” in Edmundson, W., and M. Golding, eds. The Blackwell Guide to Philosophy of Law and Legal Theory. Oxford: Blackwell, 2003.

See also Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Douglas, William Orville; Frankfurter, Felix; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Warren Court

LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION v. VALESQUEZ, 531 U.S. 533 (2001)

In 1974, Congress enacted the Legal Services Corporation Act. This law established the Legal Services Corporation (LSC), a federal corporation that was authorized to award funds to local legal aid organizations providing free legal services to the poor in non-criminal legal proceedings. Beginning in 1996 (and every year thereafter), Congress enacted appropriations legislation containing a rule prohibiting the LSC from distributing money to legal aid organizations that were representing clients in proceedings involving statutory or constitutional challenges to state and federal welfare laws. Legal aid organizations were prohibited from bringing challenges even when questions regarding the welfare law’s validity arose after the commencement of the proceeding, or when that portion of the proceeding involving the challenge was being handled by joint counsel not affiliated with—or paid by—the legal aid organization. On February 28, 2001, the U.S. Supreme Court announced in a five-to-four decision that the distribution rule was unconstitutional.

The Court distinguished the distribution rule in Velasquez from the “gag order” upheld in Rust v. Sullivan. It concluded that Rust stands for the proposition that the government can place conditions on how government subsidies can be spent when those funds are intended to promote specific programmatic messages. In such contexts, government regulations that impose content and viewpoint-biased restrictions on speech are constitutional. In Velasquez, however, the Court concluded that LSC funds were not intended to articulate a specific government endorsed programmatic message but instead to promote the varied interests and perspectives of indigent private actors involved in legal proceedings. The Court argued that Congress never intended legal aid attorneys receiving LSC funds to become the mouthpieces of the government and to “stay on message.” There simply was no programmatic message at play, and in legal proceedings the government’s viewpoint would be articulated by government lawyers.

The monetary distribution rule also raises separation of powers and federalism concerns by intruding on the judicial powers of state and federal courts. If legal aid organizations representing the poor cannot challenge the statutory and constitutional validity of welfare policies, then judges will be deprived of full and complete information about the nature of welfare policy law suits. The funding limit will corrupt the adversary process by distorting the range of views expressed in judicial forums. This, in turn, will decrease the likelihood that cases will be decided in a legally correct manner, thereby undermining the judiciary’s ability to act consistent with the rule of law. The Court considered it unrealistic to believe that indigents would be able to pursue welfare policy challenges without the free services provided by legal aid organizations receiving LSC funds. Without adequate representation, welfare challenges would less frequently find their way into the judiciary—a result that would, again, frustrate the ability of courts to perform their duties. In short, the likely effect of the LSC distribution rule was that of impermissibly shielding federal policy from full and fair judicial review.

MARK KEMPER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Rust v. Sullivan 500 U.S. 173

LEGION OF DECENCY

The National Catholic Legion of Decency (LOD) originated in 1933 and served as a campaign agency dedicated to cleaning up and censoring films produced by the motion picture industry. Concerned with the lack of adequate censoring of Hollywood movies by the Hays Production Code of 1930, the LOD threatened a national Catholic boycott of the film industry by holding large rallies and using church pulpits to announce concerns over film content. As a result, the offices of the Hayes Production Code hired Catholic Joseph Breen as a liaison between the LOD and the Hays agencies, which curbed a threat by the LOD to bring an antitrust lawsuit against Hollywood and motion picture producers.

The agency encouraged American Catholics to sign and uphold a written pledge commissioning churchgoers to boycott any films considered immoral or unfit for viewing. Catholics were also told to avoid patronizing local theaters that had previously showcased objectionable films. Because of the widespread reach of the LOD, film companies and producers were required to make movies that could pass the scrutiny of the censoring board and at times would even rename films or delete scenes considered objectionable for viewing. Films receiving the approval of the agency were generally those reflecting mid-nineteenth century Catholic values and the theology of the Roman Catholic Church.

Although the LOD attempted to keep American Catholics away from inappropriate material on screen, the national controversies that emerged as a result of the work of the Legion drew even larger crowds to theaters to view the banned films. The agency continued to promote the censoring and reviewing of films into the 1970s.

CHRISTOPHER J. ANDERSON

References and Further Reading

- Black, Gregory D. Hollywood Censored: Morality Codes, Catholics, and the Movies. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Skinner, James. The Cross and the Cinema: The Legion of Decency and the National Catholic Office for Motion Pictures, 1933–1970. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1993.

LEGISLATIVE PRAYER

State-sanctioned prayer given in legislative chambers, often led by state-paid chaplains, likely represents one of the more curious anomalies in federal establishment clause jurisprudence. In other contexts, the Supreme Court has indicated that few practices strike closer to the heart of the nonestablishment principle than state-sanctioned and organized worship activity. As the Court wrote in 1962, the Framers of the First Amendment “tried to put an end to government control of religion and prayer . . . [G]overnment should stay out of the business of writing or sanctioning official prayers and leave that purely religious function to the people themselves and to those the people choose to look to for religious guidance.”

Despite this frequently repeated admonition, the Court in 1983 upheld the practice of prayers given in legislative chambers by state-paid chaplains. In Marsh v. Chambers, the Court relied on an “unambiguous and unbroken history of more than 200 years” of both state-paid legislative chaplains and devotional legislative prayer. Significant for the Court was the fact that the First Congress enacted a law authorizing the appointment and payment of chaplains only three days before finalizing the wording of the First Amendment. The majority reasoned that the Framers could not have “intended the establishment clause to forbid what they had just declared acceptable.” In so ruling, the high court declined to apply the more traditional analytical standard for evaluating alleged establishment clause violations, the “Lemon test,” which asks whether the government action has the purpose or effect of advancing religion or excessively entangles government with religious matters. Critics of the decision charged that the Court adopted a historical analysis because legislative prayer “clearly violate[d]” any other legal standard. As Justice William Brennan wrote in dissent, the practice:

intrudes on the right of conscience by forcing some legislators either to participate in a prayer opportunity, with which they are in basic disagreement, or to make their disagreement a matter of public comment by declining to participate. It forces all residents of the State to support a religious exercise that may be contrary to their own beliefs. It requires the State to commit itself on fundamental theological issues And it injects religion into the political sphere by creating the potential that each and every selection of a chaplain, or consideration of a particular prayer, . . . will provoke a political battle along religious lines and ultimately alienate some religiously identified group of citizens.

Justice Brennan’s critique aside, the Supreme Court has never reconsidered its Marsh ruling. Additionally significant, the Marsh holding did not turn on whether the prayers could be considered more solemnizing than worshipful. Although the decision seemed to assume that legislative prayers would usually be nondenominational and nonproselytizing (and that a sectarian purpose behind a prayer practice would be unconstitutional), the opinion went on to say that “it is not for [courts] to embark on a sensitive evaluation or to parse the content of a particular prayer.” This aspect of the ruling has created some confusion among lower courts as to whether legislative bodies can impose limitations on the content and tone of allowable prayers. After the Marsh decision, lower courts have generally upheld government limitations on the types of prayers that may be given. In Snyder v. Murray City Corp. (1998), the city invited individuals from a “broad cross section of religious faiths” to open city council meetings with a short prayer. However, a city attorney blocked a proposed prayer that criticized city policies, including the prayer opportunity, a move upheld by the U.S. Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals. The court read Marsh as approving a “religious genre” of prayer, such as “the traditional kind of invitational legislative prayers . . . and traditional governmental invocations.” The plaintiff’s proposed prayer was appropriately excluded because it “aggressively proselytized for his particular religious views and strongly disparaged other religious views.” More recently, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a county’s denial of a proposed Wiccan prayer to be given at the beginning of its public meetings, even though the county had a policy allowing invocations by residents scheduled on a first-come, first-served basis. The court held that Marsh authorized prayers that “fit broadly within ‘the Judeo-Christian’ tradition” that “bring the unifying aspects of our heritage to the difficult task of public deliberation.”

Lower courts have also struggled with how far to apply the Marsh holding outside the particular context of legislative prayers. Courts have generally extended the rule to allow prayers at city councils and county commissions—those entities with legislative functions—but have been less willing to do so for school board meetings, particularly if public school students are in regular attendance. In Lee v. Weisman (1992), striking invocations and benedictions at public school graduations, the Court refused to rely on Marsh as grounds for upholding the practice, noting that the historical pedigree supporting legislative prayer was relatively unique.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin. History, Tradition, the Supreme Court, and the First Amendment, Hastings Law Journal 44 (1993): 901–919.
- Epstein, Steven B. Rethinking the Constitutionality of Ceremonial Deism, Columbia Law Review 96 (1996): 2083.
- McConnell, Michael W. On Reading the Constitution, Cornell Law Review 73 (1988): 359.
- Note. Constitutional Law—Establishment Clause—Tenth Circuit Holds that City May Deny Opportunity to Deliver Proselytizing Legislative Prayers, Harvard Law Review 112 (1999): 2025–2030.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)

Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)

Simpson v. Chesterfield County Board of Supervisors, 404 F.3d 276 (4th Cir. 2005)

Snyder v. Murray City Corp., 159 F.3d 1227 (10th Cir. 1998)

See also Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)

LEGISLATORS' FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Under the speech or debate clause of our Constitution, members of Congress are absolutely immune from being prosecuted or formally questioned by the executive branch, grand juries, or the courts for any speech or debate in either House. This broad protection for legislators' freedom of speech derives from events that occurred in England and the colonies beginning more than 200 years before independence. Responding to a private criminal complaint brought against a member of the House of Commons for a vote he had cast, Parliament in 1512 established that its members could not be indicted in court for actions taken in Parliament. Over time, the parliamentary privilege of free speech and debate was invoked primarily by legislators who criticized Crown policies and conduct as protection against punishment by the executive.

In the century preceding the American Revolution, colonial assemblies occasionally asserted the free speech privilege during a conflict with their royal governors. At the Constitutional Convention, the speech or debate clause was incorporated with no opposition and with little substantive discussion.

Today, the key public policy rationale for conferring this absolute immunity remains the need to protect responsible and uninhibited legislative judgment. Members of Congress are regularly accountable (through elections) in their special capacity as legislators. The speech or debate clause contemplates the possibility that the public, or executive branch officials, may overreact when disappointed or offended by what senators or representatives have said or done as legislators. The clause guards against the risk that individuals or groups frustrated by legislators' performance will seek to vent their frustrations in court rather than the voting booth.

Although the language of the clause refers only to speech or debate in either House, the Supreme Court in a series of decisions in the 1960s and 1970s extended the immunity to many forms of legislative conduct that contribute to our lawmaking enterprise. In addition to covering speeches on the House or Senate floor, the clause also protects votes cast on bills, participation in committee hearings, circulation of information to fellow members of Congress, and issuance of investigatory subpoenas.

On the other hand, the clause does not encompass all official responsibilities performed by legislators. Important congressional functions that have been deemed unprotected include sharing legislative materials with the public and communicating with administrative agencies on behalf of constituents. Thus, for instance, the Court has held that a senator may be sued for defamation on the basis of something he or she said in a press release or constituent newsletter even if the exact same words spoken on the Senate floor are protected by the clause.

As set forth in 1972 in Gravel v. United States, the Court's test when reviewing legislators' assertions of absolute immunity is whether the speech or conduct in question is an integral part of the deliberative and communicative processes by which members participate in lawmaking activity. One could certainly argue that newsletters or press releases aimed at raising public awareness on key legislative issues, or complaints to agencies on behalf of constituents about the failure to enforce or abide by a statute, are important parts of the business of legislating. The Court, however, has emphasized that these activities also have other purposes (like increasing name recognition among potential voters, or exerting control over agency performance) that extend beyond lawmaking itself.

Unless the clause's absolute protection for legislators' speech is limited in some way, it could cover almost everything senators and representatives do in their quest for legislative success. Members of Congress have broad authority under Article I of the Constitution, and they have on occasion shown they are capable of abusing that authority. The Court's reservations as to what is an integral part of members' legislative performance may at bottom reflect a concern that the Bill of Rights must impose certain restraints on congressional investigations into the lives and affairs of citizens. Because legislators' mistreatment can harm the civil rights of private individuals, the Court has taken a relatively narrow view of what is integral so as to reduce the circumstances in which absolutely privileged legislative conduct would infringe on other constitutionally protected interests.

One unresolved issue concerning the speech or debate clause is whether it covers legislators' personnel actions (hiring or firing of staff). The Supreme Court has held that members' key staff, who function in effect as legislative alter egos, are themselves entitled to protection under the clause in appropriate circumstances. Some commentators have argued that the Court should shield congressional employment decisions that involve this inner circle of advisors, because senators and representatives must have total discretion to select such loyal and trusted aides to fulfill their core legislative responsibilities. Others contend that employment decisions should never be protected by the clause, because the selection of staff is not an integral part of the legislative process even if such staff are an essential precondition to sound legislative decision making. Lower federal courts are divided on this issue, and the Supreme Court has yet to address it.

Forty-three state constitutions contain a provision similar to the speech or debate clause. Although many of these states' clauses have never been applied in the courts, some recent state court interpretations have been less protective of legislators' free speech than the settled federal approach to these matters. For instance, two trial courts in New York have held that their state's speech or debate clause protects legislators from liability, but legislators may still be compelled to testify in a lawsuit to which they are not a party. And in Michigan, an appellate court has held that the state's speech or debate clause shelters individual legislators' records and files but does not protect legislative committee materials during civil litigation. These interpretations, and others narrowly construing state speech or debate clause protections, suggest that state senators and representatives may not always enjoy the same degree of protection for their speech as members of Congress do.

JAMES J. BRUDNEY

References and Further Reading

- Clarke, Mary Patterson. Parliamentary Privilege in the American Colonies. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1943.
- Gordon, Sir Charles, ed. Ersine May's Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings, and Usage of Parliament. 20th Ed. London, Butterworths, 1983.
- Brudney, James J., Congressional Accountability and Denial: Speech or Debate Clause and Conflict of Interest Challenges to Unionization of Congressional Employees, Harvard Journal on Legislation 36 (1999) 1–76.
- Huefner, Steven F., The Neglected Value of the Legislative Privilege in State Legislatures, William and Mary Law Review 45 (2003) 213–309.
- Reinstein, Robert J., and Harvey A. Silverglate, Legislative Privilege and the Separation of Powers, Harvard Law Review 86 (1973) 1113–1182.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. Richmond Co. S.P.C.C.*, 479 N.Y.S.2d 624 (Sup. Ct 1984)
- Browning v. Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives*, 789 F.2d 923 (D.C. Cir 1986)
- Davis v. Passman*, 544 F.2d 865 (5th Cir. 1977), rev'd on other grounds 442 U.S. 228 (1979)

- Doe v. McMillan*, 412 U.S. 306 (1973)
- Dombrowski v. Eastland*, 387 U.S. 82 (1967)
- Eastland v. U.S. Servicemen's Fund*, 421 U.S. 491 (1975)
- Gravel v. United States*, 408 U.S. 606 (1972)
- Hutchinson v. Proxmire*, 443 U.S. 111 (1979)
- Kilbourn v. Thompson*, 103 U.S. 168 (1880)
- Lincoln Building Associates v. Barr*, 147 N.Y.S.2d 178 (Mun.Ct 1955)
- Michigan Mutual Insurance Co. v. Dept. of Treasury*, nos. 178228, 178230, LEXIS 2245 (Mich. App.Ct 1996)
- United States v. Brewster*, 408 U.S. 501 (1972)
- United States v. Johnson*, 383 U.S. 169 (1966)
- U.S. Constitution, Article I, section 6, clause 1

LELAND v. OREGON, 343 U.S. 790 (1952)

In Leland v. Oregon, the U.S. Supreme Court held that a state rule requiring the defendant to prove insanity beyond a reasonable doubt did not violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Subsequent Court decisions (for example, In re Winship, 1970, Mullaney v. Wilbur, 1975) requiring that the prosecution bear the burden of proving essential elements of the crime cast doubt on this holding. But in Rivera v. Delaware (1976), the Court dismissed, for want of a substantial federal question, an appeal of a conviction under an instruction placing the burden of proving insanity on the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence. Thus, under the federal constitution, the defendant may be required to bear the burden of proving insanity, a position that most jurisdictions have adopted. Most require the defendant to prove insanity by a preponderance, but some (including the federal courts) impose the higher clear and convincing standard of proof on defendants. Empirical evidence leaves some doubt as to whether the placement of the burden of proof makes a practical difference in the insanity context. However, there is no justification for imposing a heavier burden on those who assert insanity than on those who assert other defenses; in fact, juries probably tend to be more skeptical of insanity claims than any other defensive claim.

CHRISTOPHER SLOBOGIN

References and Further Reading

- American Bar Association Criminal Justice Mental Health Standards. Washington, D.C.: ABA Press, 1989, pp. 383–88.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- In re Winship*, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)
- Mullaney v. Wilbur*, 421 U.S. 684 (1975)
- Rivera v. Delaware*, 429 U.S. 877 (1976)
- See also Insanity Defense; Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975); Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt

LEMON TEST

The Lemon Test is part of a very unstable and hotly debated area of constitutional law: whether government aid to religion in the form of grants to or partnership with religious schools violates the constitutional prohibition against establishing religion. In 1971, the Lemon Test was the final word on the subject, but as the political debate about the separation of church and state grew more contentious in the 1980s and 1990s, other tests, such as the Endorsement test and the Coercion test, have been proposed, and there remains no firm resolution of the issue.

Originating in the 1971 case Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), this test is meant to determine whether government subsidies to religious organizations violate the establishment clause of the First Amendment. The establishment clause states that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” As explained in the 1947 case Everson v. Bd. of Ed., 330 U.S. 1 (1947), this clause means at least four things: (1) that neither the state nor federal government can set up an official church, (2) that a person cannot be forced either to practice or not to practice religion, (3) that government cannot give aid to religion, and (4) that government cannot participate in the affairs of religion. In Everson, a New Jersey law allowed a subsidy to religious schools for student bus transportation. The Court held that the subsidies did not violate the Constitution because they were intended for a secular aspect of the schools’ mission—student transportation. Thus, the holding distinguished between secular and sacred activities by the schools; where the subsidies were only used for secular purposes that were “indisputably marked off from the (schools’) religious function,” they were constitutionally permissible.

Following Everson, it was permissible for the government to subsidize a religious organization, but only after determining that the aid served a secular, not religious end. Lemon v. Kurtzman revolves around this problem of whether government subsidies to religious organizations aid a secular or sacred purpose. Lemon involved Rhode Island and Pennsylvania subsidies to private religious school teachers for teaching secular subjects. In contrast to the result in Everson, the Court held that these subsidies were unconstitutional. Although the teachers testified that they did not inject religion into their secular classes, Justice Burger wrote that the only way to prove they did not would be for government to carefully audit and supervise the curricula. This level of government involvement in religious school curricula would amount to excessive entanglement between church and state.

The Lemon test requires any government subsidy to a religious organization to meet three tests: (1) it must have a good faith secular purpose, (2) it must not have the principle effect of aiding or inhibiting religion, and (3) it must not create an excessive entanglement between government and religion. The test does not invalidate a subsidy for having a religious purpose, as long as it has a bona fide secular purpose as well. Neither does it invalidate a subsidy that aids religion, so long as that is not its principal effect. In this sense, it concedes to the accommodationist view that the “wall of separation” is permeable.

The Court had several opportunities to apply the Lemon test again in the 1980s. Several of these decisions involved the government’s display of religious symbols. In Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984), the Court considered a creche in Pawtucket, Rhode Island’s, annual Christmas display. The Court found that the creche did not run afoul of the establishment clause because, taken in context of a holiday display that also included secular images of Christmas, it did not have the principal effect of advancing religion. This decision also introduced the Endorsement test, which has existed as a parallel to the Lemon Test ever since. However, in County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989), the Court found that a creche erected all by itself in a prominent location on the steps of a downtown courthouse did violate the establishment clause. The Allegheny creche’s prominence and the fact that its religious message was undiluted by the presence of secular images of Christmas meant that it had the principal effect of advancing Christianity, in violation of the Lemon Test. Justices Rehnquist, Scalia, Kennedy, and White believed the majority’s application of the Lemon Test unjustifiably hostile to religion. In another case, Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589 (1988), the Court held that the “Chastity Act,” which provided government funds to religiously affiliated non-profits to teach abstinence and adoption as alternatives to abortion, was not unconstitutional because it met the three prongs of the Lemon Test.

Evangelical Christians interpret the result of Lemon and the associated school prayer and religious display cases as discrimination against religion. In response to this concern, President George W. Bush pushed with some success for a variety of legislation that would seem to fly in its face. This includes school vouchers that can be used to pay for private religious schools and “charitable choice,” an effort to end the “discrimination” against religious non-profits in receiving federal grants.

CHRISTOPHER D. KING

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589 (1988)
Capital Square Review Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995)
County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
Everson v. Bd. of Ed., 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
McCreary v. ACLU of Kentucky
Van Orden v. Perry

See also Legislative Prayer; Public School Curricula and Free Exercise Claims; Religious Symbols on Public Property; Secular Purpose; School Vouchers; State Aid to Religious Schools; Teacher Speech in Public Schools; Teaching Evolution in Public Schools

LEYRA v. DENNO, 347 U.S. 556 (1954)

The principle that coerced confessions in criminal trials violate the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of due process was previously established. This case broke new ground by declaring that evidence gained after a coerced confession could also be found inadmissible. Camilo Leyra was convicted of first-degree murder for killing his elderly parents and sentenced to death, but his convictions were reversed by a state appeals court on the grounds that his confession was coerced. After his parents' death, Leyra had been interrogated almost continuously for several days on end, and he was physically and emotionally exhausted when a psychiatrist with hypnosis skills managed with threats, assurances of leniency, and leading questions to draw out a confession. Leyra was tried a second time, using as evidence his later confessions to the police and prosecutors. The court let the jury decide as a question of fact whether the later confessions were voluntary or similarly coerced; the jury convicted and again imposed the death penalty, and the New York appeals court affirmed. Leyra challenged the state courts' decision, charging that his later confessions were also coerced. The Supreme Court agreed, saying that the confessions were closely related in time and circumstances, enough for the later conversations to be tainted by the coerced confession to the psychiatrist. The lower courts left this question to the jury, as the dissenters in the Supreme Court would have done, but the majority thought that the threats to individual liberty were sufficiently serious to warrant the extra protection by invalidating all his confessions.

DAVID D. BURNETT

Cases and Statutes Cited

Leyra v. Denno, 347 U.S. 556 (1954)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment for Felony Murder; Capital Punishment Reversed; Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation; Due Process; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); False Confessions; Police Power of the State; Substantive Due Process

LILBORNE, JOHN (FREEBORN JOHN) (1614–1657)

John Lilborne (also Lilburne, Lilbourne) secured the privilege against self-incrimination, the right to be confronted with one's accusers, and the right to be informed of the accusation in the English courts. Lilborne was born in Sunderland, in Northern England, in either 1614 or 1615. He was the third child and second son of a prominent Puritan family. He was apprenticed to a London tailor at the age of sixteen. In 1637, under the reign of Charles I, he became involved in Puritan politics. He met John Bastwick and arranged to print Bastwick's tract, the Letany, in Holland and to smuggle copies to England. He was caught and was brought before the Court of the Star Chamber at age twenty-three on the charge of distributing seditious and libelous books. Star Chamber officers and later the Archbishop of Canterbury himself demanded that Lilborne take the oath ex officio mero, by which he would swear to answer truthfully the Court's inquiries. When asked to take the oath, Lilborne replied,

Lilborne: "To what?"

The Court: "That you shall make true answer to all things that are asked of you."

Lilborne: "Must I so, sir? But before I swear, I will know to what I must swear."

The Court: "As soon as you have sworn, you shall [know], but not before."

Lilborne refused to take the oath and refused to answer the Court's questions. He argued that as a "freeborn Englishman," he had the right to know the accusation against him. He asserted that the Court's attempt to prove his guilt through his answers rather than permitting him to confront his accusers violated his rights as an Englishman, Magna Carta, the "goode olde" laws of England, and the Holy Bible.

The Star Chamber Court found him in contempt. Lilborne was sentenced to the pillory and to be whipped through the streets of London between the Fleet Prison and the pillory. Two weeks after his sentencing, Lilborne was tied to a cart, stripped to the waist, and began his journey. The route was crowded with spectators and his sympathizers. Lilborne used this opportunity to declare himself a martyr and to speak out against the injustice of scourging a man for remaining silent. He excoriated the High Church and the Catholic Church from the pillory until a jailer shoved a rag into his mouth and silenced him. From that day he was known as “Freeborn John.”

During his imprisonment, Lilborne, now a hero, wrote numerous pamphlets describing his ordeal and arguing on behalf of the right of conscience and against the abuses of the Star Chamber. Two and a half years later, Lilborne was released by the Long Parliament after Oliver Cromwell’s speech on his behalf. Parliament abolished the Star Chamber and High Commission (Ecclesiastical) courts.

After the execution of King Charles I, radical Presbyterians won control of Parliament and attempted to establish Presbyterianism as the state church. Suffering criticism from what had become a free press, the House of Commons enacted a licensing law that restricted publication. Lilborne then became a leading defender of the freedom to publish. He published both legal and illegal tracts critical of the Presbyterian Church, the House of Commons, and his old protector, Oliver Cromwell. For his efforts, he was charged with treason and three times put on trial for his life.

During his confinements, petitions flowed to the House of Commons demanding his release. Lilborne again refused to answer questions put to him by a committee of the House and even refused to enter a plea at his trial, asserting that to compel him to answer guilty or not guilty would violate his right of conscience.

Although Lilborne was acquitted, Cromwell ordered him imprisoned in the Tower of London without the privilege of habeas corpus. Lilborne was later transported to prison on the Isle of Jersey, where he died in 1657.

Lilborne’s life was remarkable. He inspired those who followed him to assert the privilege against self-incrimination in the common law courts. After 1640, the House of Commons abolished the oath ex officio. English judges respected the accuseds’ assertions that they should not be compelled to incriminate themselves, that they should be advised of the accusations against them, and that they should be confronted by their accusers. All three rights became established in English common law. Lilborne is remarkable, too, because he maintained a principled stance against infringements of liberties, attacking those in power, whether Catholic or Protestant, who would abuse them.

JEFFREY RENZ

References and Further Reading

- Gibb, M. A. John Lilborne, The Leveller. London: Lindsay Drummond, Ltd., 1947.
- Gregg, Pauline. Free-born John. London: George G. Harrap & Co., Ltd., 1961.
- Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Fifth Amendment: The Right Against Self-incrimination. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.

See also Confrontation Clause; Puritans; Rights of the Accused

LILLY v. VIRGINIA, 527 U.S. 116 (1999)

The confrontation clause of the Sixth Amendment guarantees the right to cross-examine witnesses. The Court in Lilly had to balance the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination with the Sixth Amendment right to cross-examine witnesses.

Benjamin Lilly and his brother, Mark, were charged with robbery, abduction, and capital murder. On arrest, the police questioned both men, and Mark confessed to several of the related crimes but maintained that Benjamin had shot and killed the victim. At Benjamin’s trial, the prosecution called Mark to testify, and he invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. The prosecution then admitted Mark’s confession into evidence, over defendant’s objection, and the jury convicted Benjamin of capital murder and sentenced him to death.

Out-of-court statements made by unavailable witnesses are hearsay and are inadmissible unless the evidence falls within a firmly rooted exception or contains particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. The Court reversed the trial court and held that Mark’s confession was improperly admitted because it did not fall within an exception to the hearsay rule. The Virginia Supreme Court had found that the confession fell within an exception because Mark’s confession was against his penal interest, but the Court disagreed explaining that such confessions are inherently unreliable, especially when serving to shift blame to another.

The Court was unanimous in the judgment but mustered only a plurality of four in the reasoning. The application of Lilly remains unsettled, although the Court recognized that cross-examination remains the greatest legal engine ever invented for the discovery of the truth.

References and Further Reading

- Gore, Kimberly G., Interpreting the Confrontation Clause: Is There Dissension Among the Ranks?, Mississippi College Law Review 21, Fall (2001): 83–119.

Kirst, Roger, Appellate Court Answers to the Confrontation Questions in Lilly v. Virginia, Syracuse Law Review 53 (2003): 87–169.

J. AMY DILLARD

Cases and Statutes Cited

Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116 (1999)

See also Confrontation Clause; Defense, Right to Present; Hearsay Evidence

LIMITATIONS ON CLERGY HOLDING OFFICE

The proper role of clergy in politics has long been a controversial one in America. Although clergy have been actively involved in politics since our founding, a number of early state constitutions prohibited clergy themselves from holding various political offices. Seven of the original thirteen states imposed such restrictions, and six other states that entered the union in the early decades of the nineteenth century also included such restrictions. These restrictions took various forms, but most commonly prohibited clergy from being in the state legislature. Several states went further and prohibited clergy from holding any statewide office.

These prohibitions were likely modeled in part on the English practice of barring clergy from the House of Commons, where the Crown's authority over the Church of England created concerns that clergy in the Commons might undermine that body's independence. In the new United States the prohibitions on clergy holding office served two apparent purposes. First, several state constitutions that banned clergy from office specifically stated it was for the purpose of ensuring that ministers not be "diverted from the great duties of their service" to God. The second and more likely reason was to ensure a proper separation of church and state. Almost all of the states banning clergy from office were Southern or border states, and many in those states believed that New England clergy were too actively involved in politics. The ban on clergy in office arguably sought to avoid that being repeated elsewhere and to prevent any particular religious group from exerting too much power. There is also speculation that some Southern states feared that clergy in the legislature might promote abolition of slavery.

Two of America's most prominent founding fathers, Thomas Jefferson and James Madison, were initially deeply divided on whether clergy should be banned from political office. Jefferson strongly supported such restrictions, believing that when clergy had become "ingrafted into the machine of government," they had become a "formidable engine" against the rights of others. Madison, on the other hand, believed that any special restriction on clergy holding office violated a "fundamental principle of liberty" by depriving them of a civil right enjoyed by others. Much later in life Jefferson changed his view and agreed with Madison, stating that experience had shown that clergy should be treated the same as others, and thus share the same rights to hold elective office.

Interest in banning clergy from political office began to wane in the middle of the nineteenth century. No state added such a provision after 1828, and, starting with New York in 1846, states that previously had such restrictions began to remove them from their constitutions. By the end of the nineteenth century only two states, Maryland and Tennessee, retained prohibitions on clergy holding political office. The Maryland provision was held unconstitutional by a federal district court in 1974.

The one remaining state prohibition, Tennessee's, which precluded clergy from serving in the state legislature, was held unconstitutional by U.S. Supreme Court in McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618 (1978). The Court was unanimous in finding the provision unconstitutional, but divided in its reasoning. Four members of the Court said the provision violated the free exercise clause of the First Amendment; two said it violated both the free exercise and the establishment clause; another said it violated the establishment clause; and a final justice found it violated the equal protection clause. A majority of the justices specifically rejected the state of Tennessee's argument that the prohibition was justified by establishment clause principles. As stated by Justice Brennan in a concurring opinion, the establishment clause "does not place religious discussion, association, or political participation in a status less preferred than rights of discussion, association, or political participation generally."

The Court's decision in McDaniel highlights the unconstitutionality of states placing limitations of clergy holding office. Neither our secular form of government nor our national commitment to separation of church and state require that anyone be precluded from political life because of religious views or affiliation. Although religion cannot be given a preferred status within our public life, neither can it be disadvantaged relative to other views. Instead, constitutional principles of free exercise of religion and free speech require that religious adherents have equal access to the political process. Anything less than this is, in the words of James Madison, “a deprivation of a civil right,” and inconsistent with our national commitment to a free and open political process.

MARK W. CORDES

References and Further Reading

Stokes, Anson P. Church and State in the United States. New York: Harper and Row, 1950.

Cases and Statutes Cited

McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618 (1978)

See also Disestablishment of State Churches in the late Eighteenth Century and Early Nineteenth Century; Religious Tests for Officeholding (Article 6, Cl. 3)

LIMITED PUBLIC FORUMS

A limited public forum is a kind of designated public forum. A designated public forum is an area voluntarily opened by the government as a place for expressive activity. It requires affirmative action by the government, in contrast to the “traditional” public forum that acquires its character from its historical use. The government may also designate a forum for specific types of communications or available for specific groups; these are limited public forums. Although the Court applies the same strict scrutiny to infringements on speech in these forums, the major distinction of a limited public forum is government can limit the subject matter, or content, of speech in these forums while it cannot usually in a traditional public forum.

The Supreme Court first delineated the three types of forums: traditional public, designated public and nonpublic in Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators Association, 460 U.S. 37 (1983). Although it has allowed government to limit subject matter in limited public forums, the Court has struck down attempts to permit only particular viewpoints (Rosenberger v. Rector, 515 U.S. 819 [1995] [student activity fees could not be limited to groups promoting a belief about a deity]).

The doctrine has led to disagreements almost since its inception (see Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, 473 U.S. 788 (1985) (majority found federal workers charity fund drive that limited participants a nonpublic forum; dissent criticized “circular” reasoning and found it a limited public forum). Courts still wrestle with whether the government’s intent to allow limited expressive activity or the compatibility of the forum with particular speech activities should determine a limited public forum.

PATRICK FLYNN

References and Further Reading

Shiffrin and Choper. The First Amendment: Cases, Commentaries and Questions. 3rd Ed. West Group, 2001.

Kovic, et al. The American Constitutional Order: History, Cases and Philosophy. 2nd Ed. West Group, pp. 974–973.

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM (1809–1865)

In rankings of American presidents, Abraham Lincoln is often listed as the greatest President of all time. The rationale for that title has to do with his leadership at difficult times, particularly leadership during the bloodiest war ever fought in the Americas, the American Civil War. Much is made of the fact that the Civil War was about holding the American nation together, or as Lincoln put it in his Gettysburg Address, “testing whether any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure.” What is missed in the nationalism observation, however, is that the war was fought for principle in Lincoln’s mind, not just for nationalism. The “so conceived and so dedicated” line has to do with human rights, and particularly with Lincoln’s reference to “liberty” and the aspiration that “all men are created equal.” In other words, what stands behind the war for nationalism is human rights. And it is the dedication to human rights, above all else, that earns Lincoln’s high ranking in the roster of American presidents.

Until 1858, Lincoln had been a little known person outside of his region of Illinois. Lincoln was born in rural Hardin County, Kentucky, on February 12, 1809, the son of Thomas Lincoln and Nancy Hanks Lincoln. The family lived in poverty as his father scraped out a living as a farmer. He moved to Illinois as a young man and there married Mary Todd on November 4, 1842. They had four sons, although only one lived to adulthood. Lincoln had practiced law in Springfield and had served two terms in the U.S. Congress from 1847–1851, where he had opposed the expansion of slavery beyond the state where it was then legal. This position had been significant because of the acquisition of the American Southwest in the Mexican War and the rapid westward expansion that resulted. Eventually, Lincoln believed, the obvious contradictions between slavery and the ideals of the Constitution would lead to emancipation, but he did not advocate abolition of slavery at that time.

Lincoln–Douglas Debates

In 1858, Lincoln ran against the nationally known incumbent Senator Stephen A. Douglas for a senate seat in Illinois. In accepting his nomination for that seat, Lincoln delivered his famous “house divided” speech in which he argued that the nation could not continue to exist “half slave and half free.” In July 1858, Lincoln proposed that the two candidates engage in a series of formal debates, a proposal that Douglas reluctantly accepted. During that summer, the two men encountered one another in seven debates. The intellectual discussion of slavery that resulted expanded the national debate about slavery beyond any public discussion up to that point. Lincoln forced Douglas to engage the apparent contradiction between slavery and a free society. The infamous Dred Scott decision had been handed down by the Supreme Court only the year before and had declared that slaves were not citizens and therefore could not sue for freedom. When challenged to define his position on that case, Douglas did not disavow the decision but then added that “slavery cannot exist a day or an hour anywhere unless it is supported by local police regulations.” His position accepted the constitutional force of Dred Scott, but suggested that if the ruling was unpopular, it should not be enforced. Lincoln saw the slavery issue as a core moral issue rather than as a practical political problem: “it is the eternal struggle between these two principles—right and wrong throughout the world.” In the debates, Lincoln tried to balance the moral issue and his antislavery beliefs with the practical problem of race adjustment that would result from the end of slavery. While Douglas argued for the status quo, Lincoln forced the debates to raise the discussion on slavery to a new level. Lincoln’s party actually won more votes than did Douglas’s party, but senators were then selected by the state legislatures. Because of gerrymandered districts, Douglas won reelection to his seat. Lincoln’s performance in the debates was widely covered and well reported in the national press. The debates made him politically prominent in the Northern free states and catapulted him into leadership within the Republican party.

Lincoln won the nomination of the Republican Party for the presidency in 1860 and was elected to the presidency on an abolitionist platform. He won an election that showed the deep divisions of the nation on the slavery issue, and his election spurred action in southern states that led to their seceding from the union. Lincoln believed it his duty to preserve the union, and the Civil War broke out.

Suspension of Habeas Corpus

Although his commitment to human rights was the basis of his election, the beginning of the Civil War challenged his commitment to civil liberties. After the war began, Lincoln claimed emergency powers and suspended the right of citizens to request a writ of habeas corpus after their arrests. This right, requiring that a judge determine the legality of an imprisonment, was seen by Lincoln as a threat to the security of the nation during the early days of the war. He claimed the prerogative to suspend the writ because of the crisis. The military was free to arrest and detain anyone suspected of assisting the confederates indefinitely. Lincoln’s action was immediately controversial and has caused debate among constitutional scholars ever since. Lincoln offered several justifications for suspending habeas corpus. First, he argued that a “doctrine of necessity,” predicated on his oath to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, allowed him to take a “big picture” view of executive authority. Just as sometimes limbs must be amputated to preserve life, presidents may be forced to violate the letter of the Constitution to save it over the long run. Second, he made more formal constitutional claims for his actions. The President, he noted, has the duty to “faithfully execute” the nation’s laws. Disloyal citizens could preclude such faithful law enforcement, and thus, to serve a larger purpose, he could suspend their right to habeas corpus. Also, the commander-in-chief power allowed him, in time of war, “to take any measure which may best subdue the enemy.”

In May 1861, a union general named George Cadwalader ordered the arrest of a John Merryman for being “an active secessionist sympathizer.” Merryman was held in a military prison by order of Cadwalader. Chief Justice Roger B. Taney, who had administrative supervision over the prison, asked for Cadwalader to allow him to judge the legality of Merryman’s detention. Cadwalader cited Lincoln’s orders and refused Taney’s request. Taney cited Cadwalader for contempt of court, but Union soldiers refused to allow the order to be served. Subsequently, Taney, the man who had also authored the Dred Scott decisions, wrote of his outrage in the Ex parte Merryman opinion.

In his opinion, Taney addressed Lincoln’s arguments for expanded executive authority, directly disputing Lincoln’s claim that the faithful execution of law justified the suspension of habeas corpus. That power, Taney wrote, did not permit him to “execute them himself, or through agents or officers, civil or military.” Rather, the president’s duty was only to make certain that outside forces do not interfere with law enforcement. Accordingly, for example, the president would be obliged to help the judicial branch if some outside force threatened the judicial power, but the president could not use the military to usurp judicial authority.

Similarly, Taney challenged Lincoln's assertion that emergencies create a prerogative power. Taney found that if the executive branch could, under any circumstances, overstep the powers of the other branches, then "the people of the United States are no longer living under a government of laws." The constitution was not simply a suggestion regarding government operations but was instead a document of imperatives, constraining executive authority at all times. If presidents were able to ignore the Constitution "upon any pretext or under any circumstances," the Constitution would be meaningless.

Finally, and most importantly, Taney declared that the Framers never intended for a president to be able to suspend habeas corpus. It defied any understanding of the events that led to the American Revolution to think that the Framers would support such expanded executive authority. They had just declared independence from an English King whom they believed had acted in a despotic manner. They distrusted any powerful executive authority, and most especially the authority to arrest citizens and hold them indefinitely without trial. "I had supposed it to be one of those points of constitutional law upon which there was no difference of opinion, and that it was admitted on all hands, that the privilege of the writ could not be suspended, except by act of Congress."

Many of Lincoln's defenders concede that Lincoln's position on the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus was an extreme one, one that expanded presidential authority beyond its rightful limits. Were it the case that this action was the last in the field of human liberty, perhaps history would judge Lincoln more harshly. However, it was not the Lincoln's last word on human rights.

Emancipation Proclamation

As the War escalated, so did the issues surrounding the war. Despite Lincoln's own personal commitment to abolitionism, he wished to keep the rhetoric surrounding the war to the narrow issue of national unity. However, it soon became clear that the moral cause undergirding the conflict should be addressed. On January 1, 1863, he issued the Emancipation Proclamation, declaring that all slaves residing in territory in rebellion against the federal government should be free. The action itself freed very few people because it did not apply to slaves in border states fighting on the union side. The states in the Confederacy obviously did not act on Lincoln's order. However, the proclamation did demonstrate to Americans and the world that the Civil War was now being fought to end slavery. Although the preservation of the union always remained at the center of Lincoln's rhetoric, the real issue of slavery now had also become public.

Lincoln had reluctantly concluded that he should issue the proclamation. His initial tactic of portraying the war primarily in terms of preserving the Union, however, did not satisfy the abolitionist leadership in Congress and did not dramatize the war for other nations. As pressure for abolition mounted in Congress, however, Lincoln embraced the idea. By September 22, 1862, he had issued a preliminary proclamation announcing that emancipation would take effect on January 1, 1863, in those states that remained in rebellion against the nation. The Emancipation Proclamation was a tactical document; Lincoln well understood that it had primarily symbolic importance at the time it went into effect. However, it did make the abolition of slavery an inevitable consequence of a union victory in the war. And, more tangibly, within the Proclamation, Lincoln sought to encourage black men to join the Union military forces in battle. By the end of the war, nearly 200,000 African Americans had fought for the Union cause, and Lincoln referred to them as indispensable in ensuring Union victory.

Immediately on completion of the war, after Lincoln's death, the broad application of abolition was accomplished in the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution, passed on December 18, 1865. That amendment became a part of Lincoln's legacy and helped justify his primacy in the roster of American presidents.

Lincoln's Legacy

Lincoln's legacy in human rights and liberties thus sends mixed messages. On the one hand, he expanded presidential authority in the suspension of basic liberties, a legacy that continues to foster debate even in modern times. On the other hand, more than any American president, he expressed a passionate view of the centrality of basic human rights. In his famous words: "As I would not be a slave, so I would not be a master. This expresses my idea of democracy. Whatever differs from this, to the extent of the difference, is no democracy." Lincoln did not live to see the end of the Civil War. He was assassinated by John Wilkes Booth on April 15, 1865, just weeks before the end of the war.

JAMES RIDDLESPIERGER

References and Further Reading

- Beverage, Albert J. Abraham Lincoln (4 volumes). New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1928.
- Donald, David Herbert. Lincoln. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995.
- Goodwin, Doris Kearns. Team of Rivals: The Political Genius of Abraham Lincoln. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2005.
- Sandburg, Carl. Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years and the War Years. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1954.
- Farber, Daniel A. Lincoln's Constitution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Dred Scott v. Sandford*, 60 U.S. 393 (1857)
- Ex Parte Merryman*, 17 F.Cas.144 (1861)

See also Dred Scott v. Sandford*, 60 U.S. 393 (1857); Habeas Corpus: Modern History; Slavery and Civil Liberties

LINE-UPS

Eyewitness identification procedures are a principal investigative tool for law enforcement agencies. Lineups, or identification parades as they are known in Britain, involve presenting persons before those who witnessed a crime to give the witness an opportunity to ascertain whether the culprit who committed the crime is among the group assembled. This is distinguished from a show-up, in which a single suspect is presented to an eyewitness, or a photo spread, in which only photos are displayed.

An eyewitness' selection of a suspect will generally lead to prosecution, and an incourt identification will often lead to conviction. Numerous studies have shown that mistaken eyewitness identification is the most frequent source of wrongful convictions of the innocent. Before 1967, the reliability of eyewitness identification testimony was simply a matter to be brought out in direct and cross-examination at trial and argued to the jury. But in 1967, the Supreme Court recognized eyewitness identification was rife with risk of error (United States v. Wade) and sought to reduce the risk of mistake by preventing the suggestive influences that may gratuitously inject mistake into an already risky process. The Court provided a right to counsel's presence during lineups in Wade and agreed that due process violations may occur when the police have used unnecessarily suggestive procedures that were conducive to irreparable mistaken identification (Stovall v. Denno, Manson v. Brathwaite).

Many empirical studies were conducted on the lineup process in the 1980s and 1990s in an effort to prevent false identifications. Professional associations that have studied the issue, particularly the American Psychology/Law Society (AP/LS), recently issued recommendations tied to this research in a report entitled "Eyewitness Identification Procedures: Recommendations for Lineups and Photospreads." The AP/LS's four recommendations to enhance the reliability of the lineup process are: (1) "The person who conducts the lineup or photospread should not be aware of which member of the lineup or photospread is the suspect (a "double-blind procedure"). (2) Eyewitnesses should be told explicitly that the person in question might not be in the lineup or photospread and therefore should not feel that they must make an identification. They should also be told that the person administering the lineup does not know which person is the suspect in the case. (3) The suspect should not stand out in the lineup or photospread as being different from the distractors based on the eyewitness' previous description of the culprit or based on other factors that would draw extra attention to the suspect. (4) A clear statement should be taken from the eyewitness at the time of the identification and prior to any feedback as to his or her confidence that the identified person is the actual culprit." The Department of Justice has recently published its own report entitled Eyewitness Evidence: A Guide for Law Enforcement that incorporates some, but not all, of the AP/LS recommendations. There is a growing consensus that reforms are needed if we are to achieve a more reliable criminal justice system.

MARGERY M. KOOSD

References and Further Reading

- Borchard, E. M., Convicting the Innocent: Sixty-five actual errors of criminal justice (1932).
- Connors, Edward, et al., Convicted by Juries, Exonerated by Science: Case Studies in the Use of DNA Evidence to Establish Innocence After Trial, U.S. Dept. of Justice NCJ 161258 (1996).
- Gross, Samuel H., Loss of Innocence: Eyewitness Identification and Proof of Guilt, Journal of Legal Studies 16 (1987): 395-453.
- Judges, Donald P., Two Cheers for the Department of Justice's Eyewitness Evidence: A Guide for Law Enforcement, Arkansas Law Review 53 (2000): 231-297.
- Koosed, Margery M., The Proposed Innocence Protection Act Won't—Unless It Also Curbs Mistaken Eyewitness Identifications, Ohio State Law Journal 63 (2002): 263-314.
- Rattner, Arye, Convicted but Innocent: Wrongful Convictions and the Criminal Justice System, Law and Human Behavior 12 (1988): 283-293.
- U. S. Department of Justice, Eyewitness Evidence: A Guide for Law Enforcement, www.ncjrs.org/txtfiles1/nij/178240.txt. (1999).
- Wall, P., Eyewitness Identification in Criminal Cases (1965).
- Wells, Gary L., et al., Eyewitness Identification Procedures: Recommendations for Lineups and Photospreads, Law and Human Behavior 22 (1998): 603-647.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Manson v. Brathwaite, 430 U.S. 98 (1977)
Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293 (1967)
United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)

See also Due Process; Eyewitness Identification; Right to Counsel

CITY OF LITTLETON v. Z.J. GIFTS D-4, L.L.C (2004)

The City of Littleton, Colorado, adopted an “adult business” licensing ordinance that required the businesses to submit information about their activities to the city; that they comply with local zoning rules restricting their location; and other specific circumstances outlining when the city could deny a license, plus time limits for city officials to reach a final licensing decision. The ordinance targeted the secondary effects of adult businesses, and licenses were required before their opening.

Z. J. Gifts opened a store selling adult toys, novelties, lotions, magazines, and movies in a location not zoned for adult businesses. Rather than apply for a license, Z. J. Gifts challenged the constitutionality of the ordinance, arguing among other things that the ordinance imposed a lengthy licensing system that did not provide for prompt judicial review when licenses were denied. The federal district court in Colorado rejected the challenge and ruled in favor of the city. On appeal, the Tenth Circuit reversed the lower court, holding that Littleton’s preapplication procedures and judicial review requirements constituted unconstitutional restraints under the First Amendment.

The fractured decision in FW/PBS Inc. v. City of Dallas (1990) generated uncertainty and divisions among the circuit courts regarding judicial review in regulatory regimes of adult businesses. As the Tenth Circuit framed it, one unsettled issue was whether the constitutional standard for “prompt judicial review” based on Freedman v. Maryland (1965) meant a “prompt decision” or according to FW/PBS v. City of Dallas the “possibility of prompt judicial review” or access to judicial review if a license were denied. The circuit court unanimously concluded that “we are not persuaded by those circuits that have concluded that mere ‘access’ to judicial review is sufficient in licensing cases. Following the Fourth, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits, we hold that, in the event that an adult-business license is denied, FW/PBS requires a prompt final judicial decision regarding the validity of the denial.” [Emphasis in original.]

A unanimous Supreme Court reversed the Tenth Circuit. Writing for the Court, Breyer concluded the “ordinance before us, considered on its face, was consistent with the First Amendment’s demands.” Breyer dismisses the distinction made between Freedman and its requirement that regulatory regimes involving the First Amendment “assure a prompt final judicial decision” and O’Connor’s plurality opinion in FW/PBS where she referred to the “possibility of judicial review.” The distinction “makes too much of too little,” Breyer notes; both cases, properly interpreted, require “a prompt judicial decision.”

The crux of Breyer’s opinion is that “nothing in FW/PBS or in Freedman requires a city or a State to place judicial safeguards all in the city ordinance that sets for a licensing scheme.” Littleton’s ordinance remains constitutionally valid because “In our view, Colorado’s ordinary judicial review procedures suffice as long as the courts remain sensitive to the need to prevent First Amendment harms and administer those procedures accordingly.” Colorado’s courts, Breyer writes, are “aware of the constitutional need to avoid ‘undue delay’” that may arise from licensing adult businesses that lead to “unconstitutional suppression of protected speech.” If problems should arise, he advises, “federal remedies would provide an additional safety valve.”

ROY B. FLEMMING

Cases and Statutes Cited

City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D-4, L.L.C., 2003-058 (2004)
FW/PBS Inc. v. City of Dallas, 493 U.S. 215 (1990)
Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965)

LLOYD CORPORATION v. TANNER, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)

Four years after its attempt in Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza (1968) to harmonize the conflict between the First Amendment rights of persons to speak and the rights of private property owners to exclude individuals from their property, the Court reexamined this question and severely limited the scope of that decision. In Lloyd Corp., five protesters entered a fifty-acre shopping mall and distributed handbills criticizing the Vietnam War. When threatened with arrests for trespass, the five sued in district court claiming that the distribution of handbills at the shopping center was protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments under the Court’s decisions in Marsh v. Alabama and Logan Valley.

The Supreme Court distinguished Lloyd Corp. from Logan Valley in two significant ways. First, the Court stated that in contrast to the hand billing in Lloyd, the picketing in Logan Valley had been specifically directed at a store in the mall and concerned the policies of that store. Thus, unlike Lloyd Corp., the free speech activity directly related to the use to which the shopping center was being put. Second, the Court stated that the Logan Valley pickets had no other reasonable opportunity to reach their intended audience other than by access to private property, because they were specifically targeting the labor policies of a particular store located in the mall. In contrast, the protesters in Lloyd Corp. could have exercised their rights to protest the Vietnam War in other locations within the community. The Court in Lloyd Corp. took pains to distinguish, but not overrule, Logan Valley. Although four years later in Hudgens v. NLRB (1976), the Court found that the two cases were incompatible and that the holding of Lloyd amounted to a total rejection of the earlier case.

Although made shortly after Lloyd Corp., the Hudgens decision significantly realigned First Amendment jurisprudence and state action doctrine. The major distinction that the Court's opinion in Lloyd Corp. drew from Logan Valley was inconsistent with a basic premise of the First Amendment. If free speech rights within a shopping center depended on the connection between the subject of the speech and the purposes to which the shopping center was opened to the public, then the government regulation of speech would depend on its content. Basic to the Court's First Amendment doctrine is a suspicion of content-based regulation, which is often susceptible to control of expression because of the government's preference for or dislike of certain ideas. Accordingly, the Court's holding in Lloyd Corp. would have triggered an evaluation of speech rights at odds with fundamental First Amendment principles—a course that the Court recognized and corrected in Hudgens.

TODD BROWER

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law Principles and Policies. 2nd Ed. New York, NY: Aspen, 2002, pp. 498–502.
 Garvey, John H. What are Freedoms For? Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1996, pp. 242–251.
 Tribe, Lawrence H. American Constitutional Law, 1708–1711. 2nd Ed., Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza*, 391 U.S. 308 (1968)
Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976)

- Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner*, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)
Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946)

See also First Amendment; Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972); State Action Doctrine

LOAN ASSOCIATION v. TOPEKA, 87 U.S. 655 (1875)

In 1872, the Kansas legislature passed acts authorizing cities to fund private enterprise to improve and develop the cities of Kansas. Topeka issued $100,000 in bonds to encourage an iron bridge manufacturer to build a factory within the city. The bonds were to be funded through public taxation. Topeka stopped repaying the bonds after the first payment, and the Citizens' Savings and Loan Association of Cleveland, who had bought the bonds, sought redress through the federal courts under diversity of citizenship jurisdiction.

The district court judge held that legislatures had no power to compel citizens, through taxation, to subsidize a purely private enterprise and that doing so also violated a provision of the Kansas state constitution prohibiting abuses of power.

The Loan Association appealed the decision to the U.S. Supreme Court and Justice Samuel F. Miller wrote the decision for the majority affirming the decision of the district court. The Court found that general principles of natural law denied legislatures the power to tax to fund purely private enterprise.

The Court held that its cases upholding the use of taxation to fund private industry such as railways, canals, and roads did not support an unlimited power to tax. In each case the question before the Court was whether the tax-funded private individuals and corporations to engage in acts which had a public character accepted by "time and the acquiescence of the people" or purely to aid private interests.

The Court found that unlike transportation where the community can gain a public benefit from infrastructural improvements "[n]o line can be drawn in favor of the manufacturer which would not open the coffers of the public treasury to the importunities of two-thirds of the business men of the city or town." The use of the taxation power to fund them was a violation of the citizen's private right and "none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation."

He found this private right, not in the specific textual guarantees of the constitution or the potentially elastic clauses of the Ninth or the Fourteenth Amendments but in the manner of John Locke, Miller asserted that "there are such rights in every free government beyond the control of the State . . . which grow out of the essential nature of all free governments. Implied reservations of individual rights, without which the social compact could not exist, and which are respected by all governments entitled to the name.”

Justice Nathan Clifford wrote a dissent attacking the Court for nullifying “an act of the State legislature on the vague ground that they think it opposed to a general latent spirit supposed to pervade or underlie the constitution, where neither the terms nor the implications of the instrument disclose any such restriction.”

The arguments presented in the majority and dissent can be seen as foreshadowing the controversy over the use of substantive due process, based on an underlying spirit of the constitution, to strike down statutes in violation of unenumerated economic or privacy rights without a specific textual basis.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- Collins, Michael G., Before Lochne—Diversity Jurisdiction and the Development of General Constitutional Law, Tulane Law Review 74 (2000) 1263–1324.
- Fairman, Charles. Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–88 (The Oliver Wendell Holmes Devise History of the Supreme Court of the United States, Vols. 6–7). MacMillan Library Reference; 2nd Ed., 1987.

See also Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905); Privacy; Privacy, Theories of; Retained Rights (Ninth Amendment); Right of Privacy

LOCHNER v. NEW YORK, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)

Adam Smith’s Wealth of Nations recites an axiom heralded in Lochner v. New York: A man’s labor is his property. Lochner struck down New York’s Bakeshop Act limiting a baker’s labor to ten hours a day. The Act denies liberty of contract in violation of due process of law, it exceeds the limits of the police power, it is substantively bad. “There is, in our judgment,” Justice Peckham’s majority opinion exclaims, “no reasonable foundation for holding this to be necessary or appropriate as a health law to safeguard the public health or the health of the individuals who are following the trade of a baker.” “We do not believe in the soundness of the views which uphold this law.” To the contrary, Justice Peckham, and especially Justice Brewer, believed in the “survival of the fittest” philosophy of English sociologist and philosopher Herbert Spencer, whose The Man Versus the State (1884) decried hours of labor legislation as so much nonsense. Thus five justices liberated Joseph Lochner to work his bakeshop employees as he saw fit. Government had no business protecting bakers as a class, or their unions. Such a motive, Peckham hints, lay behind the Bakeshop Act.

Justice John Marshall Harlan dissented. He put the burden of proof on Lochner to establish that the statute is “plainly and palpably in excess of legislative power.” Citing Professor Hirt’s treatise on Diseases of Workers, Harlan notes that the labor of bakers is among the most laborious imaginable. “Nearly all bakers are pale-faced and of more delicate health than the workers of other crafts, which is chiefly due to their hard work and their irregular and unnatural mode of living.” Many reasons of substantial character support the legislative policy of the Bakeshop Act. For Harlan, White, and Day that is the end of the matter.

Justice Holmes dissented, alone: “This case is decided upon an economic theory which a large part of the country does not entertain.” Neither Adam Smith nor Herbert Spencer determines the scope of Liberty: “The Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer’s Social Statics.” “[A] constitution is not intended to embody a particular economic theory, whether of paternalism and the organic relation of the citizen to the State or of laissez faire.”

Lochner’s restricted view of the police power held sway in constitutional law for a generation. It was not open to government to aid unions (Adair v. United States, 1908), or laborers (Coppage v. Kansas, 1915). Justice Sutherland’s opinion in Adkins v. Children’s Hospital (1923), striking down the District of Columbia Minimum Wage Act, is of a piece with the philosophy of Lochner v. New York. The era of abstract liberty and equality of working classes ended with the Great Depression, the New Deal, and Chief Justice Hughes’s opinion in West Coast Hotel v. Parrish (1937). The old order of the negative State was gone, replaced by Franklin Roosevelt, the Welfare State, and the Hughes Court. Today, the ghost of Lochner is heralded by those who attack Roe v. Wade, while economic libertarians urge Lochner’s resurrection.

PAUL R. BAIER

References and Further Reading

- Bernstein, David E., Lochner Era Revisionism, Revised: Lochner and the Origins of Fundamental Rights Constitutionalism, Georgetown Law Journal, 92 (2003): 1:1–60.
- Frankfurter, Felix, Hours of Labor and Realism in Constitutional Law, Harvard Law Review 29(1916): 4 :353–373.
- Gillman, Howard. The Constitution Besieged. Durham and London: Duke University Press, 1993.

- Kens, Paul. Judicial Power and Reform Politics: The Anatomy of Lochner v. New York: Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1990.
- Phillips, Michael J. The Lochner Court, Myth and Reality. Westport and London: Praeger, 2001.
- Pound, Roscoe, Liberty of Contract, Yale Law Journal 18 (1909): 7:454–487.
- Siegan, Bernard H. Economic Liberties and the Constitution. Chicago and London, University of Chicago Press, 1980.
- Strauss, David A, Why Was Lochner Wrong?, University of Chicago Law Review 70 (2003): 1:373–386.
- Sunstein, Cass R. Lochner's Legacy, Columbia Law Review 87 (1987): 5:873–919.
- Symposium: Lochner Centennial Conference*, Boston University Law Review 85 (2005): 3: 671–1015, Introduction by David J. Seipp, contributors Jack M. Balkin, Lynn A. Baker, Pamela S. Karlan, Keith E. Whittington, Barry Cushman, Larry Yackle, David E. Bernstein, Howard Gillman, Daniela Caruso, Gerald Leonard.
- Symposium. The 100th Anniversary of Lochner v.* New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), New York University Journal of Law and Liberty 1 (2005): 1:323–669 [includes photographs], Foreword by Randy Barnett, contributors Richard A. Epstein, Jonathan Lurie, James W. Ely, Jr., Paul Kens, Wayne McCormack, Matthew S. R. Bewig, Daniel A. Crane, Ellen Frankel Paul, Rebecca Brown, Jonathan Klick, Francesco Parisi, Todd Zywicki, Asheesh Agarwal.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adair v. United States*, 208 U.S. 161 (1908)
- Adkins v. Children's Hospital*, 261 U.S. 525 (1923)
- Coppage v. Kansas*, 236 U.S. 1 (1915)
- West Coast Hotel v. Parrish*, 300 U.S. 379 (1937)

See also Carolene Products v. United States, 304 U.S. 144 (1938); Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Economic Regulation; Economic Rights in the Constitution; Freedom of Contract; Harlan, John Marshall, the Elder; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Hughes, Charles Evans; Judicial Review; Locke, John; New Deal and Civil Liberties; Police Power of the State; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Roosevelt, Franklin Delano; Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873); Theories of Civil Liberties

LOCKE v. DAVEY, 540 U.S. 712 (2004)

Locke v. Davey is a significant U.S. Supreme Court holding that represents the juxtaposition of three strains of First Amendment religion clause jurisprudence: the history of state constitutional provisions barring public financial assistance to sectarian institutions; the Court's more recent holdings approving funding of religious institutions through vouchers and other private choice mechanisms; and the Court's free exercise rulings prohibiting the targeting of religious conduct for disparate treatment. In the end, the Locke decision affirmed that these competing jurisprudential strains were not so irreconcilable as to deny states the ability to interpret their state constitutional provisions independently of federal standards.

Locke involved the Washington state "Promise Scholarship Program" that provides financial grants to academically gifted students attending public and private colleges in the state, including religiously affiliated colleges. To be consistent with the Washington Constitution, the authorizing statute allows the scholarship monies to be spent in any academic program except for a "degree in theology." Article I, section 11 of the Washington Constitution provides that "[n]o public money or property shall be appropriated for or applied to any religious worship, exercise or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment." Joshua Davey was awarded a Promise Scholarship and chose to enroll in a Bible college and pursue a degree in pastoral ministries. After he was declared ineligible, Davey sued in federal court alleging his exclusion violated his rights under the free exercise, free speech, and equal protection clauses. The state acknowledged that pursuant to the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002) permitting state vouchers for religious education, the federal establishment clause would not bar Davey's use of the scholarship in a ministerial program. The state argued, however, that it was entitled to interpret its own constitutional provisions more strictly than required under the federal constitution and find that Davey's proposed use of the scholarship would violate Article I, section 11. A lower federal appeals court disagreed, holding that the state had singled out religion for unfavorable treatment in violation of the free exercise clause.

Despite having upheld the constitutionality of vouchers only two years earlier, the Supreme Court by a seven-to-two vote affirmed the state's denial of the scholarship. Writing for the majority, Chief Justice William Rehnquist noted that although the free exercise and establishment clauses are frequently in tension, "there are some state actions permitted by the establishment clause but not required by the free exercise clause." This was such a case of "play in the joints" between the two constitutional principles. The majority held that the mere singling out of religion for differential treatment, without more, was not equivalent to discriminate against religion. In contrast to laws that penalized religious practice, "the State's disfavor of religion (if it can be called that) is of a far milder kind." Rather than seeking to punish religion, the state had "merely chosen not to fund a distinct category of instruction" on the basis of adherence to its constitutional requirements.

The Court also held that even though the Washington Constitution "draws a more stringent line than that drawn by the United States Constitution,” its interest in not funding the training of ministers was part of a long-established tradition reaching back to the earliest state constitutions. As the Court concluded:

The State’s interest in not funding the pursuit of devotional degrees is substantial and the exclusion of such funding places a relatively minor burden on Promise Scholars. If any room exists between the two religion clauses, it must be here.

The Court majority side-stepped the third issue about the underlying legitimacy of the Washington constitutional provision. Davey and his amici had argued that the Washington Constitution had been enacted in 1889 in the wake of the failed Blaine Amendment, of 1876. Davey argued that the Blaine Amendment, which would have prohibited public funding of sectarian schools nationwide, had been motivated by anti-Catholic animus as had the Enabling Act of 1889, which had required Washington to include a nonfunding provision in its constitution as condition for admission as a state. Interestingly, in the 2000 case of Mitchell v. Helms, a Court plurality that included Chief Justice Rehnquist had characterized the Blaine Amendment as “born in bigotry.” In the Locke majority opinion, however, Rehnquist wrote that Davey had failed to establish a “credible connection between the Blaine Amendment and Article I, § 11,” and that there was nothing in the history or text of the state constitution or the scholarship program that suggested animus toward religion.

This last part of the Locke decision is particularly significant, because a majority of state constitutions contain provisions like those in the Washington Constitution that are more explicit and potentially more stringent in their application of the no-funding principle. These state constitutional provisions may serve as a bar to possible funding of religious schools and institutions, even though such funding might be permissible under the federal establishment clause. The Locke majority refused to presume any improper motive behind such provisions as Davey had urged. The Locke decision therefore renders pyrrhic much of the victory for religious school voucher programs that was gained under the Zelman decision, because voucher opponents can continue to rely on more restrictive state constitutional provisions to block voucher and other aid programs. The Locke decision also indicates that the Supreme Court will not presume that programs that differentiate along religious lines necessarily violate the free exercise clause. In some instances this may benefit religious institutions by authorizing legislative accommodations of religious practice. In other instances, however, it may mean that religious institutions will be ineligible to participate in government programs.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Green, Steven K., ‘Blaming Blaine: Understanding the Blaine Amendment and the No-Funding Principle, First Amendment Law Review 2 (2003): 107–151.
- , Locke v. Davey and the Limits to Neutrality Theory, Temple Law Review 77 (Winter 2004): 913–955.
- Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- Jeffries, John C., and James E. Ryan, A Political History of the Establishment Clause, Michigan Law Review 100 (2001): 279–370.
- Laycock, Douglas, Theology Scholarships, The Pledge of Allegiance, and Religious Liberty, Harvard Law Review 118 (2004) 155–218.
- Lupu, Ira C., and Robert W. Tuttle, Zelman’s Future: Vouchers, Sectarian Providers, and the Next Round of Constitutional Battles, Notre Dame Law Review 78 (2003): 917–994.
- Ravitch, Frank S., Locke v. Davey and the Lose-Lose Scenario: What Davey Could Have Said, But Didn’t, Tulsa Law Review 40 (2004): 55.
- Tushnet, Mark, Vouchers After Zelman, Supreme Court Review 2000 (2000) 1–39.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

See also Blaine Amendment

LOCKE, JOHN (1632–1704)

Perhaps no other single person has had as much impact on political philosophy and thinking as John Locke. Thomas Jefferson acknowledged Locke’s influence on his own political thought; George Mason named Locke as a primary influence on his work; Thomas Paine used Lockean notions of liberty in his writing.

Born outside London to a minor gentry family, Locke was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. His primary contribution to politics and political science is his presentation of Natural Law theory and the Social Contract. Natural Law, although not a concept original to Locke, found one of its most fervent disciples in Locke. He defined Natural Law as a moral basis for human behavior; in other words, the way man should (but does not always) act. Respect for the Natural Rights of others, including property and the preservation of human life, were basic rights given to man by God.

In a state of Nature, that is, in a precivilization context, man existed independent of communities. Although each person had the same rights, namely the right to life, the right to keep and own property, and the right to live unaffected by the choices of all other persons, it also fell on each individual person to defend those rights. For the sake of convenience, man entered into a state of Society, whereby he surrendered some of those rights to the state. For example, it being difficult and inconvenient for a person living in close proximity to 1,000 other persons with property and rights to defend himself against all other persons, he created a simple government. By giving the government the power and authority to act in his own name, the man entered into the Social Contract. The state, then, took the responsibility of mediating disputes about property or incidents whereby one citizen was damaged in some way by another.

It is critical to recognize the limits to the social arrangement: under Social Contract theory; the state could never possess more authority to act in any citizen's name than that citizen possessed himself. For example, the state could not take property from one citizen or give it to another without authority. The state was authorized to proscribe laws for the good of society, but those laws could not provide unfair advantage to one citizen over another. For the purpose of proscribing laws, a legislature of some fashion was the favored method; legislators were theoretically beholden to the electorate and could be held accountable for their actions.

In addition, seen in the context of a theoretical contract, the agreement could be broken by either party. The right of the people to rebel under a government, for example, was inherent, because ultimate authority rested in the people. A king or some other ruler could (and should) be overthrown if that ruler became tyrannical, and Locke was explicit about the conditions under which tyranny existed: when a king or ruler used his power in ways that benefited his or her interest instead of the common interest, that ruler was a tyrant; and when a ruler exercised his power or used force in a way that exceeded his or her authority, that ruler was tyrannical. Under conditions of tyranny, citizens had the right and the obligation to overthrow the ruler, but because the ruler was the one who had violated the contract, the citizens who rebelled were not strictly rebels (a term that implies extralegal activity) but citizens taking back the power they had previously ceded to the ruler. The king, said Locke, was the one in rebellion.

For Locke's contemporaries, political authority came from one of two places: God or the people. Locke rejected the Divine Right school of thought and believed that ultimate authority, whether by king or some other executive, rested in the people. The logical extension of that argument placed Parliament (indeed, any elected legislative body) properly as sovereign over a king. A Divine Right king, as conceived of by Locke and his contemporaries, had undue power over a legislature: he could refuse to call the legislature into session; he could veto legislative activity; or he could apply undue influence or pressure to ensure a specific legislative outcome. All were unsatisfactory under a proper state of society.

Locke published his philosophies in a series of essays, the most important of which were the Two Treatises on Government and An Essay on Human Understanding. Both were read widely in the American colonies, but even more colonists were exposed to Lockean thought when public leaders incorporated Locke's ideas in pamphlets, sermons, and public speeches. Without question, the idea that citizens could lawfully rebel under conditions of tyranny, and without question American colonists saw parallels between Locke's theoretical construction of popular sovereignty and the political situation in London.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Brown, Gillian. The Consent of the Governed: The Lockean Legacy in Early American Culture. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.
Chappell, Vere, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Locke. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

LOCKETT v. OHIO, 438 U.S. 586 (1978)

This case recognizes the unique individuality of every criminal defendant convicted of capital murder by requiring that juries consider mitigating factors before sentencing a defendant to death.

Sandra Lockett was the getaway driver in the robbery of a pawnshop, which inadvertently resulted in the death of the pawnshop owner. She was subsequently charged with capital murder. The jury found Lockett guilty as charged. Under Ohio law then in existence, the trial judge determined whether she should be sentenced to death. In making this determination, Ohio law permitted the judge to consider only three mitigating factors: (1) that the victim had induced or facilitated the offense, (2) that the defendant committed the offense under duress, coercion, or strong provocation, or (3) that the offense was primarily the product of the defendant's mental illness. Other factors, such as Lockett's age, her lack of a prior criminal record, any remorse she may have expressed, her relatively minor role in the crime, and the fact that she had no specific intent to kill the pawnbroker were not allowed to be considered.

The Supreme Court held that the Ohio law was invalid and that the sentencer could not be precluded from considering, "as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that the defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death." According to the Supreme Court, if the sentencer is unable to consider all potentially mitigating factors, the risk is high that death will be imposed despite factors that may call for a less severe penalty.

This case has allowed capital defendants to put forth a host of potentially mitigating factors, such as their abusive upbringing and mental deficiencies. In addition, it set the stage for future decisions specifically mandating the consideration of age and adjustment to prison as mitigating factors.

KENNETH A. WILLIAMS

Cases and Statutes Cited

Eddings v. Oklahoma, 455 U.S. 104 (1982)

Skipper v. South Carolina, 476 U.S. 154 (1994)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics

LOCKHART v. MCCREE, 476 U.S. 162 (1986)

Lockhart v. McCree addresses the constitutionality of death qualification, the removal of prospective jurors whose opposition to capital punishment may prevent or substantially impair the performance of their duties at the sentencing phase.

Ardia McCree filed a habeas corpus petition after being convicted of capital felony murder and sentenced to life without parole in Arkansas. At trial, eight prospective jurors were removed for their stated belief that they could not impose the death penalty under any circumstance. McCree argued that his right to an impartial jury selected from a representative cross-section of the community was violated and cited empirical studies that suggest death-qualified juries are conviction prone. The lower courts found these studies persuasive and held that death-qualified juries are unconstitutional. A. L. Lockhart, the Director of the Arkansas Department of Correction, appealed this decision to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court criticized the empirical studies but held that, even assuming their validity, death qualifying does not violate the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments. The Court found that the fair cross-section requirement applies to venirees and that death-qualified jurors are not a distinctive group. To McCree's argument that impartiality requires balancing predispositions, the Court wrote that defining impartiality as such is illogical and outweighed by the state's interest in administrative efficiency and the benefit of residual doubt. The Court distinguished Lockhart from Witherspoon v. Illinois and Adams v. Texas, both of which dealt with capital sentencing, not guilt.

The dissent in Lockhart and subsequent commentaries criticize the Court's disregard of empirical evidence and high regard for judicial economy over defendants' rights. Lockhart was decided before the Court became aware of the high frequency of error in capital cases. The risk of death qualifying is perhaps greater than the Court envisioned.

JANE EGGERS

References and Further Reading

Bersoff, Donald N., and David J. Glass, The Not-So Weisman: The Supreme Court's Continuing Misuse of Social Science Research, University of Chicago Law School Roundtable 2 (1995): 279, 297–300.

Ellsworth, Phoebe. "Unpleasant Facts: The Supreme Court's Response to Empirical Research on Capital Punishment," in Challenging Capital Punishment, Ed. Place, 1988, pp. 177–211.

Haney, Craig, Aida Hurtado, and Luis Vega, "Modern" Death Qualification: New Data on Its Biasing Effects, Law and Human Behavior 18 (1994): 619–633.

Liebman, James S., The Overproduction of Death, Columbia Law Review 2030 (2000): 100: 2097, n. 164.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Adams v. Texas, 448 U.S. 38 (1980)

Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412, 424 (1985)

Witherspoon v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 510 (1968)

LOG CABIN REPUBLICANS

The "Log Cabin Republicans," so named in honor of Abraham Lincoln's birthplace, is an organization of gay and lesbian Republicans dedicated to working within the Republican Party for equal rights. Founded in California in 1978 in response to the anti-gay Briggs Initiative, which sought to ban gay teachers from public schools, the group has grown in size over the past thirty years to more than 12,000 members and is now the strongest voice for gay rights within the Republican Party.

The group is largely composed of gays and lesbians committed to traditional GOP principles—national defense, fiscal conservatism, and libertarian social policies—but who are dedicated to making the party more inclusive and to bucking its traditional anti-gay stance.

In the 1980s, the organization focused on educating GOP members about gay and lesbian issues while urging self-reliance and individual responsibility as part of the response to the AIDS epidemic. But what sparked the group's rapid growth in the mid-1990s was the anti-gay tone of the 1992 Republican Convention in Houston, Texas. The convention motivated gay Republicans to take a more active role in the party's leadership, leading to the establishment of the national office of the Log Cabin Republicans in Washington, D.C. shortly thereafter. They received considerable media attention in 1996 when Republican Senator and presidential candidate Bob Dole, who eventually received the organization's endorsement after accepting the contribution, initially returned a $500 campaign from the group. In that same year, the Log Cabin Republicans won a verdict in Texas District Court against the Texas GOP, which had excluded them from filling a booth at the state party convention.

Although the Log Cabin Republicans supported John McCain for President, they were initially pleased with George W. Bush's positions on gay and lesbian issues, applauding his $15 billion plan to combat AIDS around the world, for example. However, the Log Cabin Republicans strongly opposed President Bush's plan to enact a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. The proposed language of the Federal Marriage Amendment, as the group interprets it, would also deny the legal benefits of same-sex civil unions. The organization points out that no constitutional amendment has even been used to "discriminate" against a class of people, and that the proposal "tramples" on federalism and represents an invasion of states' rights. The group spent more than $1 million on radio and television advertisements to oppose the change, and pointedly voted against endorsing the President for a second term in office.

The Log Cabin Republicans have not focused solely on the Federal Marriage Amendment but are actively working within the Republican Party to reorient its position in respect of other legislative priorities. The organization has lobbied for the enactment of the Employment Non-Discrimination Act (ENDA), which would prohibit discrimination against gays or lesbians in the workplace. Another focus of the group has been eliminating the "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy, which, the group contends, unfairly discriminates against homosexuals in the U.S. military.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Neuman, Johanna. "A Short History of the Gay Right." Los Angeles Times, June 12, 2005, LAT Magazine Desk. Log Cabin Republicans website, at <http://online.logcabin.org/>.

See also Gay and Lesbian Rights

LO-JI SALES, INC. v. NEW YORK, 442 U.S. 319 (1979)

In Lo-Ji, an officer obtained a warrant based on probable cause for the search and seizure of two obscene videos on sale at the defendant's bookstore. The officer further alleged that additional obscene materials were in the store, and a second, blank warrant was issued for the seizure of these materials. The Town Justice actively participated in the search and allowed the police to seize materials without first determining their obscenity himself. More than 800 items were seized. The trial court denied the defendant's motion to suppress all evidence seized under the second warrant. The Supreme Court unanimously reversed, holding the warrant invalid because of not satisfying the particularity and neutrality requirements of the Fourth Amendment warrant clause.

In its analysis, the Court likened the warrant to "the general warrant or writ of assistance of the 18th century" and faulted it for not particularly describing the things to be seized, instead leaving the choice to the officers' discretion. Because of First Amendment concerns, the Court held that the original videos, on their own, did not create probable cause for a general search, and because the search was intentionally so broad, the plain view doctrine also could not apply. The Court further invalidated the warrant for the Town Justice's lack of neutrality, warning that warrant application and execution processes cannot be streamlined; they must remain distinct to preserve the neutrality that is the essence of Fourth Amendment warrants. Lo-Ji's holding remains virtually undisturbed, although later cases have defined its outer limits.

SARA E. LINDENBAUM

References and Further Reading

Thomas, George C. III, The Poisoned Fruit of Pretrial Detention, NYU Law Review 61 (1986): 3: 413-461.

Wilkins, Richard G, Defining the 'Reasonable Expectation of Privacy': An Emerging Tripartite Analysis, Vanderbilt Law Review 40 (1987): 5: 1077–1129.

See also Impartial Decisionmaker; Obscenity; Plain View; Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Seizures; Warrant Clause

LONG, HUEY PIERCE (1893–1935)

Born August 30, 1893, in Winn Parish, Louisiana, Long died September 10, 1935, by an assassin's bullet. From 1918 to 1935 Long built a local and national political power base that influenced Louisiana politics throughout the twentieth century.

After a stint as a traveling salesman, Long enrolled at Tulane University Law School for one year. Although he completed only two courses for credit, Long studied numerous law courses and convinced the state bar examiners to administer a special examination, which he passed. Armed with a license to practice law, Long started running for public office.

In 1918, he was elected to the Louisiana Railroad Commission, which became the Public Service Commission. While serving as Public Service Commissioner, Long argued a case before the U.S. Supreme Court and attracted the attention of Chief Justice William Howard Taft, who remarked that Long possessed a legal mind and an ability to argue a case as fine as anyone he had encountered. Using the Public Service commission as a springboard, Long became Governor in 1928. As Governor, Long survived impeachment and was elected in 1930 to the U.S. Senate, where he positioned himself for a run at the Presidency in 1936, only to be assassinated in 1935.

From 1928 until his death, Long steadily built a political machine based on power and patronage that dominated Louisiana politics. As the champion of the working man, Long fought Standard Oil, built hospitals, revised the state tax code, built schools, gave free school books to students, built more than 3,000 miles of paved roads and more than forty bridges, and devised Share Our Wealth, a system for the redistribution of assets to make every man a king. He used his dominance over the legislative and executive branches of state government to gain control over state agencies, state hospitals, state militia, state police, and even local governmental authorities.

His opponents compared him to Stalin, Hitler, and Mussolini and described him as dictator, despot, demagogue, fascist, populist, Bolshevik, and socialist. Declaring himself the Kingfish after a radio show character, Long described himself as sui generis. Long craved power, and as he gained power, he used it not only to promote his political programs but also to punish his enemies.

Frustrated by criticism of his political agendas, Long systematically attacked the free press by lashing out at his most vocal enemies, the daily newspapers published in the larger Louisiana cities. Exercising his domination over the Louisiana legislative and executive branches from his position in the U.S. Senate, Long engineered the passage of a tax on the gross receipts from advertising sales in daily newspapers with circulations of more than 20,000 copies per week. A lawsuit ultimately decided by the U.S. Supreme Court challenged the law as censorship through taxation. On February 10, 1936, the same day Long's widow was sworn in to fill the unexpired term of her deceased husband, a unanimous Court in Grosjean v. American Press Co. declared the tax to be an unconstitutional violation of freedom of the press.

Long's attempts at abridging the freedom of the press did not stop with the newspaper advertising tax. After a letter critical of Long's tactics was submitted to the Louisiana State University Reveille for publication, Long had the letter suppressed and had the university's president appoint a faculty member to serve as censor. Twenty-six journalism students protested and were dismissed from the school. Although most were allowed to return, seven students refused to capitulate. These seven were provided funds from an anonymous source to enroll at the University of Missouri School of Journalism.

In January 1935, martial law was declared in Baton Rouge after armed anti-Long protestors overtook the courthouse because of Long's firing of local government employees. As part of the conditions of martial law, newspapers could not publish articles critical of state employees, and citizens could neither assemble nor carry guns.

As part of Long's state legislative agenda, in April 1935, the legislature created the State Printing Board whose members were appointed by the governor. The board determined which newspapers would receive lucrative publishing fees as the official journals of state and local governmental agencies. That same year a State Board of Censors whose members were appointed by the governor was created to censor any motion picture or newsreel being shown in Louisiana.

For Long the ends justified the means. But in the end, his abuse of power and his curtailment of liberties led to his destruction.

THOMAS E. RICHARD

References and Further Reading

Cortner, Richard C. The Kingfish and the Constitution: Huey Long, the First Amendment, and the Emergence of Modern Press Freedom in America. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Hair, William Ivy. The Kingfish and His Realm: The Life and Times of Huey P. Long. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1991.

Long, Huey P. Every Man a King: The Autobiography of Huey P. Long. New Orleans: National Book Company, 1933.

Williams, T. Harry. Huey Long. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1969.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936)

LOS ANGELES v. LYONS, 461 U.S. 95 (1983)

Article III of the Constitution empowers federal courts to only hear “cases and controversies.” When determining whether there is a case or controversy, federal courts will determine whether the plaintiff has standing, which requires, inter alia, that a government practice caused or will cause an actual or imminent injury. In City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, the Supreme Court extended this doctrine to hold that the plaintiff must have standing not only to file suit, but also to seek injunctive relief.

Adolph Lyons, an African-American man, was stopped after committing a minor traffic offense. The Los Angeles Police Department had a practice of placing nonviolent offenders in choke holds, even though the practice killed sixteen people—twelve of whom were African-American men. Thus, although Lyons did resist arrest, they placed him in a choke hold. Lyons lost consciousness.

Lyons then filed a federal civil rights lawsuit. He sought compensatory and injunctive relief, that is, he asked the federal court to force the LAPD to stop choking nondangerous offenders. Although the Supreme Court recognized that Lyons had standing to seek money damages, a five-to-four Court held that he lacked standing to seek an injunction. Justice White wrote for the Court that it was “no more than speculation to assert either that Lyons himself will again be involved in one of those unfortunate instances [].” Consequently, Lyons did not face an imminent injury and therefore lacked standing to seek an injunction. Under Lyons’ standing requirement, plaintiffs seeking to wholesale stop a dangerous practice face an almost insurmountable hurdle.

MICHAEL C. CERNOVICH

References and Further Reading

Fan, Mary D., Risk Magnified: Standing Under the Statist Lens, Yale Law Journal 112 (2003).

Tribe, Lawrence H. American Constitutional Law. 3rd Ed. 1999, pp. 411.

Cases and Statutes Cited

City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95 (1983)

See also Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts; Race and Criminal Justice

LOVEJOY, ELIJAH (1802–1837)

Elijah Lovejoy was born on November 9, 1802, in Albion, Maine. He graduated from Waterville (now Colby) College in 1826 and later traveled to St. Louis, Missouri, to work both as a newspaper editor for the St. Louis Times and as a vocal advocate for the right to freedom of speech and the press. In 1831, Lovejoy left St. Louis for Princeton Theological Seminary in New Jersey to study for the Christian ministry.

After graduation, Lovejoy returned to St. Louis as the minister of a local Presbyterian Church and as editor of an upstart religious newspaper called the St. Louis Observer. As editor, Lovejoy returned to writing columns advocating the rights of Americans to enjoy freedom of speech and of the press as guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. He also condemned the activities of local Roman Catholics and promoted the gradual abolition of all African-American slaves.

Lovejoy used his newspaper as a forum for anti-slavery sentiment and religious opinion. In 1836, a group broke into the offices of the newspaper destroying the press. Fearing for the safety of his family, Lovejoy moved to Alton, Illinois, to resume work as editor of the newly formed Alton Observer. The local citizens of Alton were concerned that Lovejoy planned to make the town a center for abolitionist ideologies and practices. During the following year additional presses were destroyed and thrown into the Mississippi River.

On November 7, 1837, a new press arrived by steamboat in Alton. That evening a large group of men demanded Lovejoy hand over his printing press. The crowd began to throw stones at the building as both sides exchanged demands. Gunfire erupted, and Lovejoy was shot and killed. He was buried two days later in an unmarked grave at a local Alton cemetery.

CHRISTOPHER J. ANDERSON

References and Further Reading

- Dillon, Merton. Elijah P. Lovejoy, Abolitionist Editor. Urbana, IL: The University of Illinois Press, 1961.
 Simon, Paul. Freedom's Champion, Elijah Lovejoy. Carbondale, IL: The Southern Illinois University Press, 1994.

LOVING v. VIRGINIA, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)

The Fourteenth Amendment, ratified in 1868, attempted to change the status of blacks in the United States from a position of inferiority to one of equality with whites. The Supreme Court, however, refused to give the amendment its full meaning until nearly a century later, when it began to strike down as unconstitutional state laws based on the inferiority of the black race, including school segregation in Brown v. Board of Education (1954). In 1967, sixteen states barred marriage between persons of different races. That year, the Court, under the leadership of Chief Justice Earl Warren, invalidated anti-miscegenation laws as forms of invidious racial discrimination. Warren noted that over the past fifteen years fourteen states had repealed their laws banning interracial marriage.

Richard and Mildred Loving, a white man and a black woman, were married in 1958 in Washington D.C. because their home state of Virginia prohibited racially mixed marriages. After their wedding, they moved to Caroline County, Virginia, and lived as husband and wife. In 1959, they were arrested, prosecuted, and convicted of violating Virginia's anti-miscegenation law. The trial court sentenced each of them to one year in jail. They challenged the law as a violation of the equal protection of the laws clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In 1966, the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals upheld the law, but in June of 1967 the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously ruled the law unconstitutional.

The American colonies banned interracial sexual relations and marriage beginning in the seventeenth century. In 1664 Maryland, seeking to avoid the question of whether the offspring of a free white and a black slave was free or slave, enacted a statute prohibiting interracial marriage. In following years, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia instituted anti-miscegenation laws. After the Civil War and the abolition of slavery, thirty-three states kept or enacted laws barring marriages between the races. The state of California in 1880 banned marriage between whites and persons of Asian descent. Colonial and state governments never succeeded in enforcing these laws, however. It is estimated that seventy percent of African Americans have at least one white ancestor.

State courts repeatedly upheld these laws against constitutional challenges. Judges and legislators noted that such marriages were unnatural and a violation of God's will. The sentencing judge in the Loving case observed, "Almighty God created the races white, black, yellow, Malay and red, and he placed them on separate continents . . . He did not intend for the races to mix." The most frequent reason given for keeping the races from cohabiting was the need to preserve the integrity and supremacy of the white, European race. The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia in Loving said that the state's legitimate purposes were "to preserve the racial integrity of its citizens," and to prevent "the corruption of blood," "a mongrel breed of citizens," and "the obliteration of racial pride." The court noted that the law treated blacks and whites equally. It was a crime for either to marry someone of the other race. The state appellate court also ruled that marriage was a matter left by the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution to the states, which could regulate it under their police power, the power to make laws for the welfare, safety, health, and morals of the people.

Chief Justice Warren dismissed evidence that at least some of the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment thought that it permitted the states to continue to ban interracial marriage. Warren reasoned that the equal protection clause in both intent and in plain meaning obliterated all forms of state-sponsored invidious discrimination between the races. Citing Korematsu v. U.S. (1944), he noted that all laws discriminating on the basis of race are presumed unconstitutional and subjected to strict judicial scrutiny. Only a compelling governmental interest could save such a law, and the state failed to make any such justification.

The Supreme Court held that not only were anti-miscegenation laws inconsistent with equal protection of the laws but they also infringed a fundamental right guaranteed by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. "Marriage," declared Warren, is one of the 'basic civil rights of man,' fundamental to our very existence and survival."

Those who advocate a constitutional right of homosexuals to marry rely heavily on the Court's reasoning in Loving v. Virginia. They argue that state bans on gay marriage are based on the moral inferiority and deviance of homosexuals and, as such, are invidious forms of discrimination. Secondly, they contend that such prohibitions deny gays and lesbians the fundamental right to marry.

KENNETH M. HOLLAND

References and Further Reading

- Anti-Miscegenation Laws*. Encyclopedia of African-American Civil Rights. New York: Greenwood Press, 1992.
- The Loving Case: Virginia's Anti-Miscegenation Statute in Historical Perspective*. Virginia Law Review 52 (1966): 1189–1223.
- Moran, Rachel F. Interracial Intimacy: The Regulation of Race and Romance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.
- Newbeck, Phyl. Virginia Hasn't Always Been for Lovers: Interracial Marriage Bans and the Case of Richard and Mildred Loving. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2004.
- Wallenstein, Peter. Law and the Boundaries of Place and Race in Interracial Marriage: Interstate Comity, Racial Identity, and Miscegenation Laws in North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia, 1860–1960s. Akron Law Review 32 (1999): 557–576.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Board of Education*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Korematsu v. United States*, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)

See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Gay and Lesbian Rights; Marriage, History of; Police Power of the State

LOW VALUE SPEECH

Traditionally, the U.S. Supreme Court categorized various forms of speech as either worthy or unworthy of protection under the First Amendment. Speech that addressed political or social issues was clearly worthy of full protection under the First Amendment, and efforts by government to regulate such speech would be subject to strict judicial scrutiny. Some forms of speech, however, were characterized as being wholly outside the protection of the First Amendment. Thus, in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, Valentine v. Chrestensen, and Roth v. United States, respectively, the Court ruled that government could regulate or even prohibit “fighting words,” commercial advertising, and obscenity without regard to the First Amendment.

In recent decades, however, the Court has ruled that some categories of speech have sufficient expressive content to warrant a more limited form of protection than political speech. In two 1976 decisions, Virginia State Board of Pharmacy and Young v. American Mini-Theaters, the Court ruled, respectively, that commercial speech and non-obscene pornography are “low value speech” that must receive some degree of protection under the First Amendment.

In a subsequent decision, the Court has applied slightly differing forms of intermediate scrutiny to judge the validity of commercial speech and pornography. Regulation of commercial speech is judged under the Central Hudson line of cases, which may be characterized as having increased the protection afforded such speech over time, as illustrated by cases such as Discovery Network and 44 Liquormart. Regulation of pornography is normally judged under the O'Brien Rules, as illustrated by cases such as City of Renton and Pap's A.M.

ALAN C. WEINSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- Loewy, Arnold H., The Use, Nonuse, and Misuse of Low Value Speech, Washington & Lee Law Review 58 (2001): 1: 195–225.
- Shaman, Jeffrey M., The Theory of Low-Value Speech, Southern Methodist Law Review 48 (1994–95): 1: 297–348.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Central Hudson Gas & Elec. Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York*, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)
- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)
- City of Cincinnati v. Discovery Network*, 507 U.S. 410 (1993)
- City of Erie v. Pap's A.M.*, 529 U.S. 277 (2000)
- City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres*, 475 U.S. 41 (1986)
- 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island*, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)
- Roth v. United States*, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
- United States v. O'Brien*, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
- Valentine v. Chrestensen*, 316 U.S. 52 (1942)

LYNCH v. DONNELLY, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)

In Lynch v. Donnelly, the Supreme Court for the first time considered the constitutionality of government use or display of religious symbols. The Court held that a government-owned creche or nativity scene could constitutionally be displayed in a public area at Christmastime as an acknowledgement of the nation's religious traditions. The holding has commonly been interpreted as also requiring that to be permissible, displays of religious symbols must be part of larger, holiday displays that include secular symbols. Although Lynch addressed a practice common in many communities, the decision is most significant for its development of a new analytical approach for judging establishment clause challenges, called the “endorsement test.”

Lynch involved a challenge to a Christmas display in the downtown shopping district of Pawtucket, Rhode Island. The display, comprising secular and religious holiday figures and decorations commonly associated with Christmas (including a Santa Clause house, a reindeer sleigh, candy cane poles, a Christmas tree, and a banner reading "Seasons Greetings") was a cooperative effort of the City of Pawtucket and the local retail merchants association. The City owned all components of the display, including the near-life size creche that depicted the traditional birth of Jesus, and the items were placed on a park owned by a nonprofit group located in the heart of the shopping district. Even though the display was on private property, the Court treated the issue as one involving a government-sponsored display involving religious items. The plaintiffs, resident taxpayers, challenged the display as creating the appearance of official sponsorship of Christianity in violation of the establishment clause.

In a five-to-four decision written by Chief Justice Warren Burger, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the display. The Court used a historical analytical approach to the problem, noting the "unbroken history of official acknowledgement by all three branches of government of the role of religion in American public life from at least 1789." These "official references" to religion, found in practices such as Thanksgiving Day declarations and the references to God in the national motto and in the Pledge of Allegiance indicated the legitimacy of such acknowledgements. The Court declared that it had declined to adopt "a rigid, absolutist view of the establishment clause," but instead, must take an approach that acknowledged the nation's traditions and "encourage[d] diversity and pluralism in all areas." Because the City lacked a purpose to advance Christianity and provided what the Court described as only an "incidental" benefit to religion, the display did not contravene the establishment clause. The Court also expressed concern that a holding to the contrary would expose to challenge a host of other official and unofficial acknowledgements of the nation's religious heritage.

The majority opinion's lack of a clear analytical standard or limiting principle to government uses of religious symbolism led Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to write a concurring opinion to explain when permissible government uses of religion crosses over into impermissible advancements of religion. Justice O'Connor urged that the appropriate constitutional inquiry should be on whether the government's action has the purpose or effect of conveying a message of either endorsement or disapproval of religion. Subsequently called the "endorsement test," the inquiry asks whether a reasonable observer, later modified to be a reasonable nonadherent familiar with the history of the challenged practice, would perceive the government action as communicating a message of official approval or disapproval of religion. The constitutional concern, according to Justice O'Connor, is to ensure that government actions do not appear to "make religion relevant, in reality or public perception, to [one's] status in the political community." Because of the mix of secular and religious objects and the overall context of the holiday display, Justice O'Connor indicated that a reasonable observer would not likely perceive the Pawtucket creche as an endorsement of religion.

Justice O'Connor's concurrence was clearly the superior opinion, and the Court applied her endorsement test in subsequent establishment clause challenges to public religious displays. In Allegheny County v. ACLU (1989), a Court plurality used the endorsement test to strike down the private display of a singular creche in a county courthouse but to uphold a larger holiday display in a government building involving a menorah, a Christmas tree, and other holiday decorations. In Capitol Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette (1995), involving a display of a Ku Klux Klan cross on the public grounds of the Ohio state capitol, a Court plurality argued that the endorsement test should never apply to privately owned religious displays, but Justice O'Connor commanded a majority by insisting that establishment clause may be violated through official endorsements of private religious expression. The endorsement test has found less application outside the religious display context, although the High Court has used it in controversies involving public school-sponsored religious activities (see Wallace v. Jaffree [1985]; Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe [2000]). Justice O'Connor has urged its use in other establishment clause contexts, such as with challenges to government funding of religious institutions, but she has been unable to command a majority for its application in most other establishment clause areas. The endorsement test has been most influential with lower courts, however, with judges commonly employing an endorsement analysis, often in tandem with other analytical approaches, in many establishment clause cases that are never reviewed by the Supreme Court.

STEVEN K. GREEN

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Allegheny County v. ACLU*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
Capitol Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995)
Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)
Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

LYNG v. NORTHWEST INDIAN CEMETERY PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION, 485 U.S. 439 (1988)

How does the constitution resolve a conflict between the government's property rights and the right of groups to engage in religious practices on lands they consider sacred? The Supreme Court answered that question in favor of the government's property rights in Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association when it ruled that the free exercise clause of the First Amendment did not prohibit the federal government from permitting road construction and logging activities on federal lands, even though the activities would have a devastating impact on the traditional religious practices of several Native American tribes.

The case arose when the U.S. Forest Service proposed to build a road through national forest land in California. Aware that the area had historically been used for various religious ceremonies by the Yurok, Karok, and Tolowa Indians, the Forest Service commissioned a study. The study concluded that use of the area was "an integral and indispensable part" of the tribal members' religious practices, that the tribal members' religious use of the area was "dependent upon . . . privacy, silence and an undisturbed setting," and that, consequently, the construction of the road would cause "serious and irreparable damage" to the tribal members' "belief systems and lifeway." The report, therefore, recommended that the road not be built. Although it made efforts to keep the route as far as possible from sites used for specific spiritual activities, the Forest Service rejected the recommendation and decided to proceed with the road and to permit logging activities in the area. The Forest Service's decision was challenged on various grounds by various groups, including several members of the affected tribes.

Focusing primarily on the Free Exercise challenge, the U.S. Supreme Court, by a five-to-three vote, rejected the tribal members' claims. The Court reasoned that even though the tribal members' religious beliefs were sincere and even though the government's proposed action would have "severe adverse affects" on their religious practices, the free exercise clause did not require the government to demonstrate a "compelling need" to justify its proposed actions (something the Court had required in other free exercise cases, such as Sherbert v. Verner), because those actions had "no tendency to coerce [tribal members] into acting contrary to their religious beliefs." Instead, the Court concluded, the tribal members were attempting to dictate how the government structured "its own internal affairs," something the free exercise did not require, as Bowen v. Roy made clear. In that regard, the Court found it significant that the lands in question were owned by the United States, rather than the Tribes, noting that a ruling in favor of the tribal members would in essence grant them "de facto beneficial ownership of some rather spacious tracts of public property." Thus, the Court concluded, even if the proposed actions would "virtually destroy the Indians' ability to practice their religion," the tribal members' were not entitled to relief, because the constitution afforded them no right to "divest the Government of its right to use what is, after all, its land." The Court also rejected the tribal members' claims that the proposed actions violated the American Indian Religious Freedom Act (AIRFA), concluding that AIRFA created no judicially enforceable individual rights.

The Court's ruling in Lyng weakened the protection afforded religious practices (as opposed to beliefs) in several respects. First, it narrowed the scope of cases to which the compelling interest test applied, foreshadowing the almost wholesale abandonment of that test in religious practices cases a few years later in Employment Division of Oregon v. Smith. Second, the ruling severely limited the constitutional protection afforded sacred sites by linking that protection to ownership rights. This portion of the ruling is especially harmful to Native American religions, because Native Americans are more likely to consider lands sacred, their sacred sites are mostly within U.S. territory, and they have been dispossessed of so much of their property over the past three centuries. The ruling also adversely affected Native American religious practices by rendering largely meaningless the provisions of AIRFA, which many had hoped would provide protection for the unique aspects of Native American religions. Thus, although Lyng had some impact on the development of the law for all religious groups, it was especially devastating for Native American religions. The Court's ruling demonstrates the difficulties Native Americans have had in using the U.S. judicial system to protect their religious practices. Interestingly, the proposed road was never constructed (although some timber was removed) because Congress subsequently added the area to the national wilderness system.

KEVIN J. WORTHEN

References and Further Reading

- Brown, Brian Edward. Religion, Law, and the Land: Native Americans and the Judicial Interpretation of Sacred Land. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1999, pp. 119–170.
- Falk, Donald. Lyng v. Northwest Cemetery Protective Association: Bulldozing First Amendment Protection of Indian Sacred Lands, Ecology Law Quarterly 16 (1989): 2:515–570.

Nowak, John E., and Ronald Rotunda. Constitutional Law. St. Paul, MN: West, 2000, pp. 1373–1403.

Worthen, Kevin J. Protecting Sacred Sites of Indigenous Peoples in U.S. Courts: Reconciling Native American Religion and the Right to Exclude, St. Thomas Law Review 13 (2000): 1:239–258.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Employment Division of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)

Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)

Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693 (1986)

See also Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693 (1986); Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Native Americans and Religious Liberty; Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)

LYNUMN v. ILLINOIS, 372 U.S. 528 (1963)

Beatrice Lynumn was a tenant in an apartment building known to James Zeno. Zeno, a twice-convicted felon, had been caught by Cook County police officers with narcotics in his possession. To better his situation, Zeno agreed to “finger” another person who dealt drugs. Lynumn was called and offered a payment of money owed to her by Zeno. After Zeno entered the building and returned with a small amount of marijuana, the police officers entered the building and searched the Lynumn’s apartment finding drugs. On being arrested, Lynumn, who was unfamiliar with criminal procedure, denied giving Zeno anything. But under pressure from the officers and Zeno and threatened with the possible loss of her children, Lynumn confessed that she gave the marijuana to Zeno. Lynumn was convicted and sentenced to ten years. Her conviction was upheld by the Illinois Supreme Court.

The U.S. Supreme Court’s opinion reversed the lower courts. The Court stated that Lynumn’s confession was not “voluntary,” as required by the Fifth Amendment, because of the totality of the circumstances. Lynumn was surrounded by three officers and a convicted felon, unfamiliar with criminal procedures, and threatened with the loss of her children. This rendered her confession involuntary and thus inadmissible. A coerced confession obtained by a promise the suspect will not lose custody of her children and will keep her welfare benefits was not voluntary.

MARTHÉ L. MCCOY

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Miranda Warning

M

MABRY v. JOHNSON, 467 U.S. 352 (1984)

James Mabry of Arkansas was convicted of burglary, assault, and murder. The Supreme Court set aside the murder charge, and plea bargain negotiations ensued. The prosecuting attorney offered a reduced charge of accessory to murder, a sentence recommendation of twenty-one years served concurrently with existing sentences. Mabry's counsel informed him of the offer, which he accepted. When the prosecutor was informed of Mabry's acceptance, he stated the plea bargain offer was an error and withdrew it, instead offering a sentence recommendation of a consecutive sentence of twenty-one years. This offer was rejected. A mistrial was declared and Mabry eventually accepted the second offer.

Mabry filed a writ of habeas corpus, arguing that the prosecutor could not withdraw the first plea offer without violating the prohibition on double jeopardy. The court dismissed the case. The court of appeals reversed, holding that the prosecution's withdrawal of the initial plea after Mabry had accepted it was unfair. The Supreme Court upheld the court of appeals, holding that Mabry was fully aware of the consequence upon pleading guilty and that requiring Mabry to live with the consequences after the mistrial was unjust.

PAMN M. MADARIETA

See also Guilty Plea; Plea Bargaining

MACKINNON, CATHARINE (1946–)

Catharine MacKinnon, along with feminists such as Andrea Dworkin, emerged in the late 1970s and the early 1980s as one of the staunchest feminist advocates for the censorship of pornography. With Dworkin, she authored an antipornography ordinance adopted by Minneapolis and Indianapolis before a court of appeals struck down the Indianapolis ordinance. According to MacKinnon in her 1997 book, In Harm's Way (coauthored with Dworkin), although pornography leads to pervasive violations of women and children in private life, it often remains unacceptable to publicly criticize it. She argues that pornography has stature as a public, available, and effectively legal entity, but its damaging effects are denied as nonexistent.

In 1983, the city of Minneapolis, Minnesota, employed MacKinnon and Dworkin to construct a law citing pornography as a human rights violation. In the ordinance, the two women defined pornography as the sexually explicit subordination of women, either graphically or in words. Pornography, under their law, is the practice of sexual discrimination, thus making it a violation of civil rights. The ordinance formulated pornography's harms as human rights deprivations, thus arguing for its treatment as a human rights violation. MacKinnon emphasized that in order for pornography to be made, pornographic acts had to be done to someone. Potentially, if even one person is victimized in the process of making pornography because of his or her sex, then as a member of a sex-defined group, that person is discriminated against on the basis of his or her sex. MacKinnon, along with Dworkin, opposes pornography for what they state is the harm it does to those coerced into making it, those forced to consume it, and those assaulted or physically harmed because of it.

MacKinnon, like much of the conservative right wing, argues for the censorship of pornography. However, she has stated that unlike the right wing's approach, which focuses heavily on issues of morality, her approach, which she calls the civil rights approach to pornography, was created to permit those injured by pornography access to the courts in order to prove its harm. Through their antipornography ordinance, MacKinnon and Dworkin asserted that, for the first time, a law articulated how pornography used and affected women. They argued that the First Amendment cannot protect pornography because if it did, it would be protecting human exploitation. Under such a definition, pornography is thus sexual exploitation that produces sexual abuse and sexual discrimination and falls outside First Amendment protection because the amendment should not protect those with power against the claims of those seeking equality. The Minneapolis ordinance thus constructed pornography as a form of group libel that should be restricted to protect the reputation and image of women.

For the first time, individuals deemed radical feminists—such as Andrea Dworkin and Catharine MacKinnon—led the call for censorship. Unlike for conservatives, for antipornography feminists pornography had little to do with sex and everything to do with power. MacKinnon and other procensorship feminists focused on what they believed to be pornography's effect on women rather than on the morality and virtue of women argued by antipornography conservatives. Thus, according to MacKinnon, pornography reflects and reinforces the subordination of women to male sexuality and power.

The concept of equality is key to understanding MacKinnon's interpretation of pornography. Pornography, she contends, dehumanizes women as a group through the use of demeaning depictions, thus socially constructing women subjectively in a way that makes them objects of male pleasure and power with no autonomy. According to MacKinnon and Dworkin, pornography expresses the underlying violent reality of male power. Pornography exemplifies a violent, male sexuality that is the most important factor in causing the subordination of women as a group. MacKinnon maintains that pornography is harmful in itself because it may trigger specific sexual violence—direct harm, in other words—and because it constitutes an ideological tool of male domination that generates and reinforces subordination of and discrimination against women in broader, systematic ways. In this view, pornography actively subordinates women by creating a sexual dynamic that puts down, suppresses, and ultimately brutalizes women while purporting to be what sex is.

MacKinnon argues that what pornography does, it does in the real world and not in the mind. Because pornography is used as sex, it is thereby sex. By this definition, pornography does not simply express or interpret experience. It substitutes for the experience. Thus invoking all feminists and ignoring feminists against the censorship of pornography, such as American Civil Liberties Union president Nadine Strossen, MacKinnon claims that pornography “in the feminist view” is a form of forced sex, a practice of sexual politics, and an institution of gender inequality. MacKinnon and Dworkin viewed their legislation as a way to empower women by giving them the option of bringing a civil suit against those whose involvement with pornography caused harm to women. It intended to give women a choice to confront pornography directly and to initiate civil suits against those who cause harm by trafficking in pornography, coercing individuals into pornography, forcing pornography on people, or assaulting people in a way directly caused by specific porn.

Yet, only alleged victims could legally initiate lawsuits, and they would have to prove that the challenged materials actually subordinated women in their making or their use. For MacKinnon and Dworkin, pornography is not an idea but sexual reality, not only discriminating against women but also institutionalizing the inferiority and subordination of one group (women) to another (men). According to MacKinnon, men have sex with their image of a woman. When pornography portrays violence, sexual arousal becomes conditioned to violence and internal prohibitions against acting upon such violent fantasies lessen.

MacKinnon and Dworkin's antipornography ordinance passed in Minneapolis, Minnesota, and Indianapolis, Indiana. The passage of the law in Indianapolis became the test case for the use of the civil liberties argument to limit or to prohibit pornography. The ordinance defined pornography as a discriminatory practice based on sex that denies women equal opportunities in society and, as such, works as a systematic practice of exploitation and subordination based on sex that differentially harms women. MacKinnon and Dworkin based this definition on their belief that pornography is central to creating and maintaining sex as a basis for discrimination.

When tested in district court, the Indianapolis ordinance was struck down as, in actuality, regulating speech instead of the conduct involved in producing pornography. According to the court, speech could be regulated only if Indianapolis proved a compelling interest in reducing sex discrimination by their ordinance. The city failed to prove this interest to the court. Furthermore, the court declared the ordinance vague, overly broad, and an unconstitutional prior restraint of speech. Indianapolis appealed this finding of the lower court to the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. In 1985, upon hearing American Booksellers Association, Inc., et al. v. William H. Hudnut II, 84-3147 (1985), a unanimous federal appeals court upheld the district court's finding, also finding the ordinance to be too broad and in violation of the First Amendment.

MacKinnon argues that protecting pornography means protecting sexual abuse as speech while, simultaneously, pornography and its protection function to deprive women of speech. She contends that there is a deliberate connection between the silence imposed on these women and what she terms the "noise" of pornography that saturates society and "parodies," to use her term, as something deserving constitutional protection. She believes the First Amendment protection of pornography allows those with power to intimidate the powerless into silence and that these elites use the state to wield such power.

In her work Only Words, MacKinnon explores what she sees as the irony of pornographic words and images being termed as "only words" because social inequality is created and enforced through words and images. Such a social hierarchy cannot exist without its meanings and expressions embedded in communication. MacKinnon argues that pornography functions in the real world and not in the mind; what it takes to make pornography and what happens through the use of pornography function in reality. It is not the ideas in pornography that assault women; it is the men who are made, changed, and impelled by pornography that do. MacKinnon posits that pornography contains ideas like any other social practice, but it does not work as a thought. Pornography's place in abuse requires an understanding of it in more active rather than passive terms. Pornography does not express or interpret experience; it substitutes for it and stands in for reality. MacKinnon says that to call pornography representative of sex rather than actual sex alienates reality and gives license to anything and everything portrayed within.

According to MacKinnon, although obscenity is a moral idea, pornography is a concrete, political practice. It is a form of forced sex, a practice of sexual politics, and an institution of gender inequality. According to this view, pornography is much more potent than mere harmless fantasy or an expression of a healthy sexuality. It constructs men's power over women and thereby defines, for men, who women can be. In pornography, women are violated and possessed, and men who consume pornography are invited to view women likewise and are validated in acting upon those assumptions. Pornography is an act of male supremacy and its harm is, in part, the difficulty of seeing male supremacy within it because of the pervasiveness and "success" of the saturation of pornography.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

- Cornell, Drucilla, ed. Feminism and Pornography. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Dworkin, Andrea, and Catharine MacKinnon. Pornography and Civil Rights: A New Day for Women's Equality. Minneapolis, MN: Organizing Against Pornography, 1988.
- , eds. In Harm's Way: The Pornography Civil Rights Hearings. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997.
- Lacombe, Dany. Blue Politics: Pornography and the Law in the Age of Feminism. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1994.
- MacKinnon, Catharine. Feminism Unmodified: Discourses on Life and Law. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1987.
- . Toward a Feminist Theory of the State. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1989.
- . Only Words. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

American Booksellers Association, Inc., et al v. William H. Hudnut II, 84-3147 (1985)

See also American Civil Liberties Union; Dworkin, Andrea; Obscenity; Strossen, Nadine

MADISON, JAMES (1751–1836)

James Madison was the fourth president of the United States, generally acknowledged as "father of the Constitution," and one of the authors of The Federalist. He was important in the passage of the Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom and was the main author of the Bill of Rights.

Madison was born in Port Conway, King George, Virginia, son of James Madison, Sr. and Nelly Conway Madison. He graduated from Princeton (College of New Jersey). A patriot during the Revolution, he became a member of the Virginia Convention of 1776, represented Orange County in the Virginia legislature, 1776–1777 and 1784–1786, served in the governor's council, 1777–1780, and represented Virginia in the Confederation Congress, 1780–1783 and 1786–1788. He attended the Annapolis Convention, the Constitutional Convention of 1787, and the Virginia Ratifying Convention, served in Congress again, in the House of Representatives, 1789–1797, and again in the Virginia legislature, 1799–1800. He married Dolley Payne Todd. He served as secretary of state during the presidency of Thomas Jefferson, 1801–1809, and was president 1809–1817. James and Dolley Madison then moved back to their home, Montpelier, in Virginia. He came out of retirement to attend the Virginia Convention of 1829–1830, and he arranged for the posthumous publication of his book, The Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787.

Religious Freedom

The young Madison's first public contribution was in the area of religious freedom. In the convention that drafted the Virginia Constitution of 1776, he presented a motion, which was adopted, to revise the section in the Virginia Declaration of Rights, the state bill of rights, on religious toleration by adding that "all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion."

On the issue of religious freedom, Madison waged a political battle in the state legislature with the supporters of the popular leader and governor, Patrick Henry. During the Revolution, there was discussion of disestablishing the Anglican Church in Virginia. Henry supported a bill in which the government would give support to all the churches in the state. Madison worked for a separation of church and state. He, and other opponents of Henry's bill, appealed to the Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Quakers, and even some Anglicans in the state. Petitions, with thousands of signatures, were sent to the legislature.

In Madison's remonstrance, a pamphlet entitled "Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments," he argued that neither government nor religion needed the support of the other, and that the connection of the two had only led to tyranny, servility, bigotry, and persecution. He said religious freedom was a natural right that must be protected from government power or from a majority trespassing on the rights of a minority. He concluded that, because of the threat to religious freedom, the act violated Virginia's bill of rights. In 1785, the bill was defeated, and Madison used the occasion to promote a bill on religious freedom that had been drafted earlier by his friend, Jefferson. Madison always remembered the defeat of Henry's bill and the passage of the Virginia Statute of Religious Freedom as major accomplishments of his public career.

Diversity and Pluralism

With the exception of the statute of religious freedom, Madison, like others who became Federalists in the 1780s, was frustrated by policies pursued at the state level and looked for remedies at the federal level. In Vices of the Political System of the United States, he asserted that most of the problems or vices in the system were the result of the states. He believed that minorities suffered from popular leaders and their factions in state governments. Granted, one should remember that the minorities he had in mind included wealthy property owners, merchants, and creditors, but the system he would advocate worked to protect any minority. Madison rejected the view ascribed to Montesquieu that liberty and rights were most secure in a small republic. Madison believed that individual and minority rights could be easily abused by a tyranny of the majority in a small republic.

In Vices, Madison advanced the idea that an extended federal republic would better safeguard liberty and rights. He stated that "[a]ll civilized societies are divided into different interests and factions, as they happen to be creditors or debtors—rich or poor—[farmers], merchants or manufacturers—members of different religious sects—followers of different political leaders—inhabitants of different districts—owners of different kinds of property." In a large society, such as the whole of America, it would be difficult for a common interest to be predominant in a majority. Instead, the variety of interests would check each other.

Madison played an active role in the calling of the Annapolis Convention and the Constitutional Convention of 1787 in Philadelphia. He was the main author of the Virginia Plan, which gave the Philadelphia Convention a plan to use in drafting the Constitution of 1787. He was one of the most active participants in the convention, and was a key player in the ratification process. Along with Alexander Hamilton and John Jay, he contributed essays to The Federalist. Madison's essays emphasized the division and separation of power, checks and balances, and the value of diversity and pluralism in protecting individual and minority rights.

As he had in Vices, in The Federalist essay 10, Madison, the pluralist, again analyzed American society into differing political, religious, and economic interests and advocated the idea of the "extended republic" that the larger the area, more interests would be represented and could check each other. He believed that the best security for religious freedom and civil rights was through the multiplicity of interests and religious sects.

In essays in The Federalist (particularly 10 and 51) and later in The National Gazette (particularly “Government of the United States”), Madison set forth a theory of checks and balances being the best constraint on power. In America, first, government was divided between federal and state. Second, each government was divided into legislative, executive, and judicial branches. Then each legislature was divided into two houses. Madison explained how the interest of the office or the division of government would incline politicians to defend their power and check the expansion of power by another government division.

Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place. It may be a reflection on human nature, that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government. But what is government itself, but the greatest of all reflections on human nature? If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself (The Federalist, essay 51).

Bill of Rights

In the winter and spring of 1788, with ratification uncertain, a compromise was worked out in several state ratifying conventions, including Virginia’s, to address the main weakness of the Constitution, long stressed by its opponents: its lack of a bill of rights. The Constitution would be ratified with the agreement that through the Article V amendment process the first Congress would send out a bill of rights to be ratified by the states. Although he questioned the value of a bill of rights, Madison supported the compromise.

In the Virginia Ratifying Convention, and later in the First Congress, Madison pointed out his reservations about a bill of rights. First, it was not needed because the federal government only had an enumerated grant of powers, described in the Constitution, Article I, Section 8, rather than power in general, and, in America’s federal system, state governments were already in place that could check the federal government. Second, he believed that history and recent experience showed that a bill of rights was only an ineffective paper or “parchment barrier” against power. He concluded from his study of American politics that every state had violated its bill of rights.

They did not protect individuals or minorities against governments that were the instruments of the power of majorities. Madison noted, for example, that religious freedom in America came from the multiplicity of religious sects, not from being protected by state bills of rights, and it would not be guaranteed by a bill of rights being added to the Constitution. If a majority sought to persecute a minority, he warned, a bill of rights would be a poor protection.

In the First Congress, however, believing that the compromise agreed to in state ratifying conventions should be carried out, Madison drew up and presented a list of amendments. He considered the rights in what became the First Amendment to be the most important, calling them the “essential rights.” He also believed it was essential that these rights should not be violated by the states as well as by the federal government. He still hoped the Constitution could check the “vices” of the states. Madison’s proposal regarding the states failed, however. The proposed amendments would only apply to the federal government. After a process of revision by both houses, ten amendments, generally known as the Bill of Rights, were sent out and ratified by the states.

Freedom of Speech: The Virginia Resolutions of 1798

While serving in the House of Representatives during the 1790s, Madison founded the Republican Party and, in the National Gazette, explained the need for political parties as an extension of checks and balances. Parties could check each other so that government would not favor one interest or combination of interests at the expense of another.

Because of continuous criticism by the Republicans, during the quasiwar with France, President John Adams and the Federalist majority in Congress passed the Alien and Sedition Acts. The Sedition Act made criticism of government officials a crime. (Federalists said in their defense that the act was a modification of common-law libel and slander, but this did not resolve the problem because there was no federal common law.) Republicans and lawyers for defendants being tried under the Sedition Act argued that it violated the freedom of speech protected by the First Amendment, but Federalist federal judges refused to engage in judicial review. Republicans were afraid that the act would hamper their ability to defeat Federalist candidates in upcoming elections.

Madison saw that another application of checks and balances was needed, this time to check a wrongful act by the federal government. Using the Virginia and Kentucky legislatures, where they had strong majorities, Republicans passed the Kentucky and Virginia Resolves, which declared that the Alien and Sedition Acts were unconstitutional. According to the Virginia resolutions, written by Madison, the Sedition Act exercises “a power not delegated by the constitution, but on the contrary expressly and positively forbidden by [the First Amendment] . . . a power which more than any other ought to produce universal alarm, because it is leveled against that right of freely examining public characters and measures, and of free communication among the people thereon, which has ever been justly deemed, the only effectual guardian of every other right.”

After retiring from Congress and drafting the Virginia Resolves, Madison served again as a member of the Virginia legislature and drafted the Virginia Report, which explained the state’s action. Madison’s Virginia resolutions and report have been important for advancing (1) the doctrine of interposition, the right of a state to give an opinion on the constitutionality of an act of the federal government; (2) the compact theory that the federal government and the states derive their power from the people of the states, who, in state conventions, ratified the Constitution; and (3) the interpretation of the First Amendment that the federal government is prohibited from prior constraint of publication, such as censoring the press, and subsequent constraint of publication, such as punishing an author or press for publications. Madison declared that the federal government had no authority to protect itself by restraining negative criticism and abuse from speech and the press.

In the late 1790s, the Federalists were popular and, as a result, no great opposition arose through America to the Alien and Sedition Acts. No broad support arose for the Kentucky and Virginia Resolves as well. The Sedition Act demonstrated the weakness of “parchment barriers.” Madison knew that against a tyranny of the majority a bill of rights was useless. Only through an appeal to political interests could the Republicans prevail over the Federalists, which they did in the election of 1800.

Wartime President Upholding the First Amendment

Madison did not believe that the actions of the Federalists demonstrated that the grant of power to the federal government was too extensive. He did not join other Republicans in calling for constitutional amendments to weaken the government structure.

Rather, he thought that the Federalists had badly administered the federal government, and the election of 1800 gave the Republicans the opportunity to run it correctly.

After eight years of service as Jefferson’s secretary of state, Madison followed as president. As president, he vetoed several measures by Congress, including an act incorporating an Episcopal church in the District of Columbia and another reserving land for a Baptist church. In his veto messages he made it clear that, if an act by the United States supported a “religious society” in any way, he considered it in violation of the First Amendment establishment clause. He had begun his political career in Virginia working for the separation of church and state and was still serving the cause as president. Of course, if he had had his way, the First Amendment would have applied to the states as well as to the federal government.

Madison’s presidency was dominated by foreign affairs, specifically the War of 1812. He was proud that he showed that a wartime president need not violate the Constitution by expanding executive powers or compromising First Amendment rights. He did not restrict the press despite criticism, opposition to the war effort, and calls for the secession of New England states. This was in great contrast to the Federalist Sedition Act during the quasiwar. Madison considered this to be one of the great precedents he had set. Of course, future presidents would not follow his example and Americans have not remembered him as he had hoped. Instead of being seen as an exemplary model of a constitutional president during war, he has been seen as weak.

Madison made significant contributions to civil liberties, but he can be accused of inconsistency or hypocrisy. He was part of the slave-owning Virginia elite. Holding a pessimistic view of humanity, he was no champion of democracy or social reform. Indeed, he was a reluctant supporter of the Bill of Rights. As secretary of state and president, he was an imperialistic expansionist; as president, he administered a process of defeating the Indians and acquiring land from them. He did continuously support, however, the separation of church and state. He saw how social diversity, or the multiplicity of interests and religious sects represented in a governmental structure with checks and balances, could protect the civil liberties of individuals and minorities from government tyranny or the tyranny of the majority.

F. THORNTON MILLER

References and Further Reading

Banning, Lance. The Sacred Fire of Liberty: James Madison and the Founding of the Federal Republic. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1995.

- Brant, Irving. Life of James Madison. 6 vols. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1941–1961.
- Hamilton, Alexander, John Jay, and James Madison. The Federalist Papers (1787). <http://lcweb2.loc.gov/const/fed/fedpapers.html>, 1996.
- Ketcham, Ralph. James Madison, A Biography. New York: Macmillan, 1971.
- Koch, Adrienne. Jefferson and Madison: The Great Collaboration. New York: Knopf, 1950.
- Madison, James. “Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments.” 1785. http://religiousfreedom.lib.virginia.edu/sacred/madison_m&r_1785.html, 2001.
- . Vices of the Political System of the United States. 1787. <http://press-pubs.uchicago.edu/founders/documents/v1ch5s16.html>, 1987.
- . The Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787. <http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/debates/debcont.html>, 1996.
- Matthews, Richard K. If Men Were Angels: James Madison and the Heartless Empire of Reason. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994.
- McCoy, Drew R. The Last of the Fathers: James Madison and the Republican Legacy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Meyers, Marvin, ed. The Mind of the Founder: Sources of the Political Thought of James Madison. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1973.
- Miller, William Lee. The Business of May Next: James Madison and the Founding. Charlottesville, VA: University Press of Virginia, 1992.
- Rakove, Jack N. James Madison and the Creation of the American Republic. New York: Harper Collins, 1990.
- Rutland, Robert A. James Madison: the Founding Father. New York: Macmillan, 1987.
- . The Presidency of James Madison. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1990.
- Stagg, J. C. Mr. Madison's War: Politics, Diplomacy, and Warfare in the Early American Republic. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1983.
- Wills, Garry. James Madison. New York: Times Books/Henry Holt and Co., 2002.

See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Baptists in Early America; Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. 243 (1833); Bill of Rights: Structure; Constitutional Convention of 1787; Constitution of 1787; Disestablishment of State Churches in the Late Eighteenth Century and Early Nineteenth Century; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Hamilton, Alexander; Jefferson, Thomas; Kentucky and Virginia Resolves; Madison's Remonstrance (1785); Montesquieu; Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776)

MADISON'S REMONSTRANCE (1785)

The “Memorial and Remonstrance” was essentially a petition to gather signatures indicating popular opposition to a bill that would have provided state tax monies for clergy salaries, and its success led directly to the enactment of the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom.

From the time he was elected to the Virginia House of Burgesses in 1776, James Madison (1751–1836) opposed the idea of an established church and was part of the assembly that disestablished the Anglican Church that same year. While the Assembly debated George Mason's proposal for a state Declaration of Rights, Madison argued that Mason's call for religious toleration did not go far enough; religious liberty constituted a natural and inalienable right, immune to any governmental constraints. While he was able to change the wording of part of Mason's proposal, Madison failed to win over the assembly to his views of prohibiting religious establishments and deleting specific references to Christianity, in order to protect non-Christians. He backed Jefferson's Statute for Religious Freedom when it was first proposed in 1779 and continued to believe that only a complete break between church and state would secure a true liberty of conscience.

In 1784, Madison's rival, Patrick Henry, proposed a tax to support the clergy, who were impoverished because of the Revolution. The bill would provide support to ministers of all Christian faiths, and individual Virginians could declare themselves as non-Christians in order to be exempt from the tax. Groups that had previously opposed establishment—such as the Quakers, Baptists, Mennonites, and Presbyterians—now faltered as it seemed that they too would benefit from Henry's proposed tax. Madison brilliantly fought the tax scheme. First, he supported Henry for governor, thus removing his powerful oratory from the legislative debate. More importantly, in May 1785, at the suggestion of George Mason and others, he wrote and anonymously circulated a “Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessment.” The “Memorial” gathered thousands of signatures and led to other groups backing similar petitions to the Assembly.

Madison offered fifteen objections to the Henry tax, starting with the assertion that it violated the freedom of conscience guaranteed under Virginia's Declaration of Rights. Madison anticipated arguments he would later explicate more fully in Federalist No. 10 regarding minority rights. Such a tax, he declared, would “overleap the great Barrier which defends the rights of the people,” and even if a majority of the state supported establishment (which Madison defined as any governmental support of organized religion), the legislature lacked the authority to enact such a measure.

The petition recalled to the citizens the recent history of such taxes: when they were a colony, the government, at the behest of the Anglican Church, had treated Protestant dissenters, Catholics, and non-Christians harshly. The Henry bill posed the danger that what had been detested under George III might arise again: "Who does not see that the same authority which can establish Christianity, in exclusion of all other Religions, may establish with the same ease any particular sect of Christians?"

The "Memorial" attacked establishment on other grounds, not least of which was Madison's contention that establishment threatened the prospects of the new, republican society then being built in the independent United States. Establishment had been a product of the Old World, where it had bred centuries of religious bigotry, persecution, and even warfare. Roger Williams had supported separation in order to keep religion free from the taint of the secular; Madison and his allies, especially Jefferson, wanted a wall of separation to keep the secular state free from the biases of religion. Establishing religion—even supporting multiple establishments, as Henry proposed—would "enervate the laws in general, and slacken the bands of Society."

In appealing to those dissenting sects that had at one time opposed the Anglican establishment, he warned that a coercive tax would not be to the advantage of Christianity. He pointed out the history of religious warfare in Europe, in which the intrusion of the state to enforce the views of one group had inevitably sapped the moral force of all religion. Instead of men being governed by true moral and religious values, they fell prey to "superstition, bigotry, and persecution." Interestingly, Madison also made a very practical argument in noting that religious tolerance in the New World had been one of the magnets that drew people across the Atlantic. Do away with it, he warned, and Virginia would neither attract new settlers nor retard the emigration from the state that was at the time a great concern of the Assembly.

By the fall of 1785, the "Memorial" and its related petitions had amassed over ten thousand signatures in opposition to Henry's proposed assessment bill. When the Assembly next met, Henry had gone to the governor's mansion, and a narrow majority of the Assembly, aware of the strong opposition to his bill, defeated it when it came up for a vote. Buoyed by the victory, Madison reintroduced Thomas Jefferson's Statute for Religious Freedom, guided it through both houses of the Assembly, and defeated efforts to exclude non-Christians from its protections. The statute, passed in 1786, would serve as a model when Madison, then a member of Congress, drafted the religion clauses of the First Amendment in 1789.

The "Memorial and Remonstrance" reflected not only Madison's political skill. By delaying Henry's popular assessment proposal until he could take the issue to the people (as he would three years later as the chief coauthor of the Federalist), he showed how public sentiment could be used to affect policymaking in a republican society. But the "Memorial" also spoke for Madison's deeply held convictions about religious liberty. Throughout his adult life he opposed establishment and use of the state in any way to further religion. He fought for the Statute of Religious Freedom and the First Amendment in order to secure "the rights of Conscience in the fullest latitude" and, as president from 1809 to 1817, consistently opposed even the smallest efforts to use the resources of government in aid of religion.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Alley, Robert S., ed. James Madison on Religious Liberty. Buffalo: Prometheus Books, 1985.
 Curry, Thomas J. The First Freedoms: Church and State in America to the Passage of the First Amendment. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
 Rutland, Robert Allen. James Madison, the Founding Father. New York: Macmillan, 1987.

MADSEN v. WOMEN'S HEALTH CENTER, 512 U.S. 753 (1994)

In response to virulent protests at an abortion clinic, a Florida state court judge issued an injunction prohibiting protesters from blocking or interfering with public access to the clinic and from physically abusing those who entered or left the clinic. Six months later the judge broadened the injunction as a result of repeated violations by protesters of the earlier court order. The protesters appealed to the Florida Supreme Court and then to the U.S. Supreme Court on the grounds that the injunction violated their freedom of speech under the First Amendment.

The Court split on the issues, upholding some parts of the injunction and overturning others. In a six-to-three decision Chief Justice William Rehnquist's majority opinion held that the injunction was content neutral. That is, it did not prohibit speech because the content of that speech was opposed to abortion; it prohibited speech because it intruded upon the rights of those entering and leaving the clinic. Normally a content-neutral regulation limiting speech would be judged on the basis of whether there was a significant governmental interest in infringing upon the speech, that the means were narrowly tailored, and that the regulation left open ample alternative channels of communication. Because this regulation was an injunction and not a legislative enactment, five of the justices in the majority concluded that a more stringent standard should apply: the governmental end must be significant and the means could burden no more speech than necessary.

Using this standard, the majority concluded that the state's ends were significant (protect the rights of women to seek medical care, ensure public safety and order, promote the free flow of traffic on streets and sidewalks, protect private property, protect medical privacy). In evaluating the means, the majority upheld parts of the injunction establishing a 36-foot buffer zone around the clinic in which protesters could not congregate and a restriction on noise levels (such as bullhorns). However, the majority declared unconstitutional a ban on picket signs or other observable images such as pictures of aborted fetuses, a ban on protesters approaching anyone within 300 feet of the clinic, and a ban on picketing or demonstrating within 300 feet of the residences of clinic staff.

Concurring in part and dissenting in part, Justice John Paul Stevens urged that a more lenient standard be applied to injunctions than legislation or ordinances in that such injunctions are applied only to those who have engaged in illegal activity and not, as in the case of general legislation, to everyone.

Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by justices Clarence Thomas and Anthony Kennedy, also concurred in part and dissented in part. Justice Scalia urged the Court to subject injunctions to even stricter scrutiny than that in the majority opinion. He noted that injunctions are imposed by a single individual and not by a legislative body, so the opportunity for abuse was greater. Consequently, the justice would require strict scrutiny of injunctions, meaning that the ends must be compelling and the means to achieve them necessary and narrowly tailored. Under that standard, the three-justice minority would have declared all of the provisions unconstitutional.

The precedent established in this case is used to balance the rights of those seeking the services of abortion clinics and the rights of those seeking to protest, including the case of Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997).

MICHAEL W. BOWERS

References and Further Reading

Lively, Donald E. et al. First Amendment Law: Cases, Comparative Perspectives, and Dialogues. Cincinnati, OH: Anderson, 2003, pp. 343–358.
Sullivan, Kathleen M., and Gerald Gunther. Constitutional Law, 14th ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2001, pp. 1215–1218.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997)

See also Anti-Abortion Protest and Freedom of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988); O'Brien Content-Neutral Free Speech Test

MAGNA CARTA

Magna Carta, or the Great Charter of King John, was sealed on June 15, 1215. Great not for its size but for its significance, the document is extraordinary in several respects. Resulting from a rebellion of the aristocracy against John for having purportedly abused his proper authority, the Magna Carta established individual liberties relative to the state; it is the closest equivalent to a written constitution the British have; and it became the constitutional foundation for modern states throughout the world. The American Declaration of Independence and Bill of Rights are rooted in the Magna Carta.

Historical Background

There were three main sources of social and political tension in thirteenth-century England. A rapidly expanding economy unleashed ambition among nobles who made increasing demands upon a strong and self-serving Angevin monarchy. Embers of discontent brought forth fires of rebellion. The overwhelming power of the monarchy brought forth constitutional limitations on that power. At the same time, tensions had mounted between the papacy and the Crown. William, duke of Normandy, had appealed for papal authorization to invade England in 1066, which was granted on the promise of separation of church courts from secular courts. Those two courts operated under two separate laws (canon and common) and procedures, which gave rise to competition over jurisdiction and eventual dispute between church and king.

Finally, internal and external trade gave birth to a number of mercantile towns whose inhabitants enjoyed theretofore unknown liberties and political influence that threatened the feudal landholding order prevalent throughout the country. Although King John had recently granted these towns special privileges, his measures were not enough to appease the merchants and their armies. Indeed, while John managed to alienate various elements within England, including the church and merchants of London, it was the baronial rebellion of 1215 that ultimately forced him to grant the concessions and “liberties” contained within the Magna Carta. Importantly, through all of this tumult, civil rights and representative government were unborn notions. No part of Magna Carta, which essentially codified the laws regulating England's feudal system, was intended for the vast majority of people who, as peasants, were considered property of the tiny aristocracy on whose land they lived and worked.

The Document

On August 5, 1100, Henry I approved the "Coronation Charter," which was meant to resolve land grievances of the nobility against his recently deceased brother William II. That charter, sometimes called the blueprint for Magna Carta, promised to "abolish all the evil customs by which the kingdom of England has been unjustly oppressed," spelling out fourteen such offenses for the important bishops, barons, and "faithful vassals" of England. Magna Carta followed a similar format. King John addressed himself to "the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons . . . and faithful subjects." and articulated fully sixty-three concessions. The first article stipulated that "the English church shall be free, and shall have its rights undiminished and its liberties unimpaired . . . We have also granted to all free men of our kingdom, for ourselves and our heirs for ever, all the liberties written below."

The document went on to articulate fully sixty-three concessions by the Crown. None of the four remaining copies of this document are divided into separate articles, though most modern translations are presented with an introductory greeting to the relevant notables and sixty-three subsequent paragraphs. The most important clauses of the document are those declaring: "No freeman shall be arrested or imprisoned . . . except by the lawful judgment of his peers and by the law of the land," and "to none will we sell, to none will we refuse or delay right or justice." It is here that we find the beginnings of "due process" of law.

The Aftermath

It soon became evident that King John had no intention of honoring the Magna Carta. The aristocracy rebelled yet again, inviting the French to their aid and thus provoking civil war. Upon John's death in October of 1216, advisers to his nine-year-old son persuaded the nobility to accept Henry III rather than a Frenchman as king, a task achieved by reissuing a revised Magna Carta. Indeed, the document was revised at least three times: in 1216 following John's death, again in 1217, and definitively in 1225. All of the reissues dropped several of the original articles.

In particular, articles ten and eleven (interest payments on debts to Jews), twelve and fourteen (money paid by vassals in lieu of military service), fifty (removal of certain foreigners from office), fifty-six through fifty-nine (pertaining to Welshmen and Scots), and portions of fifty-five through sixty-one (the enforcement powers of a twenty-five person baronial council) were all dropped. Articles forty-four, forty-seven, and forty-eight, pertaining to "all evil customs connected with forests and warrens," were dropped but later restored in the sixteen articles of the 1217 "Charter of the Forest" and thereafter always issued in conjunction with the Magna Carta. At subsequent times of tension between the king and his realm, the document was brought forth as a reminder that the king was not above the law. This was necessary, in 1297, when Henry III's son Edward I suffered protests for financial abuse.

The "Myth"

Magna Carta has taken on mythical status as the font of individual liberty, the British Parliament, and common law. Just what rights and liberties were contained within Magna Carta has been debated ever since its issuance. Certainly the Great Charter is regarded as having not only limited the power of the Crown while ensuring individual rights and liberties, but, in the words of Sir Edward Coke, Magna Carta was "declaratory of the principal grounds of the fundamental laws of England." Indeed, centuries of reference to the Magna Carta have established it as England's higher law, despite its original more limited purpose as a safeguard of feudal order and "liberties" for the privileged classes.

The extent to which Magna Carta sowed the seeds of England's modern Parliament, the attempt "to obtain the common counsel of the kingdom," is also contested. The document's longest article, by far, was number sixty-one, stating that "the barons shall choose any twenty-five barons of the kingdom they wish, who must with all their might observe, hold and cause to be observed, the peace and liberties which we [the king] have granted and confirmed to them by this present charter." Parliament evolved gradually over the following years; grounding that development in the Magna Carta becomes difficult upon realizing that article sixty-one was struck from the revised 1216 document and all subsequent versions. Furthermore, with the Settlement of 1689 and the conclusion of the Glorious Revolution, supreme power was transferred from Crown to Parliament in a way that was antithetical to the doctrine of fundamental law. Yet, in spite of its critics, the tradition of Magna Carta survives.

R. OWEN WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

- Drew, Katherine Fischer. Magna Carta. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2004.
 Pallister, Anne. Magna Carta, the Heritage of Liberty. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1971.
 Turner, Ralph V. Magna Carta Through the Ages. London: Pearson, 2003.

MAHER v. ROE, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)

Under its Medicaid program, Connecticut paid the medical expenses associated with pregnancy and childbirth, but refused to pay for any abortions except first trimester abortions certified by a physician as medically necessary. Two indigent pregnant women otherwise eligible for Medicaid assistance but who were unable to obtain the required physician's certificate, challenged the Connecticut regulation as a denial of equal protection and due process.

In an opinion written by Justice Powell, the six-to-three Court concluded that neither equal protection nor due process was offended. Connecticut had no duty to subsidize medical expenses for anybody and could choose to subsidize childbirth rather than abortion. The plaintiffs' indigent condition was not a suspect classification, so the Connecticut regulation was presumptively valid, and it was rationally related to the legitimate governmental objective of funding childbirth expenses of indigent women. Nor did Connecticut's regulation infringe upon the constitutional fundamental abortion right. Said the Court:

The Connecticut regulation places no obstacles . . . in the pregnant woman's path to an abortion. An indigent woman who desires an abortion suffers no disadvantage as a consequence of Connecticut's decision to fund childbirth; she continues as before to be dependent on private sources for the service she desires. The State . . . has imposed no restriction on access to abortions that was not already there. The indigency that may make it difficult—and in some cases, perhaps, impossible—for some women to have abortions is neither created nor in any way affected by the Connecticut regulation.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Marshall and Blackmun, dissented. They argued that the practical effect of Connecticut's regulations was to "coerce indigent pregnant women to bear children they would not otherwise choose to have" and that Connecticut had thereby "inhibited their fundamental right to make that choice free from state interference."

Maier was followed three years later by Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), in which the Court upheld a federal law, the Hyde Amendment, that forbade the use of federal Medicaid funds to pay for abortion except when necessary to save the pregnant woman's life or the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest. In Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989), decided in 1989, the Court used much the same reasoning as in Maier and Harris to uphold a Missouri law that prohibited the use of public employees and facilities to perform or assist abortions that were not necessary to save the pregnant woman's life. In Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991), the Court extended Maier and Harris to uphold a federal rule that forbade recipients of federal family planning funds to counsel people about abortion. The majority result in each of these cases has been much criticized, and several states have interpreted their state constitutions to require the state, when providing medical financial aid to indigents, to treat abortion and childbirth alike. The analytical problem posed by these cases is one facet of the "unconstitutional conditions" problem. This doctrine holds that governments may not penalize the exercise of a constitutional right but may refrain from subsidizing the exercise of a constitutional right.

CALVIN MASSEY

References and Further Reading

- Epstein, Richard. Bargaining With the State. 1993.
 Kreimer, Seth. Allocational Sanctions: The Problem of Negative Rights in a Positive State, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 132 (1984): 1293.
 Perry, Michael. Why the Supreme Court Was Plainly Wrong in the Hyde Amendment Case: A Brief Comment on Harris v. McRae, Stanford Law Review 32 (1980):1113.
 Sullivan, Kathleen. Unconstitutional Conditions, Harvard Law Review 102 (1989): 1413.
 Westen, Alan. Correspondence, Stanford Law Review 33 (1981): 1187.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Harris v. McRae*, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)
See also Abortion; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Right v. Privilege Distinction; Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991); State Constitution, Privacy Provisions; Unconstitutional Conditions; Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

MALLORY v. UNITED STATES,
354 U.S. 499 (1957)

Federal officers arrested Andrew Mallory on rape charges. After questioning him and obtaining a confession roughly seven hours later, they brought him to a magistrate for arraignment.

In McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943), the Supreme Court ruled that confessions elicited during a period of “unnecessary delay” between arrest and arraignment could be excluded. A few years later, Congress adopted Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, echoing McNabb’s “unnecessary delay” guidelines.

Mallory v. United States reaffirmed the McNabb decision and clarified Rule 5(a). A unanimous Court held that detaining a defendant for several hours in order to extract a confession from him while there was a magistrate “readily accessible” constituted an “unnecessary delay.” Thus, Mallory’s confession was found inadmissible.

Justice Felix Frankfurter, writing for the Court, explained that the purpose of a prompt arraignment is to safeguard individual rights since unwarranted detentions have often led to “intensive interrogation, easily gliding into the evils of the ‘third degree.’” Frankfurter also noted the importance of deterring officers from arresting suspects “at large” and then using an “interrogating process at police headquarters in order to determine whom they should charge before the committing magistrate on “probable cause.”

Since Mallory implicated statutory law rather than constitutional doctrine, Congress was able to pass legislation in 1968 severely weakening what became known as the McNabb–Mallory rule. The Supreme Court nonetheless continued to expand rights of the accused; Mallory v. United States anticipated the more sweeping (and just as controversial) procedural due-process rulings of Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), and Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966).

SARAH ESKREIS–WINKLER

References and Further Reading

Fisher, Louis. American Constitutional Law. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 1990.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
Rule 5(a), Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 327 U.S. 821 (1946)
82 Stat. 210 (1968); 18 U.S.C. §3501(c)(2000)

See also Arraignment and Probable Cause Hearing; Arrest; Due Process; Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964); McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943); Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Rights of the Accused; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background; Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution; Speedy Trial

MANDATORY DEATH SENTENCES UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Mandatory death sentences have been utilized throughout history. At common law, death was imposed for all convicted murderers. Recognizing that the culpability of convicted murderers varied, in 1794 Pennsylvania became the first state to abolish capital punishment for most murders. The state mandated death for only those killings that were “willful, deliberate and premeditated.” Every other state followed Pennsylvania’s lead. Jurors balked, however, at being forced to impose death in cases that were inappropriate for capital punishment. As a result, they engaged in jury nullification by simply refusing to convict the defendant.

In order to address the problem of jury nullification, legislatures granted almost total discretion to the jury in sentencing the defendant. Jurors in California were told, for instance, that the law “commits the whole matter of determining which of the two penalties [death or life imprisonment] shall be fixed to the judgment, conscience, and absolute discretion of the jury.” Capital defendants argued to the Supreme Court that the lack of standards to control jury sentencing discretion was a violation of due process, an argument that the Court rejected.

Just one year after deciding that jury discretion in sentencing was not a violation of due process, the Supreme Court concluded that statutes vesting unguided sentencing discretion in juries and trial judges had become unconstitutional. The Court concluded that as a result of these statutes, the death penalty was being imposed in a discriminatory, wanton, and freakish manner. This decision had the effect of imposing a moratorium on capital punishment in the United States since each state empowered the jury with unfettered discretion in determining whether a defendant should be sentenced to death. As a result of this decision, thirty-five states reformulated their sentencing provisions in an attempt to overcome the objections the Court had articulated. A few states responded by returning to mandatory death sentences.

For instance, North Carolina mandated death for any willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, or any killing that occurred during the commission of rape, robbery, arson, kidnapping, burglary, or other felony. North Carolina also enacted a mandatory death sentence statute for first-degree rape. The Supreme Court held that mandatory death sentences were a marked departure from contemporary standards of decency and as a result they constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The Court rejected the argument that mandatory death sentences eliminated the risk of arbitrary and discriminatory application; it reasoned that jury nullification was certain to occur in the event that death was mandatory, referring to the historical experience. The Court indicated that there was no way that the judiciary could check the arbitrary and discriminatory use of jury nullification. Finally, the Court refused to permit mandatory death sentences because they do not allow for the consideration of mitigating circumstances.

Louisiana responded to Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), by enacting a statute more narrowly defined than the North Carolina statute. The Supreme Court, however, found that Louisiana's narrower definition of capital murder was not "of controlling constitutional significance" and held it to be unconstitutional for the same reasons it rejected the North Carolina statute.

The Supreme Court has refused to permit mandatory death sentences in any context. For instance, in Sumner v. Sherman, while serving a life sentence without possibility of parole for first-degree murder, the defendant was convicted of the capital murder of a fellow inmate. Under Nevada law then in effect, he was automatically sentenced to death. The Court held that the mandatory sentence was unconstitutional, in part, because it did not allow the defendant to present mitigating evidence and the sentencer to consider such evidence.

The Supreme Court's decisions invalidating mandatory death sentences established two important principles. First, as a result of the fundamental respect for humanity underlying the Eighth Amendment, capital defendants are allowed to present evidence of mitigating circumstances and the sentencer is required to listen to that evidence. Thus, a death sentence is invalid if the sentencer was precluded from considering mitigating evidence or refused to consider such evidence. Second, these decisions were based upon the principle that "death is different." Because death is different, the need for reliability in the determination that death is the appropriate punishment is even greater. As a result, the Court has adopted heightened procedural requirements in capital cases.

The greatest challenge for the court has been and will continue to be the elimination of arbitrariness and discrimination in the death penalty process. Its decisions prohibiting mandatory death sentences have been a part of that endeavor. The Court, however, has not succeeded. Before retiring from the Court, Justice Blackmun concluded that "the death penalty remains fraught with arbitrariness, discrimination, caprice and mistake."

KENNETH A. WILLIAMS

Cases and Statutes Cited

Callins v. Collins, 510 U.S. 1141 (1994)

McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183 (1971)

Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment Reversed

MANDATORY MINIMUM SENTENCES

Statutes that define the boundaries of criminal sentences in the United States typically set a minimum and maximum prison term, leaving the sentencing judge to select a sentence within that range in each case. Mandatory minimum sentencing laws set the minimum above zero, at some substantial prison term. Legislatures that pass these laws generally intend to restrict the power of judges to impose lenient sentences.

In state codes, certain serious crimes such as sexual assault and homicide have traditionally carried substantial prison terms as the minimum sentence. However, the volume of cases sentenced under these laws increased greatly when legislatures in the middle of the twentieth century started attaching mandatory minimum terms to narcotics crimes. Among the states, the New York legislature took a leading role in the use of mandatory minimum sentences for narcotics crimes when it enacted the Rockefeller Drug Laws in 1973. Mandatory minimum sentences played a substantial role in the enormous prison population growth in the United States between 1975 and 2005.

Legislators who enact mandatory minimum sentencing laws hope to accomplish several objectives. They want to prevent judges from denigrating the seriousness of certain crimes. Because the laws simplify the factors that sentencing judges may consider, they promote more uniform outcomes and send clear signals that might strengthen the deterrent power of the criminal law.

Criticism of mandatory minimum sentences is widespread and cuts across partisan lines. According to these detractors, mandatory minimum sentences reduce the necessary power of the sentencing judge to individualize the sentence imposed on each offender. In particular, the laws direct the judge's attention only to the details of the offense and ignore many features of an offender's background. For this reason, mandatory minimum sentences are consistently unpopular with judges.

MANDATORY MINIMUM SENTENCES

Mandatory minimum sentences also highlight the importance of prosecutorial discretion to choose among the available charges, some of which include mandatory minimums and others that do not. The prosecutor's selection of charges can lead to unequal sentencing outcomes for defendants who commit identical crimes. Because police officers and prosecutors often aim to avoid the use of these laws in some eligible cases, mandatory statutes lead to fewer arrests for the designated crimes, fewer charges filed, and more dismissals of charges. These statutes also undermine the power of sentencing guidelines to produce reasonable uniformity among sentences while still accounting for important individual differences.

The prospects are limited for ways to ameliorate these ill effects. Governors have not often exercised their pardon and commutation powers. The courts have shown reluctance to overrule severe minimum sentences under the cruel and unusual punishment clauses of the federal and state constitutions. For instance, the Supreme Court in Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003), upheld a twenty-five-year sentence for an offender with prior convictions who stole three golf clubs.

Ultimately, the best hope for checking the effects of mandatory minimum penalties rests in the legislature. In 1970, the U.S. Congress repealed most of the existing federal mandatory minimum laws, an effort supported by then-Congressman George H. W. Bush. The political environment, however, does not often allow legislators to repeal these laws. Despite apparent widespread agreement in the New York state legislature about the need to revise the Rockefeller drug laws, the reforms languished for several years and finally passed in 2004 only in weakened form.

RONALD F. WRIGHT

References and Further Reading

- Cassell, Paul G., Too Severe? A Defense of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines (and a Critique of Federal Mandatory Minimums), Stanford Law Review 56 (April 2004): 1017–1048.
- Hatch, Orrin G., The Role of Congress in Sentencing: The U.S. Sentencing Commission, Mandatory Minimum Sentences, and the Search for a Certain and Effective Sentencing System, Wake Forest Law Review 28 (1993): 185–198.

Parent, Dale, Terence Dunworth, Douglas McDonald, and William Rhodes. Key Legislative Issues in Criminal Justice: Mandatory Sentencing. Washington, D.C.: National Institute of Justice, 1997.

Schulhofer, Stephen J., Rethinking Mandatory Minimums, Wake Forest Law Review 28 (1993): 199–222.

Twentieth Century Fund Task Force on Criminal Sentencing. Fair and Certain Punishment. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976.

U.S. Sentencing Commission. Mandatory Minimum Penalties in the Federal Criminal Justice System. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003)

Rockefeller Drug Law, New York Penal Law §§ 220.21, 220.43, 1973 New York Laws 371, 380–381

See also Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII); Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally; Pardon and Commutation; Prison Population Growth; Sentencing Guidelines; Three Strikes/Proportionality

MANN ACT

The Mann Act, sometimes called the White Slave Traffic Act, was introduced in Congress in 1909 and passed the following year. Its drafting was prompted by a number of social concerns that came to prominence in the United States during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Initially, it developed as a response to growing concerns about increased prostitution linked to white slavery, immigration, urbanization, and the resulting changing status of women. These concerns were exacerbated by the publication of lurid and sensational stories about vice rings appearing in muckraking magazines of the era. Progressive reformers responded to the issue's increasing prominence by sponsoring city ordinances outlawing prostitution and by supporting the passage of related laws at the state level.

The federal Mann Act was introduced in the U.S. House of Representatives by Congressman James Mann, who represented the Illinois congressional district that included Chicago. He based the law on the provisions of the commerce clause, which authorized Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and on the terms of an international treaty that focused on the suppression of the international prostitution rings. The law was passed by Congress with minimal opposition and remained in effect until it became essentially worthless in the 1960s, a result of lack of enforcement and repeated passage of amendments limiting its reach. The Mann Act made it a crime to transport women in interstate or foreign commerce for immoral purposes or with the goal of persuading the female to participate in immoral acts. Efforts at enforcement were to be facilitated by the law's provision authorizing immigration officials to maintain records of instances in which individuals appeared to be attempting to procure women for immoral purposes. It also attempted to secure the assistance of proprietors of brothels by specifying that, if they provided the government with requested information on foreign prostitutes, they would be deemed immune from prosecution under the Mann Act.

Although the extent of the problem of white slavery in the United States in the early twentieth century was not as serious as supporters of the bill contended, its enforcement during the first two decades prompted arrests, the amassing of records, and the eventual prosecution of traders in white slavery. At least two significant U.S. Supreme Court decisions resulted from such prosecutions, both of which not only upheld the constitutionality of the Mann Act, but in so doing also expanded the powers of Congress under the commerce clause.

In 1913, the Court heard on appeal the case of Hoke v. U.S., 227 U.S. 308 (1913), which dealt with the conviction of a man who had transported a young woman from Louisiana to Texas for the purpose of having her engage in prostitution. The plaintiff argued that the Mann Act was unconstitutional because Congress had overextended its authority under the commerce clause by legislating in an area (morality) that was an issue reserved for state regulation. The U.S. Supreme Court rejected his contention and thus broadened the reach of the commerce clause.

Justice William McKenna, writing for a unanimous Court, stated that this was a situation in which, because of the involvement of interstate transport, no single state could regulate effectively. He cited as precedents federal rulings upholding Congress's power to regulate lottery tickets and obscene materials. Justice McKenna wrote that the "broad and universal power" of Congress to regulate in the area of interstate commerce had been so frequently upheld that there should be little question of its extent. He also noted that the action of Congress in such cases did not interfere with the power of states to legislate on moral issues within their boundaries.

A few years later, Justice William R. Day, writing for the majority in Caminetti v. U.S., 242 U.S. 470 (1917), significantly broadened the application of the Mann Act. This case concerned the trial and conviction of two young men from California who had transported two young women to Nevada for the purpose of having sexual intercourse. Having been charged with violating the Mann Act, the young men argued in their defense that the law did not apply because the young women had participated in the trip knowingly and willingly. Justice Day rejected this contention, arguing that the law was not intended to punish only those expeditions undertaken for the purpose of financial gain. He wrote that the wording of the law was so plain that there was no question of Congress's intent. He further argued that Congress had power to keep the "channels of commerce" free from immoral activity.

Although the Mann Act was not used extensively to prosecute activities such as those resulting in these two cases, the precedents set in Hoke and Caminetti were cited repeatedly in the ensuing decades as evidence of the intent of the U.S. Supreme Court's support for a broad interpretation of the power of Congress under the commerce clause. The act gradually fell into disuse and, by the 1960s, was no longer enforced.

REBECCA S. SHOEMAKER

References and Further Reading

- Criminal Law Statutory Offenses. Liability of Women Transported for Conspiracy to Violate Mann Act*, Harvard Law Review 46 (January 1933): 520–521.
Interstate Immorality: The Mann Act and the Supreme Court, Yale Law Journal 56 (May 1947): 718–730.
 Langum, David. Crossing Over the Line: Legislative Morality and the Mann Act. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Caminetti v. U.S.*, 242 U.S. 470 (1917)
Hoke v. U.S., 227 U.S. 308 (1913)

See also Interstate Commerce; Rape; Sex and Criminal Justice

MANSON v. BRATHWAITE, 432 U.S. 98 (1977)

Because eyewitness identification is rife with risk of error (United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 1967), the U.S. Supreme Court monitors identification procedures to reduce the risk of mistaken identification testimony yielding an unjust conviction. In Manson v. Brathwaite, the Court set forth a due-process test for the admission of eyewitness identification testimony. Police investigators presented an undercover police officer witness with a single photo of their suspect, rather than presenting several photos of varying individuals to him in a photo array.

Though the single photo identification practice was unnecessarily suggestive, the Court majority refused to exclude the undercover officer's testimony about his out-of-court photographic identification of the defendant, nor his in-court identification. The lower appellate court had interpreted earlier due-process rulings in Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293 (1967), and Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. 188 (1972), to require exclusion of testimony relating to an unnecessarily suggestive out-of-court identification procedure, thus encouraging use of a more reliable means of identification when available.

But the Manson majority rejected this per se exclusionary rule as too severe. Instead, testimony regarding the out-of-court and in-court identification would be excluded only when there is a substantial likelihood of misidentification. This likelihood is determined by weighing the corrupting effect of the suggestive identification procedure against the factors relating to reliability (the witness's opportunity to observe, degree of attention, level of certainty, the accuracy of the prior description, and the time lapse between the crime and the identification procedure). The dissenters urged a greater deterrent of unreliable procedures. This debate continues.

MARGERY M. KOOSÉD

References and Further Reading

- Gross, Samuel H., Loss of Innocence: Eyewitness Identification and Proof of Guilt, Journal of Legal Studies 16 (1987): 395–453.
- Koosed, Margery M., The Proposed Innocence Protection Act Won't—Unless It Also Curbs Mistaken Eyewitness Identifications, Ohio State Law Journal 63 (2002): 263–314.
- Rattner, Arye, Convicted but Innocent: Wrongful Convictions and the Criminal Justice System, Law and Human Behavior 12 (1988): 283–293.
- Wells, Gary L., and Donna M. Murray. “What Can Psychology Say About the Neil v. Biggers Criteria for Judging Eyewitness Accuracy?” Journal of Applied Psychology 68 (1983): 34.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Neil v. Biggers*, 409 U.S. 188 (1972)
- Stovall v. Denno*, 388 U.S. 293 (1967)
- United States v. Wade*, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)

See also Due Process; Eyewitness Identification; Line-Ups

MANUAL ENTERPRISES, INC. v. DAY, 370 U.S. 478 (1962)

By a six-to-one vote (Justices Frankfurter and White did not participate), the Supreme Court reversed lower court decisions sustaining the authority of the postmaster general under the Comstock Act to seize and bar from the mails magazines deemed as obscene because they contained photographs of nude or near nude males published by Manual Enterprises for homosexuals (and which contained the addresses of the photographers).

Justice Harlan, applying the Roth standard (Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 1957), declared that, after “our own independent examination,” the magazines were not obscene. He added, however, a new qualifier to the standard. The post office and lower courts misapplied Roth by making “prurient interest” the sole test of obscenity. Justice Harlan argued that an “essential” element was the “patent offensiveness” of materials and whether the materials were “so offensive on their face as to affront current community standards of decency.” Roth requires two “distinct” elements: patent offensiveness and prurient interests; both must be conjoined before challenged material can be declared obscene and barred from the mails under the Comstock Act. The relevant “community” under the federal statute, Justice Harlan added, was a “national standard of decency.”

The Comstock Act also proscribed “obscene advertising.” The secondary issue in the case was scienter—namely, whether the postal authorities could presume Manual Enterprises was aware the third-party advertisers whose addresses were included the magazines were in possession of “hard core” photographs. Justice Harlan concluded that actual proof was necessary to establish that the publisher knew the advertisers were offering obscene material.

Justice Brennan's concurrence stressed that this was the first time the Court had given plenary review to the question of whether the post office could order material “nonmailable” after it determined it to be obscene. Procedural safeguards, he stated, “loom large in the wake of an order such as the one before us.” The factual question at the center of his concurrence was whether Congress had “in fact conferred upon postal authorities any power to exclude matter from the mails upon their determination of its obscene character.” Justice Brennan concluded that legislative history showed that Congress had not granted the postmaster general this authority.

Justice Clark's dissent proclaimed that the Court's holding “requires the U.S. Post Office to be the world's largest disseminator of smut and Grand Informer of the names and places where obscene material may be obtained.” Disagreeing with Justice Brennan, Justice Clark emphasized that the wording of the Comstock Act and subsequent postal regulations clearly authorized the post office to declare material obscene and to bar it from the mails. Clark also declared that facts of the case rendered concerns about the sender's scienter irrelevant and pointed out that Manual Enterprises was knowledgeable about the purposes of the advertisements in its magazines and that the publishing firm was no “Jack and Jill” operation. The facts were equally evident to the justice (quoting Milton: “O dark, dark, dark amid the blaze the noon”) that with “no social, educational, or entertainment qualities,” the magazines, “designed solely as sex stimulants for homosexuals,” were obscene and thus appropriately nonmailable through the post office.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook With Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Manual Enterprises, Inc. v. Day*, 370 U.S. 478 (1962)
- Roth v. United States*, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

MAPP v. OHIO, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)

This landmark case established that federal and state courts must exclude evidence seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Police received a tip that a suspect was hiding in Dollree Mapp’s home. Officers knocked on Mapp’s door and demanded entrance. She called her lawyer, who instructed her not to allow the police into the home without a warrant. She followed this advice and, in response, the police surrounded her home for hours. They again sought entrance and, when Mapp did not immediately come to the door, police forcibly entered. When Mapp demanded a warrant, an officer held up a paper. When Mapp grabbed it, officers handcuffed her. During the widespread unlawful search that ensued, police recovered “obscene materials.” At trial, Mapp was convicted of possession of those materials. The prosecution never produced a warrant.

The Supreme Court reversed Mapp’s conviction and established the “exclusionary rule” requiring that trial courts suppress evidence obtained by means of unlawful searches or seizures. The Court reasoned that the Fourth Amendment would be an “empty promise” without the remedy of exclusion. Furthermore, since Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886) and Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914) established the rule in federal prosecutions, Mapp’s expansion of exclusion to state courts would create parity. Finally, the Court focused on preserving “judicial integrity,” stating that convicting even the guilty with unconstitutionally obtained evidence would reduce respect for the judiciary and undermine the rule of law.

The dissent complained on several grounds. First, it argued that the Court’s action violated states’ rights. The Court posited that the Fourth Amendment was applicable to the states by means of the “incorporation doctrine”—the notion that ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment made the Bill of Rights (including the Fourth Amendment) enforceable against the states. The dissent countered that state court convictions arise out of a sovereign judicial system, which the Constitution’s federalist system protects. Second, the dissent noted that the exclusionary rule would distort trials’ truth-seeking function. Nothing would undermine “judicial integrity” more than trials that excluded truth. Finally, the dissent took issue with the Court’s fusion of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to conclude that the Fourth required exclusion. Although constitutional provisions should be construed in light of each other, a Fifth Amendment violation occurs with the admission at trial of coerced statements. A Fourth Amendment violation, however, is the unlawful search or seizure. Thus, the remedies for violation of the two provisions should diverge.

Present-day commentators such as Professor Akhil Reed Amar have focused on the lack of textual or historical bases for the exclusionary rule. Nowhere in the Fourth Amendment’s text is there an exclusion requirement. Furthermore, the amendment’s drafters were aware of the common-law remedy of trespass suits as redress for search and seizure improprieties. Thus, exclusion would have been unthinkable. Furthermore, Mapp’s goal of deterring police misconduct has not been fully realized; exclusion has not curtailed Fourth Amendment violations. Subjecting the government to liability for improper searches and seizures by means of civil tort actions, the commentators assert, would better curtail abuses than the exclusionary rule. In addition, it would restore trials to their intended function: a search for the truth using all evidence.

LOUIS N. SCHULZE, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil Reed, Fourth Amendment First Principles, Harvard Law Review 107 (1994): 757.
- Johnson, Sheri Lynn, Of Myths and Mapp: A Response to Professor Magee, Cap. University Law Review 23 (1994): 221.

- Katz, Lewis R., Mapp After Forty Years: Its Impact on Race in America, Case Western Reserve Law Review 52 (2001): 471.
- Magee, Robin K., The Myth of the Good Cop and the Inadequacy of Fourth Amendment Remedies for Black Men: Contrasting Presumptions of Innocence and Guilt, Cap. University Law Review 23 (1994): 151.
- Stewart, Potter, The Road to Mapp v. Ohio and Beyond: The Origins, Development and Future of the Exclusionary Rule in Search and Seizure Cases, Columbia Law Review 83 (1983): 1365.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Boyd v. United States*, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
- McNabb v. United States*, 318 U.S. 332 (1943)
- Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States*, 251 U.S. 385 (1920)
- Weeks v. United States*, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)
- Wolf v. Colorado*, 338 U.S. 25 (1949)

See also Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971); Exclusionary Rule; Incorporation Doctrine; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Seizures

MARBURY v. MADISON, 5 U.S. 137 (1803)

Marbury put the Supreme Court's imprimatur on the doctrine of judicial review. The case was brought under the Judiciary Act of 1789's grant to the Supreme Court of original jurisdiction in cases in which writs of mandamus were sought against high federal officers. William Marbury, who had been appointed by President John Adams as a justice of the peace for the District of Columbia, asked that Secretary of State James Madison be ordered to deliver his commission. The Court decided that Marbury had a right to his commission and that a writ of mandamus was the proper remedy, but it concluded that it could not issue that writ because the power to do so was not among Article III grants to the Supreme Court of original jurisdiction. The Judiciary Act's delegation of that power to the Supreme Court, then, was unconstitutional.

Chief Justice Marshall's opinion justified the Court's exercise of judicial review along the lines offered by Alexander Hamilton in The Federalist No. 78: The statute and the constitutional provision were conflicting laws, he said, and the Court had to decide which of them to give effect. Since the Constitution had been enacted by a higher authority than had the Judiciary Act, it must be given effect despite the conflicting provision of the act.

The section of Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in which he sided with Marbury on the merits of his claim to his commission was very controversial at the time. President Thomas Jefferson and Secretary Madison rightly understood it as a rebuke to them.

Marbury did not mark the first time an American court had exercised judicial review. It did not even mark the first time a federal court, or a Supreme Court justice, had done so. It was, however, the first case in which the Supreme Court claimed that power, and it has stood for the federal courts' power of judicial review ever since.

KEVIN R. C. GUTZMAN

References and Further Reading

- Gunther, Gerald, ed., John Marshall's Defense of McCulloch v. Maryland.
- Gutzman, Kevin R. C. "Old Dominion, New Republic." Ph.D. diss., University of Virginia, 1999.
- Hobson, Charles F. The Great Chief Justice: John Marshall and the Rule of Law.
- Hobson, Charles F. et al., eds., The Papers of John Marshall.
- Smith, Jean Edward. John Marshall: Definer of a Nation.

MARCHES AND DEMONSTRATIONS

The civil rights years are commonly determined to be the decade from the early 1950s through the end of the 1960s. The marches and demonstrations that marked the civil rights years were primarily to protest segregation and racial inequality, as exemplified by the so-called "Jim Crow" laws that still existed throughout the South and the racial discord and hostility in evidence in large portions of the North. Segregation has been aptly defined as "the way which a society tells a group of human beings that they are inferior to other groups."

In December 1955, as president of the Montgomery Improvement Association (MIA), Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. launched the successful Montgomery bus boycott protesting the fact that black riders were forced to sit or stand in the back of the bus and use the back door for entry while white patrons sat in the front and used the front door (the front seats remained empty when no white riders were present). The protest was sparked by the arrest of Rosa Parks due to her refusal to move to the back of the bus and relinquish her seat to a white patron. As stated by Dr. King in his book, Stride Toward Freedom, more than fifty thousand African Americans chose "to substitute tired feet for tired souls and walk the streets of Montgomery until the walls of segregation were finally battered by the forces of justice." After a 381-day protest, black riders won equal access to public transportation services in Montgomery, Alabama.

After the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), and the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR) made varied attempts to engage and educate college students about passive resistance and nonviolent protest.

In the summer of 1961, CORE and FOR staged the so-called "freedom rides," which involved an interracial group riding public interstate buses to protest segregated transport and their related facilities. The trip was planned from Washington, D.C. to New Orleans, Louisiana. On the Atlanta to Birmingham leg of the trip, the group was mobbed and beaten and one of the two buses was fire-bombed. Even with eventual intervention by President Kennedy, an agreement by Alabama Governor John Patterson to protect them, and the freedom riders being accompanied by a presidential representative, a subsequent group of freedom riders were relentlessly beaten by a mob of white segregationists when their bus reached Montgomery, Alabama, a week after the demonstration began. The presidential representative and Justice Department official, John Seigenthaler, was not spared; during the melee while trying to pull two female freedom fighters to safety, he was beaten unconscious and left lying in the street for half an hour. Throughout the summer of 1961, more than three hundred freedom riders rode the interstate buses throughout the South protesting segregation and attempting to integrate interstate transportation as ordered by the U.S. Supreme Court in a 1947 decision.

In 1963, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. led sit-in demonstrations to desegregate lunch counters and eating facilities in Birmingham, Alabama. May of 1963 marks a poignant and chilling period in which black men, women, and children alike were attacked and bitten by police dogs controlled by police officers and lashed by water sprayed from fire hoses held by fire fighters in the streets of Birmingham. Via television and newspaper reports, America got a glimpse of the Deep South, its public officials, and those sworn to serve and protect.

During this same time period, Martin Luther King, Jr. was arrested during a demonstration in Birmingham; in April 1963, while imprisoned, he wrote his famous "Letter From a Birmingham Jail." The letter has been praised as "one of the most important documents of nonviolent protest in the civil rights movement."

Assisting in sit-ins throughout the South were members of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), which had been founded in 1960 by college students to organize lunch counter sit-ins and other antisegregation demonstrations. The protesters were harassed, bullied, beaten, and often arrested as a result of their silent and nonviolent protests. To publicize Southern sit-ins and to support the plight of their southern counterparts, college students in northern cities staged sympathy sit-ins and picketed local establishments. In May 1963, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Birmingham segregation ordinances (including lunch counters) were unconstitutional.

Decrying inequality between the races, on August 28, 1963, the now famous "march on Washington" was held. At that time, black unemployment was 11 percent while white unemployment stood at 5 percent. Similarly, on average, white families earned $6,500 per year while an average black family earned $3,500 per year. During the march on Washington, Martin Luther King, Jr. made his historic "I have a dream" speech from the steps of the Lincoln Memorial. This integrated protest march drew over two hundred fifty thousand protestors to the Washington Monument—at that time, the largest march and protest of its kind.

To oppose racial inequality in voting rights, in March of 1965, Rev. King and about four thousand members of the SCLC held a march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama (the "Selma-to-Montgomery march"), with the protection of federal troops; before they reached their destination, nearly thirty thousand supporters swelled the ranks of the march. At the capital, Dr. King gave his well-known "How long? . . . not long" speech. During this period, the Voting Rights Act of 1965 was enacted by President Lyndon B. Johnson. Dr. King and other civil rights activists were present at the presidential bill signing.

In July 1967, due largely to the efforts of Dr. King and a broad coalition of civil rights groups, the Justice Department reported that more than 50 percent of all eligible African-American residents were registered to vote in the states of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina.

In April 1968, Dr. King was in Memphis, Tennessee, to help lead a protest by sanitation workers against low pay rates and substandard working conditions. In late March, he had led six thousand demonstrators through downtown Memphis in support of the striking sanitation workers. With a prophetic title, Dr. King delivered his final public speech, "I've been to the mountaintop," in Memphis on April 3, 1968. On April 4, 1968, Martin Luther King, Jr. was shot and killed by James Earl Ray while King was standing on the balcony of his room at the Lorraine Motel.

CYNTHIA G. HAWKINS-LEÓN

References and Further Reading

- Carson, Clayborne, and David J. Garrow et al., eds. Eyes on the Prize Civil Rights Reader: Documents, Speeches, and Firsthand Accounts From the Black Freedom Struggle, 1954–1990. New York: Penguin Books, 1991.
- Fraday, Marshall. Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Penguin Group, 2002.
- Hooks, Benjamin, with Jerry Guess. The March for Civil Rights: The Benjamin Hooks Story. Chicago: ABA Publishing, 2003.
- The King Center, <http://www.thekingcenter.org> (last accessed July 16, 2005).
- Quarles, Benjamin. The Negro in the Making of America, 3rd ed. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987.
- Smith, Marcia A. Black America: A Photographic Journey—Past to Present. San Diego: Thunder Bay Press, 2002.
- Williams, Cecil J. Freedom & Justice: Four Decades of the Civil Rights Struggle as Seen by a Black Photographer of the Deep South. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1995.
- Williams, Juan. Eyes on the Prize: America's Civil Rights Years, 1954–1965. New York: Penguin Books, 1988.

See also Demonstrations and Sit-Ins; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Segregation

MARCHETTI v. UNITED STATES, 390 U.S. 39 (1968)

May an individual refuse to purchase an occupational tax stamp for fear that the government's knowledge of his employment would lead to his arrest? The Supreme Court said yes, overruling prior decisions in United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22 (1953), and Lewis v. United States, 348 U.S. 419 (1955), that stated that the Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination does not prevent this.

James Marchetti was a bookmaker who made money by taking bets from individuals. Under federal law, he was required to register with Internal Revenue Service, indicating that he accepted wagers, and also to pay an annual occupational tax. He was indicted for failure to do either and he contended that because the registration and payment of the tax would be reported to other law enforcement agencies who might prosecute him for illegal bookmaking, the two federal laws constituted a violation of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Justice Harlan wrote for the majority that agreed with Marchetti. Harlan noted that in United States v. Kahriger and Lewis v. United States, the Court had upheld the requirement to register and purchase tax stamps for similar illegal activities. In those cases the Court noted that no violation of the Fifth Amendment had occurred because individuals were given the choice between whether one wishes to commence wagering activities at the cost of a constitutional privilege.

In Marchetti, the Court rejected this logic. Instead it argued that because it was clear that Congress intended information about registration and the payment of the occupational tax to be given to law enforcement officials, Marchetti had a real and substantial fear of prosecution and therefore it was appropriate for him to raise the Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination as a defense. The Court did note, though, that if an individual did not face substantial hazards of prosecution, then these registration and tax laws would not be unconstitutional.

DAVID SCHULTZ

References and Further Reading

- Garcia, Alfredo. The Fifth Amendment: A Comprehensive Approach. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lewis v. United States*, 348 U.S. 419 (1955)
United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22 (1953)

See also Miranda Warning

MARITAL RAPE

The marital rape exemption, traditionally under common law, sets forth that a husband who forcibly engaged in sexual intercourse against the will and without the consent of his wife was not socially or legally accountable for rape. This exemption derives from three main justifications: the property rationale, marital unity, and, most influential, the marriage contract and implied consent theories.

According to early Judeo-Christian tenets, rape was a legitimate means of acquiring wives, so marital rape was accepted and common. These early views of marital rape are rooted in a property rationale. Whether as fathers or husbands, men owned women as chattel. A wife's sexuality and reproductive capacity were property interests of her husband, so no legal basis existed to prosecute a husband for raping his wife since he did not infringe on another's property rights.

The marital "unities" doctrine underlies this property rights rationale. Under the "unities" doctrine, husband and wife became one person in law upon marriage. More precisely, a woman's legal existence disappeared upon marriage or, more precisely, became incorporated into her husband's existence, with the husband completely controlling their joint existence. Therefore, the "unities" doctrine justified and legitimized the rape exemption because a man could not rape his wife, just as he could not rape himself.

The most prevalent justification for the marital rape exemption derives from the treatise written by Lord Matthew Hale, the chief justice of England in the seventeenth century, which contemplates the notions of marriage as contract and, subsequently, a wife's implied consent to sex with her husband at any time within the marriage. Hale's theory has been the justification for marital rape for more than three hundred thirty years, and courts throughout the United States have cited his theory to justify upholding the marital rape exemption. According to Hale, "[T]he husband cannot be guilty of a rape committed by himself upon his lawful wife, for by their mutual matrimonial consent and contract the wife hath given up herself in this kind unto her husband, which she cannot retract."

Hale's contract and consent theory for marital rape exemptions relied on marital status law. Marital status rules fixed marital rights and obligations automatically so that "opting-out" was not an option while the marriage existed. The fact that a husband or wife did not wish to abide by, or attempted to contract around, these default state rules was legally irrelevant. The only opportunity for actual agreement or, in this case, a woman's consenting or not consenting to sex, was the initial decision to marry. However, this decision subjected wives and husbands to very different obligations and rights, giving the husband a right of sexual access to his wife and bestowing an obligation to submit by the wife.

The notion that marriage entailed the wife's "irrevocable" or "implied" consent to sex once she made the decision to marry acknowledged the potential divergence between this decision and her actual state of mind at any point within the marriage. Therefore, according to Hale, a woman's marriage triggered the enforcement of the legal presumption of consent to sex with her husband, an idea that formed the basis for the common law marital rape exemption.

Challenges to the marital rape exemption began in the late 1970s, when all state legislatures considered and most passed changes in their common law based rape statutes and when feminism gained footing as a movement. Many of the challenges to and reforms of rape law and, more specifically, marital rape laws were due to the advocacy of alliances formed among feminist groups, victims' rights groups, and organizations promoting general justice.

Currently, twenty-six states, including the District of Columbia, have abolished the marital exemption for sexual offenses. These states' statutes are silent as to the marital status between the victim and defendant in sexual offenses, which allows a state to criminalize marital and nonmarital sexual assault in equal ways, or are explicit, providing for prosecution of spouses or stating that marital status is not a defense. The remaining twenty-four states retain some form of the marital rape exemption. Although all have abolished the per se exemption under common law, many still make it more difficult to convict husbands of sexual offenses committed against their wives. The statutes, although varied, essentially have separate statutes for marital rape, implying different standards for marital rape and other rape, or include extra requirements for marital sexual offenses.

JANET HONG

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Michelle J., Marital Immunity, Intimate Relationships, and Improper Inferences: A New Law on Sexual Offenses by Intimates, Hastings Law Journal (2003): 1465–1557.
- Eskow, Lisa R., The Ultimate Weapon? Demythologizing Spousal Rape and Reconceptualizing Its Prosecution, Stanford Law Review 48 (1996): 677–709.
- Hale, Matthew. The History of the Pleas of the Crown, 1st American ed. Philadelphia: Robert H. Small, 1847.
- Hasday, Jill Elaine, Contest and Consent: A Legal History of Marital Rape, California Law Review 88 (2000): 1373–1505.
- Segal, Lalenya Weintraub, The Marital Rape Exemption: Evolution to Extinction, Cleveland State Law Review 43 (1995): 351–378.
- Sitton, Jane, Old Wine in New Bottles: The "Marital" Rape Allowance, North Carolina Law Review 72 (1993): 265.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Commonwealth v. Fogerty* 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 489 (1857)
- Frazier v. State*, 86 S.W. 754, 755 (Tex.Crim.App. 1905)
- State of New Jersey in the Interest of M.T.S.*, 609 A.2d 1266, 1274–1275 (N.J. 1992)
- State v. Haines*, 25 So. 372, 372 (La. 1899)

See also Domestic Violence; Rape; Sex and Criminal Justice

MARKETPLACE OF IDEAS THEORY

The marketplace of ideas theory stands for the notion that, with minimal government intervention—a laissez faire approach to the regulation of speech and expression—ideas, theories, propositions, and movements will succeed or fail on their own merits. Left to their own rational devices, free individuals have the discerning capacity to sift through competing proposals in an open environment of deliberation and exchange, allowing truth, or the best possible results, to be realized in the end.

The Biography of the Marketplace of Ideas

While obviously predating modern economic (marketplace) theory, John Milton's Areopagitica—imagining a “contest” of forces and arguing against Parliament's efforts to license the press—offered the initial theoretical predicate for modern marketplace theory. John Stuart Mill expanded on the notion, arguing that free expression was valuable on individual and social grounds because it served to develop and sustain the rational capacity of man and, in an instrumental sense, facilitated the search for truth. The influence of Milton and Mill is evident in Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.'s dissent in Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919), the case that formally established the marketplace of ideas as a legal concept.

Reversing course from recent opinions in which he had expressed support for state restrictions on speech tending toward a “clear and present danger,” Justice Holmes contended that that the distribution of fliers expressing hostility to the United States and urging resistance to the war effort in the case of Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919) did not constitute the sort of danger that Congress had the right to regulate. On a theoretical level, however, the justice observed that while it may be “perfectly logical—or a kind of human inclination—to stamp out dissent and muffle the opposition, one should be wary of such aspirations of certainty. Indeed, he suggested:

When men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test for truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market; and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out.

Such a notion, Justice Holmes argued, “. . . is the theory of our Constitution,” acknowledging—in the spirit of marketplace logic itself—that “[i]t is an experiment, as all life is an experiment.” Thus, with this turn of phrase, Justice Holmes carved into law what would become the defining metaphor for freedom of speech jurisprudence in the twentieth century.

Critics of the Marketplace Theory

Critics of marketplace theory question its assumptions and the potential for its actualization, focusing primarily on the soundness of the economic analogy; the nature of input introduced to the market; and the essence of the output rendered through the course of these exchanges. With respect to the “market” metaphor and incumbent imagery, some question whether the laws and values governing “trade” in goods and services in the financial realm should properly be extended to the social realm and the “trade” in ideas.

When buying products in the economic market, this argument goes, human beings make choices based on tastes and preferences, but in the marketplace of ideas, the same rational decision-making capacity is expected to be the engine that drives the “exchange”—allowing one to distinguish true from false and good from bad. Thus, it is essential that individuals be willing and able to apply their faculties in such a manner. Scholars of communications and cognitive processes question this assumption by pointing out that humans are much like “pack rats.” They gather bits and pieces of information as they follow a political campaign, for example, but in the mental storage of data they tend to mix that which they get from the news and that which they get from partisan advertisements. In other words, “packaging” matters as well, and perhaps they are not fully aware of the influences skewing their selections and perceptions.

Other critics focus their attention on the nature, extent, and potential of the input that is introduced to the market arena. Importantly, for the full range of social benefits to be achieved through individual-level exchanges, consumers must willingly come to market; they must desire to peddle their wares (ideas). But, in an increasingly complicated and global society, for example, citizens often lack the public or common place for meeting and exchanging ideas (what the Greeks knew as the “agora”). On another level, what about input that has the potential to disrupt or destroy the marketplace? Should incendiary or threatening ideas be allowed to compete as well? Does the state have a legitimate role in protecting the market from itself? That is, as with the economy, is government regulation of market contributions sometimes called for in the interest of promoting freer, fuller, and safer exchanges of ideas?

Finally, with regard to marketplace output, assuming that there is such a thing as “truth”—the end to which exchanges are putatively directed, critics wonder how one knows that this result has arrived. If it is the process of exchange that is to yield the substantive product of truth, then is it simply that that which wins out in the end is, by definition, “true”? Is something good by this logic because it has won acceptance, or has it been accepted because it is good? If the intention of the marketplace is to allow for petitioning and persuasion, then is the market not so much a “test for truth” as it is a barometer of popularity?

Such criticism notwithstanding, the idea of a marketplace—emphasizing individual liberty, choice, possibility, and the potential for aggregate social benefits resulting from such “free exchanges”—defines the way in which the Supreme Court and citizens generally think about issues of freedom of expression in the United States.

BRIAN K. PINAIRE

References and Further Reading

- Cole, David, Agon at Agora: Creative Misreadings in the First Amendment Tradition, Yale Law Journal 95 (1986): 857.
 Ingber, Stanley, The Marketplace of Ideas: A Legitimizing Myth, Duke Law Journal (1984): 1–90.
 Pinaire, Brian K., A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Market: The Supreme Court and Political Speech in the Electoral Process, The Journal of Law & Politics 17 (Summer 2001): 489–551.
 Smolla, Rodney. Free Speech in an Open Society. New York: Alfred Knopf, 1992.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)

See also Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919); Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Mill, John Stuart; Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

MARRIAGE, HISTORY OF

Marriage is a private relationship and a public contract stating who can marry, when, and to whom; who can officiate; obligations of married people, rights of each spouse; ownership and inheritance of property; legitimate sexual relationships; and grounds for divorce. Since revolutionary days in the United States, marriage has been connected to one's status in the community, and the community assumed and later formalized the rules of the marriage contract. The U.S. Constitution leaves marriage and family law to the individual states.

Influence of English Common Law

The moral and political climate of the early colonies and later territories and states influenced marriage laws. From the beginning colonial revolutionaries favored the tenets and assumptions of English common law with the exception of divine right. Colonists defined marriage as a contract with assumed mutual consent, husbands' support and wives' services, spousal rights and obligations, and parental responsibilities and rights over children. Colonists assumed that males had naturally superior skills in reason and judgment and that women excelled in gentle manners and nurturing, supporting the man's dominion over his wife and children. Wives did not have rights to own property in their names, to vote, to serve on juries, or to inherit. When a woman married her property reverted to her husband's ownership and control—a procedure known as “coverture.”

Influence of Christianity

Christianity dominated the moral codes of the American colonies and provided the framework for early American stipulations and assumptions about marital and family roles. Christian morality dictated monogamy between spouses. Early Americans settled among Native American Indians who practiced informal marriage and divorce, followed matrilineal inheritance patterns, and shared responsibility for children. Early settlers needed to define themselves as separate from Great Britain and as more civilized than the indigenous natives. Christian marriage distinguished settlers from the “wild heathens.” Christianity continues to influence marital laws in the United States to this day.

Informal Marriages and Self-Divorce

Most states did not have formal marriage laws until about 1750. Marriages were often sanctified by “reputation and cohabitation” when people moved in together or had a child. Families kept dates of marriages and births in individual family Bibles, and some parish records exist. Informal marriage was common in the territories, and several formerly frontier states still have common-law marriage laws. These were written to allow people to move in together and get community support when the preacher was not available to marry people.

Just as informal marriages were common, so was self-divorce and abandonment. People often married again after self-divorce or abandonment; technically, they could be labeled bigamists, but local communities enforced the local standards, and few people objected to this pattern of serial marriages.

Era of Slavery

Most African-American slaves could not marry legally, a major civil rights violation, and their unions and the futures of their children depended on their slave masters. The northern states that freed slaves gradually after the American Revolution did recognize slave marriages, but southern states did not. After the ban on importing slaves in 1808, many plantation owners encouraged conjugal relations and reproduction, and slave masters and their sons also fathered children of their slaves. Those mulatto children were not considered white and did not have civil rights. The United States also criminalized intermarriage on the basis of race or color when one party was white, to keep the legitimate white race unmixed. An Indiana Law of 1840 prohibited marriage between a white and another person with as little as one-eighth “Negro blood.” With emancipation more African Americans formed formal marriages and many informal marriages existed between whites and African Americans despite the miscegenation laws. The local communities exercised control through acceptance or rejection.

Emerging Divorce Laws

By the early 1800s, thirteen states recognized grounds for divorce including adultery, desertion, and cruelty. Legal divorce laws also defined the obligations of former spouses to each other and their children and provided guidelines for the division of property. The petitioner for divorce usually had to document the injuries of the other and prove himself or herself free from blame. Divorce was not easy to obtain, and desertions continued to end many marriages.

Emancipation, Women’s Rights, and Redefined Marriage Laws

The era surrounding the Civil War prompted reforms in civil rights and in marriage and divorce laws. People who opposed slavery also focused on rights of marriage more generally because slavery and marriage were considered “domestic relations.” Criticisms of slavery led to an examination of the power of men over women in marriage, as well as the general lack of civil liberties for women in society. Suffragettes Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and Lucretia Mott had important roles in the abolition movement. The Seneca Falls meeting in 1848 called for the right of women to vote and raised the issue of wives’ submission of their property and their bodies to their husbands. Women’s rights meetings received mocking publicity and ridicule, but they made inroads on the power disparity between wives and husbands.

At roughly the same time, utopian communities sprang up around the country advocating “free love” and rejection of the long-standing commitment of Christian marriage vows to monogamy and life-long marriage bonds. For example, the Oneida community eliminated the exclusive pairing of couples. Utopian communities drew small numbers, but their lifestyle created more debate about marriage and the power differences between men and women.

Debate continued with the controversy about admitting Utah to the United States. Mormon polygamy offered a challenge. Marriage and family laws were reserved to the states, but the majority of the U.S. population did not want a state that sanctioned multiple wives. Eventually, Congress passed a bill to regulate marriage in the territories that made bigamy and polygamy crimes in the territories, including Utah. This set the stage for Utah’s admission to the union.

The Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution forbids slavery and forced servitude. By 1864, freed slaves were entitled to valid marriages, recorded in the individual states. This change granted a civil right denied to African Americans, but laws prohibiting intermarriage of whites still remained. The federal government took responsibility for postwar conditions through the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands. In 1865, the Freedmen’s Bureau issued rules of marriage to encourage former slaves to adopt the obligations of marriage, including husbands’ support of wives and rights to her service. Many former slaves legitimized their unions, often in mass weddings. Others ignored the opportunities to register a marriage and continued to have informal marriages and self-divorce. The bureau aimed to get universal compliance with marriage laws, and some states made cohabitation without marriage illegal.

The First Part of the Twentieth Century

During the early part of the twentieth century, reform movements slowly gained momentum and women gained rights to own property in their own names and, eventually in 1920, the right to vote. Husbands no longer always spoke for wives, but they were still entitled to domestic service. Industrialization, the Great Depression, and the two world wars greatly influenced families. Also, new immigrant groups began to enter the country, bringing their families and customs.

After industrialization fewer families lived and depended on farms every year. Industrialization took the primary job out of the home to the factory. Most jobs were held by men or unmarried women. Families became dependent on the paycheck from the factory or business. This concentrated economic resources and power in husbands' hands. Wives' roles became much more exclusively home based with children and chores. This change decreased the time fathers spent with wives and children. Because women had to ask for money from husbands to purchase goods, their overall power in the family declined.

In the late 1800s and early 1900s, there was a huge influx of immigrants for the new factory jobs. Eventually, factory workers and communities lobbied for better working conditions, public health laws, domestic relations laws, and child welfare laws that restricted the hours and ages at which children could work in the factories. Men legally held control over a woman's body, and in many places attempts to provide birth-control information were thwarted, or doctors required a husband's consent. Men held rights to correct their wives and many believed that men had rights to hit their wives. But, divorce became increasingly available to women in cases of extreme abuse.

The Great Depression led families to suffering as millions of people lost their jobs. Families experienced unemployment and doubled up on housing. The Civilian Conservation Corps employed many family men and housed them in camps far away from their families. Social workers increasingly intervened to enforce the husband/father's obligation to support his family and to monitor the home lives of poor children. Women's employment rose during the 1930s, but usually working women had to leave their jobs when they got married. Congress passed the Social Security Act in 1935, bringing relief through unemployment and retirement benefits. Aid to Dependent Children (ADC) was set up to aid poor children, primarily in single-parent families. Men continued to hold more powerful positions in the family and in the community.

Modern Marriage Law

The last fifty years of the twentieth century marked more change in women's roles and in families than in any other single period in U.S. history. Changes came with World War II, the civil rights movement, the anti-Vietnam War movement, the sexual revolution, and the women's movement.

When men left for World War II, they left for the duration of the war, leaving wives and children largely on their own. The factories needed women to produce war goods and women responded. "Rosie the Riveter" symbolized that work force. Many of these women had small children and factories opened day-care centers to help. During the four years of World War II, many women gained financial independence and confidence, which they were hesitant to give up after the war, even in the face of the postwar conservative family trend. Men returned from war anxious for normalcy, and they married and divorced in record numbers in the late 1940s.

The 1950s have been idealized in the media as the period of strong families, large numbers of children, stay-at-home moms, large church memberships, and prosperity. It is important to remember, however, that this period was also marked by segregation; threats to the civil rights of African Americans, homosexuals, and other minorities; and abuse of women and children behind closed doors. Housewives began to feel isolated in suburbs, overburdened and undervalued.

The 1960s saw calls for civil rights reforms leading eventually to marches, sit-ins, and demonstrations. The initial response was militant opposition and some violence, but eventually, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was narrowly passed by the U.S. Congress. Many activists from the civil rights movement later organized themarches and demonstrations in opposition to the Vietnam War. The revolutionary spirit extended to sexual norms as well. Premarital sex became much more common and accepted in this decade. Women in the antiwar movement found they were asked to do the traditional women's activities like cooking and secretarial duties, while men led the organizations. Those same women agitated for women's rights and formed the basis for the women's movement. The overall effect of the 1960s revolutionary spirit was to undermine the authority of religion, traditional family forms, education, and governmental dictates on family matters.

From the 1960s to the end of the twentieth century, family structures changed tremendously. First, the divorce rate began a steady climb in 1962 that only leveled off in 1982. Married women and mothers flocked to colleges, jobs, and careers. The rates and acceptance of cohabitation increased dramatically. Marriage rates and birth rates declined gradually, and remarriages and stepfamilies increased their numbers. Interracial marriage and single parenthood increased, particularly among minorities. By the beginning of the twenty-first century, nearly a third of children were born whose parents were not married.

This same period also saw dramatic changes in marriage and family law. Miscegenation laws were gradually eliminated; the last one was overturned by the courts in 1967. Divorce reform led every state to adopt some form of no-fault divorce, and child support orders and enforcement of them increased. Family violence laws increased to include marital rape, and states began to bring charges for domestic abuse perpetrators if evidence existed. Custody arrangements for children following divorce became more complex, including joint custody, split custody, and alternating custody. States continued to try to enforce child-support agreements through garnisheeing, fines, and imprisonment, but many support orders were still not paid in full. States eliminated the condition that husbands approve birth control and abortions, and in 1973 the Roe v. Wade (410 U.S. 113, 1973) case made abortions legal in all states. Finally, women had a distinct set of civil rights laws that protected them from earlier biases in marital laws.

Increasingly, gay persons claim civil rights to the benefits of marriage, child custody, and adoption. In 2004, Massachusetts temporarily sanctioned gay marriage and San Francisco issued marriage licenses, but controversy continued. Several other states do or shortly will legitimize gay relationships and offer domestic partnerships to ensure some of the benefits of marriage. Many people oppose gay marriages, especially evangelical Christians, and they try to influence the political process to prevent them. Christianity in the United States continues to play an important role in shaping ideas about marriage, but religious groups vary. Many religious groups support civil rights for homosexuals and other changes that support equity in marriage and civil rights for all family members.

In 2004, the President and Congress funded extensive state programs to promote marriage among low-income families. This controversial set of policies may help stabilize the families of low-income children and/or create greater disruptions with multiple marriages and divorces.

Public authorities do shape marriage, but married people also refine definitions of rights and responsibilities in personal terms. Marriage is expected to change, but not to disappear. Each year individual states mold the marriage laws in response to community standards and to calls for increased civil rights.

JEAN GILES-SIMS

References and Further Reading

Cott, Nancy F. Public Vows: A History of Marriage and the Nation. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.

Hareven, Tamara K. Family, History and Social Change. Boulder, CO: Westview, 2000.

Levitan, Sara, and Richard S. Belous. What's Happening to the American Family? Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1981.

MARSH v. CHAMBERS, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)

In Marsh v. Chambers, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the practice of prayers given in legislative chambers by state-paid chaplains. Marsh is a significant case in the Court's establishment clause jurisprudence because it exempts a government practice that might otherwise be considered to violate a central religion clause value: the prohibition on the government employing a member of the clergy to conduct worship services. The question raised by Marsh is whether it is a legal anomaly or has greater application in related areas such as prayer in public schools or other government acknowledgements of religion.

Marsh was a challenge to the constitutionality of the state-paid chaplain in the Nebraska legislature. The chaplain—at the time, a Presbyterian minister who had held the position for sixteen years—received an annual salary paid by the state and regularly offered prayers at the daily openings of the unicameral legislature. Thus, the challenge involved two related issues: the constitutionality of prayer or other devotional activity as part of an official government function and the constitutionality of state-paid chaplains. The federal district court found that the existence of a chaplain and the saying of prayers in legislatures constitutional, but that the state paying for such services was not. The court of appeals found that all practices violated the establishment clause.

By a six-to-three vote, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the legislative prayers and the state-paid chaplain. Significantly, the majority opinion, written by Chief Justice Warren Burger, declined to apply one of the Court's established analytical tests (for example, the Lemon test) for assessing the constitutionality of religious practices. Instead, the Court majority appealed to "the unambiguous and unbroken history of more than two hundred years" of legislative chaplains. Specifically, the Court looked to actions of the First Congress which passed a law authorizing the appointment and payment of chaplains only three days before finalizing the wording of the First Amendment. The majority reasoned that the Constitution's framers could not have "intended the establishment clause to forbid what they had just declared acceptable."

Turning to the case before them, the Court majority found that the appointment of a chaplain from one denomination for sixteen years did not, on its own, indicate state preference for one faith over others. Rather, the majority noted, the long tenure merely indicated that the legislature found the chaplain's services satisfactory. Moreover, the chaplain regularly invited ministers of other faiths to give invocations, further indicating the lack of denominational preference in the practice. As for the prayers, the majority noted that the customary practice was for the prayers to be of a nondenominational and ecumenical nature. However, the majority wrote that the particular content of the prayers "is not of concern to judges where, as here, there is no indication that the prayer opportunity has been exploited or proselytize or advance any one, or to disparage any other, faith or belief." Consequently, the majority did not rest its holding on the fact that the prayers could be considered more solemnizing than worshipful.

In dissent, Justice William Brennan criticized the majority's reliance on history, arguing that the practices were unquestionably unconstitutional if one applied "settled doctrine":

Legislative prayer clearly violates the principles of neutrality and separation that are embedded within the Establishment Clause It intrudes on the right of conscience by forcing some legislators either to participate in a prayer opportunity, with which they are in basic disagreement, or to make their disagreement a matter of public comment by declining to participate. It forces all residents of the State to support a religious exercise that may be contrary to their own beliefs. [And] it requires the State to commit itself on fundamental theological issues.

The questions left unanswered by Marsh are several. Are legislative prayers constitutional only if they are nondenominational and nonproselytizing? On one hand, the opinion suggests that a sectarian, proselytizing prayer would fail constitutionality, but then the opinion goes on to say that "it is not for [courts] to embark on a sensitive evaluation or to parse the content of a particular prayer." However, following the Marsh decision, lower courts have upheld government limitations on the types of prayers that may be given.

A second question concerns the reach of the Marsh holding outside the particular context of legislative prayers. Lower courts have generally extended the rule to allow prayers at city council and county commission meetings, but have been less willing to do so for school board meetings, particularly if public school students are in regular attendance. In Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), striking invocations and benedictions at public school graduations, the Court refused to rely on Marsh as grounds for upholding the practice, noting that the historical pedigree supporting legislative prayer was relatively unique. Finally, whether the historical rationale used in Marsh applies to other government acknowledgments of religion—for example, the national motto on currency and "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance—remains unclear. In the 2005 Ten Commandments case, Van Orden v. Perry, 125 S. Ct. 2854 (2005), the Court majority applied a historical analysis to uphold the display on the Texas Capitol grounds, but also found that other factors mitigated against the religiosity of the display.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin, History, Tradition, the Supreme Court, and the First Amendment, Hastings Law Journal 44 (1993): 901–919.
- Epstein, Steven B., Rethinking the Constitutionality of Ceremonial Deism, Columbia Law Review 96 (1996): 2083.
- McConnell, Michael W., On Reading the Constitution, Cornell Law Review 73 (1988): 359.
- Note. Constitutional Law—Establishment Clause—Tenth Circuit Holds That City May Deny Opportunity to Deliver Proselytizing Legislative Prayers, Harvard Law Review 112 (1999): 2025–2030.
- Note. With History, All Things Are Secular: The Establishment Clause and the Use of History, Case Western Reserve Law Review 52 (2001): 573–598.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Marsh v. Chambers*, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)
- Simpson v. Chesterfield County Board of Supervisors*, 404 F.3d 276 (4th Cir. 2005)
- Snyder v. Murray City Corp.*, 159 F.3d 1227 (10th Cir. 1998)
- Van Orden v. Perry*, 125 S. Ct. 2854 (2005)

See also Legislative Prayer

MARSHALL COURT (1801–1835)

The Marshall Court, the era of the Supreme Court from 1801 to 1835 associated with the chief justiceship of John Marshall—long considered America's first great chief justice—is significant in the development and prestige of the Court.

Chief Justice Marshall limited the practice of seriatim opinions by getting the justices together in conference to discuss and often come to an agreement on the legal questions of a case. He usually wrote the opinion of the Court or assigned it to an associate justice. The Marshall Court was important in the development of judicial review, the process by which courts review and rule in the law on the constitutionality of acts of the legislative and executive branches, giving the judiciary a key constitutional role in American government. Although beginning in state courts in the 1780s, given the chief justice's brilliant explanation and justification of it in his opinion for the Court, Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137 (1803) (which struck down as unconstitutional the mandamus clause of Section 13 of the Judiciary Act of 1789) became the main precedent for judicial review.

When the Marshall Court began, it consisted of all Federalist justices, with Thomas Jefferson president and the Republicans in control of Congress. Afraid that the Federalists would use the judiciary to check the other branches, Republicans were apprehensive over Marbury, where potentially a mandamus court order could be issued to James Madison, secretary of state. Although the Court backed down, not wanting a conflict that could weaken it and the national government, many Republicans remained critical of Federalist judges. Appointed during John Adams's presidency, Marshall had earlier defended the Sedition Act and opposed the Virginia Resolutions of 1798; Samuel Chase was remembered for the partisan way he had presided over Sedition Act cases. Indeed, the extreme wing of the Republican Party impeached Chase but failed to convict him in the Senate trial.

The Marshall Court was successful in achieving two major Federalist goals. First, it applied a constitutional check on the states. Also, the Court broadly interpreted the Constitution to develop the national government. In the best example, in a double judicial review case, McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheaton 316 (1819), the Court used implied powers to uphold a federal action while striking down a state action. Except for Marbury, all of the Court's judicial review cases striking down legislative acts were against states. Many of these came to the Supreme Court upon a writ of error through Section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789. The Court became engaged in a test of wills with the Virginia high court and its leading judge, Spencer Roane, over judicial review and federal appellate power over state courts in cases such as Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1 Wheaton 304, 1816) and Cohens v. Virginia (6 Wheaton 264, 1821). The Court was highly criticized for its nationalist decisions by the states' rights Old Republicans and Jacksonian Democrats.

Second, the Marshall Court pursued the Federalist goal of supporting commercial and creditor interests against state support for popular, farmer, and debtor interests. The Court used the contract clause—"No State shall . . . pass any . . . Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts"—as the main protection for property rights against the states. State actions were struck down in cases such as Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch 87, 1810), Dartmouth College v. Woodward (4 Wheaton 518, 1819), and Sturges v. Crowninshield (4 Wheaton 122, 1819). In Fletcher, Chief Justice Marshall, in the opinion of the Court, said that in its restrictions on the states, Article I, Section 10 "contains what may be deemed a bill of rights for the people of each state."

He broadly defined contracts to include not just private contracts between citizens but also public ones including government grants of land, and, in Dartmouth College, to include charters of incorporation. He stated that individuals' property rights conferred by the contract clause were to be protected at court. In Sturges, which involved a state bankruptcy law, The chief justice returned to the Federalist view of the creditor-debtor relations of the 1780s and recalled the stay laws, the issue of paper money, making paper and commodities legal tender, and all of "the peculiar evils of the day." Against "so much mischief," the Constitutional Convention of 1787 "intended to establish a great principle, that contracts should be inviolable."

The Marshall Court also struck down state acts in violation of other clauses in Section 10 such as "No state shall . . . emit Bills of Credit" as in Craig v. Missouri, 4 Peters 410 (1830). The Court, however, did not review state actions in terms of common-law rights or the Bill of Rights. Republicans opposed the assertion of a federal common law and were relieved when, in United States v. Hudson and Goodwin, 7 Cranch 32(1812), the Court ruled that the federal judiciary did not have a common-law criminal jurisdiction. In Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Peters 243 (1833), the Court ruled that the Bill of Rights did not apply to the states. Chief Justice Marshall looked to "the history of the day." It was "universally understood" that during the ratification debate the anti-Federalists demanded a bill of rights, almost every ratifying convention recommended amendments, and Congress proposed and the states ratified the Bill of Rights with safeguards against the new federal government, not the states.

As Federalists left, to be replaced by Republican appointments, the Court benefited from having Joseph Story, a professor of law at Harvard who wrote learned court opinions and legal and constitutional treatises. As the Court shifted, however, from consisting of Federalist to Republican and Democrat appointments, with changing political and ideological views, The chief justice found it harder to maintain agreement among the justices. The Court became divided and dissents increased. With the Court, as with the country, it appeared that much of what Chief Justice Marshall had worked for was threatened by the ascendancy of Andrew Jackson and states' rights Democrats.

The Marshall Court did not leave a strong legacy in the protection of civil liberties. It was active in property rights but this became less valued by the Court in the twentieth century, and the Barron doctrine has been practically reversed. Its precedents, however, would be used later for federal judicial power. The Marshall Court's main contribution to civil liberties was laying a foundation for nationalism, a broad interpretation of the Constitution, and judicial review.

F. THORNTON MILLER

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil Reed. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Ely, James W., Jr. The Guardian of Every Other Right: A Constitutional History of Property Rights, 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Faulkner, Robert Kenneth. The Jurisprudence of John Marshall. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1968.
- Hobson, Charles F. The Great Chief Justice: John Marshall and the Rule of Law. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1996.
- Johnson, Herbert A. The Chief Justiceship of John Marshall, 1801–1835. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.
- Smith, Jean Edward. John Marshall: Definer of a Nation. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1996.
- White, G. Edward. The Marshall Court and Cultural Change, 1815–1835. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barron v. Baltimore*, 7 Peters 243 (1833)
- Cohens v. Virginia*, 6 Wheaton 264 (1821)
- Craig v. Missouri*, 4 Peters 410 (1830)
- Dartmouth College v. Woodward*, 4 Wheaton 518 (1819)
- Fletcher v. Peck*, 6 Cranch 87 (1810)
- Marbury v. Madison*, 1 Cranch 137 (1803)
- Martin v. Hunter's Lessee*, 1 Wheaton 304 (1816)
- McCulloch v. Maryland*, 4 Wheaton 316 (1819)
- Sturges v. Crowninshield*, 4 Wheaton 122 (1819)
- United States v. Hudson and Goodwin*, 7 Cranch 32 (1812)

See also Barron v. Baltimore*, 32 U.S. 243 (1833); Bill of Rights; Structure; Chase, Samuel; Constitutional Convention of 1787; Jackson, Andrew; Jefferson, Thomas; Judicial Review; Kentucky and Virginia Resolves; Madison, James; Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803); Marshall, John; McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316 (1819); Story, Joseph

MARSHALL, JOHN (1755–1835)

John Marshall was born September 24, 1755, in Fauquier County, Virginia, and grew up in the frontier counties of that colony. He was educated at home by his father, Thomas, the land agent for Lord Fairfax and a tutor. In 1775, John joined the Virginia militia, which later became incorporated into the Continental Army, where he served as an officer with General George Washington and Daniel Morgan. Marshall participated in many of the major early campaigns of the Revolution, including Great Bridge, Brandywine, Monmouth, and Valley Forge. As one of his biographers, Jean Smith, notes, this service in the army molded Marshall's nationalism: "I was confirmed in the habit of considering America as my country and Congress as my government. I had imbibed these sentiments so thoroughly that they constituted a part of my being" (Smith, p. 5).

In 1780, Marshall turned his attention to the study of law. He enrolled at the College of William and Mary, where he studied under George Wythe, arguably the leading teacher of the law in the new nation. Following roughly three months of studying, Marshall proceeded to build a thriving private practice in Richmond. He became a successful lawyer and land speculator, ably defending the interests of the purchasers of the former Fairfax estates, which included some of his family members and him. The issue of protecting individual property rights from state taking would come back to visit Marshall while he was chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, especially in the cases of Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1 Wheaton 304, 1816), Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee (1818), and Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch 87, 1810).

Chief Justice Marshall recused himself from the first two cases, but wrote the opinion in the last case. He argued that when a state sold land to an individual, that sale constituted a contract, one that could only be ended if the two parties to the contract agreed to dissolve it. These early decisions helped pave the way for Dartmouth College v. Woodward (4 Wheaton 518, 1819), which reinforced the binding nature of contracts. The impact of these later decisions was to offer firm protection of private property from state control and to encourage the growth of a capitalist economy.

Before Marshall became chief justice, he enjoyed success as a politician and government minister. He served as a Federalist delegate in the Virginia constitutional convention of 1788, where he supported the new federal constitution with three speeches and his vote. Marshall's experience in the Continental Army, especially viewing the weakness of the Continental Congress and the later Confederation Congress, made him appreciate the need for a strong central government. His conservatism and aristocratic world view also made him deeply suspicious of democracy, and thus events such as Shays' Rebellion of 1786–1787 reinforced his belief in a stronger national government that would curb the popular passions of the people.

During the 1790s, Marshall served in the Virginia House of Delegates; as an envoy to France in 1797–1798, in what became known as the “XYZ Affair”; as a representative from Virginia in the U.S. House of Representatives; and finally as secretary of state under President John Adams. One of the interesting developments in this phase of Marshall’s career was his public disagreement with the high Federalists over the Sedition Act of 1798, which Marshall believed to be a political blunder. He did not attack the law’s constitutionality, noting in the Marshall–Lee paper that the First Amendment protected freedom of religion and the press, but not freedom to print libel.

The culmination of Marshall’s career, though, was as chief justice of the Supreme Court. He served in this role from 1801 until his death in 1835. His decisions and political skills helped him protect the Supreme Court’s independence from the political battles of the Federalists and Republicans in the first decade of the nineteenth century. In particular, the decision in Marbury v. Madison (1 Cranch 137, 1803), though perceived as unimportant at the time, asserted the right of judicial review for the Court. The Supreme Court thus acquired the right to pass judgment on the constitutionality of acts passed by Congress. The Marshall Court built upon this foundation of judicial review by declaring in two key cases—Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee (1816) and Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheaton 264 (1821)—that the Supreme Court had the power to review the decisions of state courts and to overturn these decisions if they were in error with federal constitutional interpretation.

Chief Justice Marshall, who wrote about half of the decisions involving constitutional interpretation, also strengthened the power of the national government at the expense of the states. This latter development can be clearly seen in the decisions in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheaton 316, 1819) and Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1 (1824). The first case involved the national bank, while the second concerned itself with steamship lines between New York and New Jersey. The chief justice was not always successful in weakening state power, as the case of Worcester v. Georgia (1832) revealed. Though the Court ruled against the state of Georgia, without the support of President Jackson, there was no way for the Court to enforce its decision.

Finally, Chief Justice Marshall also played a role in establishing the law on treason when he presided over the trial of Aaron Burr in 1807, which resulted in Burr’s acquittal because the government failed to produce two witnesses to an overt act of treason against the United States. The chief justice’s nationalism had its limits. In 1833, the Marshall Court ruled in Barron v. Mayor of Baltimore (7 Peters 243) that the Bill of Rights did not apply to the states. This case involved the seizure of property by the city of Baltimore and whether or not the Fifth Amendment forbade such a seizure. None of the amendments in the Bill of Rights could limit state power, argued Chief Justice Marshall. The Bill of Rights had been written to protect individual liberties from abuse by the national government, not the states. This case reflected the decline of nationalism in the jurisprudence of the Marshall Court from its heyday in the years from 1819 to 1824.

John Marshall’s influence upon the Supreme Court and the nation was immense. He strengthened the Court and made it an equal branch of government with the executive and legislative branches. His Court’s decisions also strengthened the powers of the national government, protected private property, and paved the way for the economic expansion in the last sixty-five years of the century.

JAMES C. FOLEY

References and Further Reading

- Newmyer, R. Kent. The Supreme Court Under Marshall and Taney. Arlington Heights, IL: Harlan Davidson, Inc., 1968.
- . John Marshall and the Heroic Age of the Supreme Court. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2001.
- Smith, Jean Edward. John Marshall: Definer of a Nation. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1996.
- Stites, Francis N. John Marshall: Defender of the Constitution. Boston: Little Brown and Company, 1981.
- White, G. Edward. The Marshall Court and Cultural Change, 1815–1835. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barron v. Mayor of Baltimore*, 7 Peters 243 (1833)
- Cohens v. Virginia*, 6 Wheaton 264 (1821)
- Dartmouth College v. Woodward*, 4 Wheaton 518 (1819)
- Fairfax’s Devisee v. Hunter’s Devisee* (1818)
- Fletcher v. Peck*, 6 Cranch 87 (1810)
- Gibbons v. Ogden* (1824)
- Marbury v. Madison*, 1 Cranch 137 (1803)
- Martin v. Hunter’s Lessee*, 1 Wheaton 304 (1816)
- McCulloch v. Maryland*, 4 Wheaton 316 (1819)
- Worcester v. Georgia* (1832)

MARSHALL, THURGOOD (1908–1993)

Early Life and Career as Civil Rights Advocate

Preeminent civil rights lawyer, federal appellate judge (1962–1965), solicitor general (1962–1965), and associate justice of the Supreme Court (1967–1991), Thurgood Marshall was the most visible and effective civil rights litigator of the twentieth century. While making historic contributions to equal protection jurisprudence, Marshall also expanded the judicial recognition of core constitutional protections of individual civil liberties.

Born into an African-American family in Baltimore, Marshall shortened his birth name “Thoroughgood” to Thurgood as a boy. He vividly remembered early experiences with racism and later described Baltimore as the most segregated city in the country. His father, a food service worker, counseled active resistance to racism and encouraged an interest in politics and law.

He graduated with honors from Lincoln University in Pennsylvania and enrolled at the law school at Howard University, which Charles Hamilton Houston had recently transformed from a municipal school specializing in training African-American lawyers to represent African Americans into a dynamic institution devoted to raising the profile of black lawyers and on training a new generation of lawyers to fight for equal rights.

After graduating first in his class from law school in 1933, Marshall opened a law office in Baltimore, but the economic depression and limited legal opportunities for African-American lawyers forced him to moonlight as a file clerk. He played a leading role in reviving the Baltimore chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

Within months of graduating from law school, Marshall was actively seeking legal opportunities to challenge Maryland’s segregated university system. NAACP challenges to Jim Crow laws were supported by the Garland Fund administered by Roger Baldwin (founder of the American Civil Liberties Union). In 1935, Marshall and Charles Hamilton Houston sued in Maryland state court for an order directing Maryland’s state law school to admit Donald Murray, an African-American graduate of Amherst College whose application had been denied. They won at the trial and the appellate levels, establishing that the state’s obligation to provide legal education could not be satisfied by sending Murray to an out-of-state school.

In 1936, Marshall joined Houston as staff counsel at the NAACP office in New York. He developed rapidly into an effective litigator and public speaker, serving as the NAACP’s sole full-time lawyer for several years after Houston left in 1938, and presiding as chief counsel over a growing legal staff until 1961. Soon after his arrival, the NAACP’s legal office was separately reorganized to maintain its tax-exempt status as the Legal Defense Fund.

As NAACP litigator, Marshall coordinated and participated in many of the leading civil rights cases of the mid-twentieth century. He acquired a reputation as a master trial lawyer and consummate appellate advocate. Counting his later work as solicitor general, he argued more than thirty cases before the Supreme Court.

Marshall also influenced NAACP strategy. For many years the American Civil Liberties Union informally forwarded race cases to the NAACP. Initially, the NAACP restricted its defense of criminal defendants to individuals who were innocent and the victims of racial discrimination. While Marshall was sensitive to the political cost of representing wrongdoers, he recognized the importance of individual rights. The NAACP mounted a broad opposition to peonage and successfully challenged coerced confessions in Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, 241 (1940); Canty v. Alabama, 309 U.S. 629 (1940); and White v. Texas, 309 U.S. 631 (1940)—cases that laid the foundation for the Supreme Court’s later ruling in Miranda v. Arizona, 348 U.S. 436 (1966).

The NAACP obtained signal victories in state courts, such as when California courts ruled that closed-shop unions could not exclude African Americans. It presented creative constitutional arguments supporting the expansion of minority rights. For example, in Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U.S. 373 (1946), Marshall successfully argued that the commerce clause prohibits segregated facilities on interstate public transportation; in Shelley v. Kramer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948), the Supreme Court expanded its view of state action to ban the judicial enforcement of private agreements prohibiting property sales to African Americans. During Marshall’s leadership, the NAACP mounted successful challenges to laws excluding African Americans from voting, persuading the Supreme Court to adopt a broader view of state action in a series of decisions definitively repudiating the constitutionality of white Democratic primaries.

NAACP legal strategy in the 1930s focused heavily on education with twin tactics of challenging unequal pay for black teachers and the exclusion of qualified black applicants from graduate and professional programs. Employing the prevailing constitutional doctrine of “separate but equal,” Marshall won many equalization cases challenging the lower salaries of African-American teachers. Following his success in desegregating Maryland’s law school, he mounted successful challenges in other states to the nonexistent or substantially unequal educational opportunities for African-American graduate and professional students.

Marshall always understood that segregated facilities, regardless of their quality, were designed to isolate African Americans and stigmatize them as an inferior race. In the 1940s, he began direct challenges to the constitutional foundations of legalized segregation. Public support grew after World War II for the NAACP's opposition to segregation, and the Justice Department began to file briefs supporting the NAACP in some cases. In Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1950), the Supreme Court did not expressly outlaw segregation, but it held that Texas must admit a qualified African-American applicant to its historically white law school because its new all-black law school was not "equal." The Court's opinion suggested that segregated professional schools might never be truly equal, hinting that the Court might be prepared to overrule the doctrine of "separate but equal."

Marshall directed legal strategy in and personally argued and reargued the cases that resulted in the definitive end to the Supreme Court's approval of segregated public schools in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954). Southern politicians adopted a policy of massive resistance, defying their constitutional obligation to dismantle state-run segregated programs. The Arkansas governor closed the Little Rock public schools rather than integrate them. Marshall took the case before the Supreme Court in Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1 (1958). The Supreme Court unanimously required Arkansas to reopen its schools and issued a forceful opinion vindicating the constitutional right of children to attend integrated schools and prohibiting Arkansas' attempt to violate that right by indirect means.

Political resistance indefinitely postponed the realization of the rights secured by many of Marshall's courtroom victories, and unlawful remnants of dual school systems remained in operation at the time of his death. Nevertheless, his legal victories altered the framework of legal debate, limiting the power of legislative bodies openly to discriminate against racial minorities through the pretext of separate but equal facilities, and opened a wide range of opportunities for individuals that were previously denied to them based on their race.

In the 1950s, Marshall became a prominent spokesman for civil rights, traveling and speaking throughout the country. In 1960, he visited Kenya and then spent seven weeks in London helping draft the new constitution for Kenya. He wrote the whole schedule of rights, which provided strong protections for the white minority and established free legal remedies for landowners whose lands were improperly taken.

Marshall's civil rights career provided a role model for other public interest lawyers. The NAACP's successes led it to be targeted by hostile state politicians. Its ultimate vindication before the Supreme Court in NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963), established an important precedent recognizing public interest litigation as an expressive activity and as a vehicle for securing rights protected by the First Amendment.

Judicial Career

In 1961, President Kennedy nominated Marshall to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. After delays caused by southern senators, he was confirmed later that year. He sat on the court until 1965 and authored more than 130 opinions. His opinion in Hetenyi v. Wilkins, 348 F.2d 844 (2d Cir. 1965), expanded the scope of the double jeopardy clause and announced the theme of later opinions that courts must be "faithful to the evolution of our societal values."

President Johnson appointed Marshall solicitor general in 1965. He served for two years in that capacity, arguing eighteen cases to the Supreme Court. In 1967, Johnson nominated Marshall to be an associate justice on the Supreme Court. He played an active role on the court until his retirement in 1991, first contributing to the Court's liberal majority under Chief Justice Earl Warren and then frequently dissenting against the conservative turn of the Burger and Rehnquist Courts.

Justice Marshall championed important expansions of civil liberties. In Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), he wrote the opinion that recognized that the First Amendment protects the right to possess certain materials: "this right to receive information and ideas, regardless of their social worth . . . is fundamental to our free society." He dissented in Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288 (1984), when the Court upheld government regulations that prevented homeless advocates from organizing sleeping camps on park property. He objected to the narrowing of the "least restrictive means" test by the majority in Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989). In Amalgamated Food Employees v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308 (1968), he wrote the opinion establishing that shopping malls should be treated as public areas for purposes of free-speech rights. He dissented as a conservative majority limited and eventually overruled Logan Valley Plaza in Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972), and Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976).

In appeals from desegregation orders and in later cases questioning affirmative action programs, Justice Marshall consistently maintained that deeply entrenched patterns of racial discrimination made it reasonable for states and the federal government to adopt broad remedial programs aimed at ending the continuing effects of discrimination. He insisted that the history and the purposes of the equal protection clause permitted such programs. He wrote stinging dissents in Regents of University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978), and other cases criticizing the Court's refusal to sustain affirmative action programs.

The justice's experience with the unequal application of capital punishment led him to oppose it from an early age. On the Court he and Justice William Brennan consistently maintained that the death penalty violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. In the face of legislative efforts restoring capital punishment, he argued forcefully in his dissent in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), that capital punishment violates evolving standards of informed citizens, that such punishment is inherently irrational, and that it is evil because it assumes "the total denial of the wrongdoer's dignity and worth."

Sympathetic to the economic goals of the New Deal and the social reform goals of Johnson's Great Society programs, Justice Marshall exercised judicial restraint in reviewing government and state actions that he believed were reasonable or benevolent in motive. He defended the constitutionality of broad limits on campaign spending in his separate opinion in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), and he joined the dissent in Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Ward, 470 U.S. 869 (1985), where the Supreme Court held that Alabama could not discriminate against nonresident insurance companies by imposing higher taxes.

At the same time, he was sensitive to the ways that laws could mask hostility to disfavored groups or individuals, and he engaged in more active judicial review of claims advanced by the powerless and disadvantaged. He wrote the opinion holding that states could not prevent citizens from voting who had not resided in state for one year (Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 1972). He employed equal protection arguments to strike down a Chicago ordinance that prevented picketing near schools except for labor disputes (Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 1972). He did not believe that legal procedures that were not supported by any reason or policy other than long-standing tradition were compatible with due process. He wrote the opinion in Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186 (1977), which required that state court jurisdiction must in all cases satisfy general constitutional standards of reasonableness and fairness.

As a former trial lawyer, Justice Marshall recognized the special importance of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. He opposed the onerous standards erected by the Supreme Court to prove "ineffective assistance of counsel" because he understood that these prevented meaningful review of cases in which criminal defendants did not receive adequate counsel at trial.

In Fourth Amendment cases he routinely voted with civil libertarians in requiring warrants and limiting exceptions to warrant requirements. In his dissent in Schneekloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973), he argued that consensual-search exceptions to the warrants should require informing suspects of their right to refuse to consent. In Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429 (1991), he similarly dissented from a decision admitting a dragnet search in which he perceived elements of police coercion.

Justice Marshall was a reliable supporter of First Amendment rights, though some scholars have questioned whether he developed a theoretically consistent approach to the First Amendment. Professor Smith concludes, "Whether he approached a case from a realist or a formalist position, the end result was nearly always a call for more liberty." Professor Wells theorizes that the justice's sympathy for First Amendment claims reflected his commitment to "the value of speech in promoting individual self-realization in a democratic society."

Justice Marshall worked to move the Court away from the prevailing formalism in its equal protection analysis that routinely affirmed disparate state treatments of classes not defined by race. Mark Tushnet, Justice Marshall's biographer and former clerk, maintains that the justice's most important contribution to constitutional doctrine was his "sliding-scale" theory of equal protection rights. Under prevailing equal protection analysis, legal distinctions based on race are suspect and are constitutional only when they clearly advance a compelling and legal state policy. In contrast, legal distinctions on other grounds are constitutional when they are supported by any lawful state policy. Justice Marshall proposed a more flexible standard that provided real protection for other disfavored persons besides racial minorities and that also respected valid state political goals.

In dissenting opinions he offered the vision of broader constitutional rights, including equal educational opportunity and access to medical treatment. He dissented from a decision permitting the exclusion of women from draft registration and from a decision approving laws that mandated retirement at a certain age.

Marshall's career exhibited an unflagging recognition that a free society, "true democracy," required genuine equality. Accordingly, he viewed the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee of equal protection and the incorporation of the Bill of Rights under the due process clause as providing “a new, more promising basis for justice and equality” for all.

Marshall married Vivian (“Buster”) in 1929. She died of lung cancer in February 1955. He married Cecilia Suyatt in December 1955 and they had two children, Thurgood, Jr. and John.

Despite the passage of time and the eclipse of progressive and egalitarian values on the Supreme Court, Justice Marshall’s reputation endures among civil libertarians and legal theorists. He is venerated by the marginalized communities to whom he gave a voice. While his immediate effect on the Supreme Court was limited, his legacy endures in the vision of the power of constitutional law to secure freedom in a democratic political system marked by deep racial and social divisions.

MICHAEL H. HOFFHEIMER

References and Further Reading

- Ball, Howard. A Defiant Life: Thurgood Marshall and the Persistence of Racism in America. New York: Crown Publishers, Inc., 1999.
- Bland, Randall Walton. Private Pressure on Public Law: The Legal Career of Thurgood Marshall. Prot Washington, Kennikat Press, 1973.
- . Thurgood Marshall: Crusader for Liberalism: His Judicial Philosophy 1908–1993. Bethesda, MD: Academia Press, 2001.
- Green, Bruce A., and Daniel Richman, Of Laws and Men: An Essay on Justice Marshall’s View of Criminal Procedure, Arizona State Law Journal 26 (1994): 369.
- Marshall, Thurgood, Reflections on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution, Harvard Law Review 101 (1987): 1.
- . Thurgood Marshall: His Speeches, Writings, Arguments, Opinions, and Reminiscences. Mark V. Tushnett, ed. Chicago: Lawrence Hill Books, 2001.
- . Supreme Justice: Speeches and Writings. J. Clay Smith, Jr., ed. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.
- Mello, Michael. Against the Death Penalty: The Relentless Dissents of Justices Brennan and Marshall. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1996.
- Smith, J. Clay, Jr., Justice Thurgood Marshall and the First Amendment, Arizona State Law Journal 26 (1994): 461–478.
- Steiker, The Long Road up From Barbarism: Thurgood Marshall and the Death Penalty, Texas Law Review 71 (1993): 1131.
- Tushnett, Mark V. Making Civil Rights Law: Thurgood Marshall and the Supreme Court, 1936–1961. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- . Making Constitutional Law: Thurgood Marshall and the Supreme Court, 1961–1991. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Wells, N. Douglas, Thurgood Marshall and “Individual Self-Realization” in First Amendment Jurisprudence, Tennessee Law Review 61 (1993): 237–287.
- Williams, Juan. Thurgood Marshall: American Revolutionary. New York: Random House, 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Amalgamated Food Employees v. Logan Valley Plaza*, 391 U.S. 308 (1968)
- Brown v. Board of Education*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Buckley v. Valeo*, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)
- Canty v. Alabama*, 309 U.S. 629 (1940)
- Chambers v. Florida*, 309 U.S. 227, 241 (1940)
- Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence*, 468 U.S. 288 (1984)
- Cooper v. Aaron*, 358 U.S. 1 (1958)
- Dunn v. Blumstein*, 405 U.S. 330 (1972)
- Florida v. Bostick*, 501 U.S. 429 (1991)
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
- Hetenyi v. Wilkins*, 348 F.2d 844 (2d Cir. 1965)
- Hudgens v. NLRB*, 424 U.S. 507 (1976)
- Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner*, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)
- Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Ward*, 470 U.S. 869 (1985)
- Morgan v. Virginia*, 328 U.S. 373 (1946)
- NAACP v. Button*, 371 U.S. 415 (1963)
- Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley*, 408 U.S. 92 (1972)
- Regents of University of California v. Bakke*, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)
- Schneekloth v. Bustamonte*, 412 U.S. 218 (1973)
- Shaffer v. Heitner*, 433 U.S. 186 (1977)
- Shelley v. Kramer*, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)
- Stanley v. Georgia*, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)
- Sweatt v. Painter*, 339 U.S. 629 (1950)
- Ward v. Rock Against Racism*, 491 U.S. 781 (1989)
- White v. Texas*, 309 U.S. 631 (1940)

See also Brown v. Board of Education*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954); Capital Punishment; Fourteenth Amendment; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)

MARTIN v. OHIO, 480 U.S. 228 (1987)

After being assaulted by her husband, the defendant killed him as he approached her. The trial court instructed the jury that it must find that the prosecution established, beyond a reasonable doubt, the following elements of aggravated murder in order to return a guilty verdict: with purpose and with prior calculation and design, causing the death of another. The jury was also instructed that although it could consider the defendant’s evidence of self-defense in determining the defendant’s guilt, she bore the burden of persuasion on proving to the jury, by a preponderance of the evidence, the defense of self-defense. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, which two state appellate courts affirmed.

Affirming the conviction, the Supreme Court ruled that since the jury could consider self-defense even if the defendant did not meet her burden of persuasion, and that proving self-defense did not disprove any of the elements of the offense, allocating the burden of persuasion to the defendant did not violate constitutional standards of due process. Although the imminence element of self-defense (requiring a defendant to believe the victim posed an imminent danger) might typically negate the element of prior calculation and design, the Court found that it would not invariably do so. As a result, constitutionally the prosecution need not bear the burden of persuasion on disproving a defense unless the defense directly and explicitly negates an element of the offense. However, Martin's influence has been limited; most states allocate the burden of persuasion on self-defense to the prosecution.

RUSSELL L. CHRISTOPHER

References and Further Reading

Fletcher, George P. Basic Concepts of Criminal Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Robinson, Paul H. Criminal Law Defenses. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing Co., 1984.

See also Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977); Self-Defense; Ulster County Court v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140 (1979)

MARYLAND "DECLARATION OF RIGHTS" (1776)

See Bills of Rights in Early State Constitutions.

MARYLAND TOLERATION ACT (1649)

In 1629, George Calvert, first Lord Baltimore, established the Maryland colony as a haven for English Catholics. George died in 1632 and his son, Cecilus, or Cecil, Calvert, second Lord Baltimore, developed the colony and became its first proprietor. Cecil, Lord Baltimore, sent his younger brother, Leonard Calvert Maryland, to run the colony. The Stuart monarch supported this colony, but religious freedom for Catholics was undermined by the English Civil War. With the death of Leonard Calvert in 1647, Puritans seized the colony, arrested a number of Catholic leaders and priests, and brought an end to toleration in Maryland. However, in 1649, control of the colony reverted back to the Calverts. At this point Cecil, Lord Baltimore, wrote "An Act Concerning Religion," which is better known as the Maryland Toleration Act. The Maryland legislature adopted this law on September 21, 1649.

The Maryland Toleration Act is often cited as the beginning of religious freedom in America. This understanding of the act is true, but only in the most limited ways. Officially titled An Act Concerning Religion, this law was designed to protect Trinitarian Christians in the Maryland colony. The law provided that "noe person or persons whatsoever within this Province . . . professing to believe in Jesus Christ, shall from henceforth bee any waies troubled, Molested or dicountenanced for or in respect of his or her religion nor in the free exercise thereof." At the time, Catholics faced severe persecution in England. Thus, the act was a significant step forward in the struggle for religious liberty. This was also the first use of the term "free exercise thereof," which would later be used in the First Amendment.

The act did not however, offer religious freedom in the modern sense of the term. The law was draconian in its punishment of dissenters and people of other faiths. The statute provided that anyone who should deny our Saviour Jesus Christ to bee the sonne of God, or shall deny the holy Trinity the father sonne and holy Ghost, or the Godhead of any of the said Three persons of the Trinity or the Unity of the Godhead, or shall use or utter any reproachfull Speeches, words or language concerning the said Holy Trinity, or any of the said three persons thereof, shalbe punished with death and confiscation or forfeiture of all his or her lands and goods.

Jews, Unitarians, skeptics of any kind, and of course any nonbelievers might be executed under this provision. Later in the century, a Jewish merchant would be sentenced to death for his faith, but in the end he would merely be expelled from the colony.

The law also tried to regulate religious discussion. Thus, anyone who might "utter any reproachfull words or Speeches concerning the blessed Virgin Mary the Mother of our Saviour or the holy Apostles or Evangelists" could be fined, imprisoned, or whipped; have his property confiscated; or be expelled from the colony. Fines and imprisonment might also be meted out to anyone who in a reproachful manner or Way declare call or denominate any person or persons whatsoever inhabiting, residing, traffiqueing, trading or comerceing within this Province . . . an heritick, Scismatick, Idolator, puritan, Independant, Prespiterian popish prest, Jesuite, Jesuited papist, Lutheran, Calvenist, Anabaptist, Brownist, Antinomian, Barrowist, Roundhead, Separatist, or any other name or terme in a reproachfull manner relating to matter of Religion.

Finally, the statute provided penalties for anyone who might "prophance the Sabbath or Lords day" by swearing, being drunk, working unnecessarily, or failing to attend church.

The goal of the statute was to create harmony between Protestants and Catholics in a colony that had been founded by a Roman Catholic proprietor, Lord Baltimore, but was populated mostly by Protestants. The act did not accomplish much. In 1654, the Puritan-controlled colonial legislature repealed the act and banned Roman Catholics from living in the colony. However, Oliver Cromwell interceded and once again restored the Calverts to power. In 1658, Maryland reenacted the Toleration Act. After the Glorious Revolution, the Catholic Calverts lost all control of the colony, and in 1692 the newly appointed royal governor removed all Catholics from power by requiring all office holders to take a Protestant oath. By 1702, the Church of England had been established as the official church of the colony. Catholics were allowed to settle in Maryland and practice their faith, but could not hold office, and after 1718 could not vote. By the time of the Revolution, Maryland had distanced itself from its brief flirtation with some form of religious toleration.

The act of 1649 illustrates the limited notions of religious freedom in the seventeenth century, while at the same time demonstrating that some leaders understood that religious toleration could produce a peaceful society. In the act, Lord Baltimore explained why such legislation was necessary. Baltimore wrote that: “the inforcing of the conscience in matters of Religion hath frequently fallen out to be of dangerous Consequence in those commonwealths where it hath been practised, And for the more quiett and peaceable governement of this Province, and the better to preserve mutuall Love and amity amongst the Inhabitants” free exercise for Trinitarian Christians would be protected in the colony.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Curry, Thomas J. The First Freedoms: Church and State in America to the Passage of the First Amendment. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Krugler, John D. “Lord Baltimore, Roman Catholics, and Toleration: Religious Policy During the Early Catholic Years, 1632–1649.” Catholic Historical Review 65 (1979): 49–75.

MARYLAND v. BUIE, 494 U.S. 325 (1990)

Police officers making an in-home arrest may face danger from other, unknown, persons present who could attack the officers during or after the arrest. Consequently, officers in such circumstances usually conduct a cursory inspection of the premises to ensure their safety. This is referred to as a “protective sweep.” Historically, this sweep included the entire structure in which the arrest took place.

In Maryland v. Buie the U.S. Supreme Court placed some restrictions on the police protective sweep authority. The Court held that police officers may, incident to an arrest in a home, conduct a limited protective sweep of any areas “immediately adjacent” to where the arrest takes place without probable cause or even reasonable suspicion that an attack is imminent. This protective sweep was justified as incident to the arrest, per the rule developed in Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969). Additionally, the Court held that, in order for police officers to conduct a more extensive search of the entire residence, they must have a “reasonable and articulable” suspicion that someone may be hiding there.

Maryland v. Buie gives officers the ability to protect themselves and others from potential danger during an arrest while at the same time preserving Fourth Amendment rights to freedom from unreasonable searches. The Court used the Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), reasonable suspicion test to place some limits on the police authority to rummage throughout a home simply because an arrest occurred there. Unfortunately, the Supreme Court neglected to define “immediately adjacent,” leaving this to lower courts to sort out.

VALERIE R. BELL

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969)

See also Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Stop and Frisk; Warrantless Search

MARYLAND v. CRAIG, 497 U.S. 836 (1990)

Craig was convicted in a Maryland state court for sexually abusing a child. During the trial the judge permitted the girl to testify out of court on a one-way closed-circuit television pursuant to a state statute that permitted this procedure in cases in which the trial judge finds that the child would suffer trauma if she were required to testify in court in the presence of the defendant. The issue was whether this procedure violated the Sixth Amendment’s confrontation clause. In upholding the conviction (five to four), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the procedure did not violate Craig’s confrontation rights.

The Court observed that the clause’s primary purpose is to ensure the reliability of evidence by subjecting it to rigorous adversarial testing. In furtherance of this purpose the confrontation right encompasses several rights such as physical presence in court and cross-examination, but does not include an absolute right to face-to-face confrontation with a witness. Instead, an arrangement such as the one used in this case is acceptable when necessary to further an important government policy and the other aspects of the confrontation right, such as cross-examination, are preserved. Protecting a child from the trauma that might result from testifying in court is a sufficiently important interest so long as there was evidence to support the judge's findings regarding that child. Inasmuch as the trial judge in this case made the specific findings as required by the statute and the other aspects of the confrontation right were protected, the procedure did not violate the confrontation clause.

STEVEN B. DOW

References and Further Reading

- Cecchetti–Whaley, Gail D., Note: Children as Witnesses After Maryland v. Craig, Southern California Law Review 65 (1992): 1993–2037.
- Goodhue, George K., Comment: Maryland v. Craig: Balancing Sixth Amendment Confrontation Rights With the Rights of Child Witnesses in Sexual Abuse Trials, New England Law Review 26 (1991): 497–528.
- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure, 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Maryland Courts and Judicial Procedure Code Annotated Section 9-102 (1989)
- U.S. Constitution, Amendment VI

See also Confrontation Clause; Defense, Right to Present

MASON, GEORGE (1725–1792)

A sometimes grouchy Virginia gentleman who always preferred to stay at home and keep to himself, George Mason nonetheless allowed himself on several occasions to be lured into public service. Mason's father died when Mason was eleven years old, and he left Mason a sizable plantation on the banks of the Potomac River, only a few miles from Mount Vernon and Mason's Virginia neighbor, George Washington.

Bothered as an adult by gout, impatience, and a generally cantankerous disposition, Mason had few friends outside his family, but he was respected within his community for his education, his good judgment, and his business sense. A man of deep conviction, on several occasions he refused nomination for public office, since he also disliked the compromise and minutiae that often accompanied political service.

When the British parliament passed the Stamp Act in 1766 requiring American colonists to pay a tax on all legal or public documents, Mason and others were infuriated. Decrying Parliament's authority to tax colonists, who had no representation in Parliament, Mason wrote letters to other influential citizens of Virginia and formed a base of organized resistance. At first they focused on rationalizing their position on British common law and tradition, and when Parliament repealed the act, it was seen as a victory for colonial civil rights. But the Declaratory Act, which reaffirmed Parliament's right to pass legislation for the American colonies, made Mason and other colonial constitutionalists even angrier.

Mason and Washington drew up a set of nonimportation resolves, a voluntary association of Virginia planters and merchants that aimed to put economic pressure on British merchants and, ultimately, on Parliament. To enforce the boycott, Mason suggested posting a public list of all those Virginians who violated the agreement and subjecting them to public scorn, but Washington disagreed and changed Mason's mind. The resolves did organize local watchdog committees to ensure that all Virginians who had political aspirations complied, and they reported violators.

After the Boston Tea Party, Parliament again asserted its authority over the colonies by passing the Intolerable Acts and closing Boston harbor. Mason responded by writing twenty-four resolutions, which he had Washington introduce into the Virginia House of Burgesses. The Fairfax Resolves invoked the colonists' rights as Englishmen, emphasized their right to resort to extralegal measures if those rights were threatened, and called for an extensive boycott on British goods. When Washington was appointed as commander in chief of the Continental army, Mason was elected to fill his Fairfax County seat in the House of Burgesses.

When reconciliation with England began to look unlikely, and when leaders from the Continental Congress sent word to the states that they should begin constructing state constitutions, other burgesses looked to Mason. Assigned to a committee in the spring of 1776 to draft the new constitution, Mason and his committee quickly wrote the preamble, also known as the Virginia Declaration of Rights. Mason favored the first ten articles, which began, "That all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights . . ."

Besides declaring equality before the law for all citizens of the state and reminding the government that all power and sovereignty reside in the citizens and therefore that the government serves at the pleasure of its citizens, Mason's articles established a three-branch government and guaranteed rights for persons accused of a crime. The committee added six other articles affirming freedom of the press and religion and then presented it to the other burgesses for consideration. It passed unanimously after the House removed two of the articles added by the committee. Bearing unmistakable similarities to John Locke's writings some one hundred years before, the Declaration of Rights was based on a long tradition of value for basic human rights of life, liberty, and the right to enjoy one's property.

Several weeks after the Virginia Constitution was ratified, Thomas Jefferson and his committee sat down in Philadelphia to write the Declaration of Independence. Jefferson opened his document with language similar to Mason's: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal . . ." Historians know that Jefferson had a copy of Mason's Declaration with him as he wrote his document, and he frequently admitted that Mason, Locke, and others influenced his work.

After the Revolution was over and the Articles of Confederacy proved to be a failure, politicians (including Mason) again congregated in Philadelphia, this time to write a new constitution. For months they argued and debated as they drafted a new founding document. Mason made his opinions known frequently, but when the document was finished, Mason vehemently disliked it. Stating that he would rather cut off his right hand than sign the document, Mason faulted it for its failure to include a bill of rights; he felt the Constitution gave too much power to the judicial branch, and he believed it formed a powerful aristocracy that would tend to retain power too long. The Constitution was distributed to the states anyway, having passed with the requisite two-thirds majority; each state was to vote on the issue of ratification. Mason and Patrick Henry conducted a campaign against ratification, but his neighbor and political ally, George Washington, campaigned equally strenuously in favor of ratification. The Constitution was eventually ratified over Mason's protests, by merely ten votes, and Mason retired to Gunston Hall. He lived at home in retirement until he passed away in 1792.

Abrasive and impatient, Mason was never adored like Washington, even in his own state. His uncompromising personality made him more enemies than allies during his career. But he always sought to protect liberty from the encroachment of government, first against the oppressive British powers, then against the U.S. government. He hated politics, and he only reluctantly served in official positions. But he wrote a document in Virginia that captured the thinking of revolutionary intellectual thought, and he provided inspiration for one of the country's most celebrated documents. He was, perhaps, the grandfather of the Declaration of Independence, the U.S. Constitution, and the Bill of Rights.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

Rutland, Robert A. George Mason, Reluctant Statesman. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1961.

MASSACHUSETTS BODY OF LIBERTIES OF 1641

For approximately the first decade of the Massachusetts Bay Colony's existence, there was considerable internal strife over what manner of a legal system ought to exist. Also, during that time, the British government had made two attempts to revoke the charter that existed in the colony. For these reasons, the settlers sought to write their own laws. Most of the Puritans, including John Winthrop, wanted a theocratic oligarchy, while others sought after a more representative government. Eventually, Nathaniel Ward, a leading English Puritan minister who was trained as a lawyer and had practiced law in the courts in England, drew a great deal on the code of law proposed by John Cotton in 1636.

This code was based on Mosaic principles and the common law, the early English law. The early English law was developed by judges. It integrated Anglo-Saxon tribal custom, feudal rules and practices, and the everyday rules and behavior of the local people. The merging of the Mosaic principles and the common law resulted in the Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641, a detailed document that was one of the most important and underappreciated documents in America's history. It was established by the Massachusetts General Court in December 1641 under the administration of Richard Bellingham, who was then the governor. It was the first code of about ninety-eight articles that were established as the basis for justice in seventeenth-century colonial New England. It comprised civil and criminal laws that governed specific behavior and punishment. The Massachusetts Body of Liberties, in the words of Winthrop, was "a body of grounds of law in resemblance to a Magna Carta."

The Massachusetts Body of Liberties provided for freedom of speech and the right to assembly and petition at public meetings. In fact, the liberties had their roots in biblical teachings, and were a declaration of the "liberties that the Lord Jesus had given to the church." Particularly noteworthy in this regard of the ninety-eight articles of the Body of Liberties was Section 11, Article 95, which, for the first time, gave ministers legal authority to assemble to discuss controversial issues that pertained to the Bible and religious teachings. In addition, Section 4 of Article 95 stated that “every church hath free liberty of admission, recommendation, dismissal, and expulsion, or deposal of their officers and members, upon due cause, with free exercise of the discipline and censures of Christ according to the rules of his Word.”

It was not surprising, then, that in regard to offenses that were undertaken in the courts, the law was based on the moral interpretation of the Bible. In this respect, references to books, chapters, and verses from the Bible were supplied to channel the interpretation of the law during the court trials. In addition, the Massachusetts Body of Liberties provided for the liberties of men, women, children, servants, foreigners, and animals, and “every man whether inhabitant or foreigner, free or not free” had the “liberty to come to any public Court, Council or Town meeting, and either by speech or writing to move any lawful, seasonal and material question, or present any necessary motion, complaint, petition or Bill or information, whereof that meeting has proper cognizance.”

As well, it guaranteed the defendant’s right of a trial by a jury and to have the right of legal counsel. In addition, it recognized that individual liberty depended on the right to appeal to the courts as the final option. These rights and liberties were “audibly read and deliberately weighed at every General Court that [were] held.” Nevertheless, the Massachusetts Body of Liberties did not make these rights explicitly inalienable. In other words, they could have been altered by the legislature. However, they persisted in Massachusetts for many generations and later appeared in the writings of Samuel Adams, a leader of the Boston Tea Party, and his contemporaries.

Eventually, in 1684, King Charles II was successful in revoking the Body of Liberties and the English law was restored. Two years later, King James established a government in Massachusetts and made Sir Edmond Andros the governor of the colony for a short period. The Massachusetts Body of Liberties served its intended purpose and remained in force until 1692 with the advent of the Provincial Charter. More importantly, the Massachusetts Body of Liberties provided a benchmark for the Bill of Rights and the U.S. Constitution of 1787. The Constitution is looked upon by Americans as the fabric of American democracy.

SHERROW O. PINDER

References and Further Reading

Black, Barbara, A. “The Concept of a Supreme Court: Massachusetts Bay. 1630–1686.” In The History of the Law in Massachusetts: The Supreme Judicial Court 1692–1992, Russell K. Osgood, ed. Boston: Supreme Judicial Court Historical Society, 1992.

Fischer, David, H. Albion’s Seed: Four British Folkways in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Fischer, Kirsten, and Hindertaker, eds. Colonial American History. Massachusetts: Blackwell Publishing Ltd., 2002.

Wall, Robert E. Massachusetts Bay: The Crucial Decade, 1640–1650. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1972.

MASSES PUBLISHING COMPANY v. PATTEN, 244 U.S. 535 (1917)

This case represents an early step in refining the circumstances under which the federal government might punish a person for publishing materials deemed to be likely to incite action against the government or its programs and activities. Because of concerns that antiwar activity would compromise U.S. efforts to pursue its objectives in World War I, Congress passed the Espionage Act of 1917 and subsequently extended its provisions with the Sedition Act of 1918. The law punished efforts to interfere with the armed forces or with the draft. It also authorized certain forms of censorship, including allowing banning from the mails, at the discretion of the postmaster general, of materials considered treasonous or seditious. A large number of prosecutions and convictions resulted from vigorous use of the law, and it ultimately was the basis for a number of groundbreaking court rulings on freedom of expression.

The issue that prompted the Masses suit was vigorous use of the law, and it ultimately was the basis for a number of groundbreaking Court rulings on freedom. It arose when the New York postmaster invoked provisions of the Espionage Act to refuse to distribute the radical magazine The Masses, which he described as “nonmailable.” Under the editorship of antiwar leftist Max Eastman, the Masses was described by its editorial staff as a “revolutionary” publication, often publishing material by such left-leaning authors as Big Bill Haywood, leader of the Industrial Workers of the World, and communist journalist John Reed. Postmaster Patten contended that the magazine’s contents, including articles and cartoons critical of U.S. participation in World War I, constituted a violation of all three clauses of Title I, Section 3, of the Espionage Act, which made it a crime to do anything to obstruct the war effort.

The magazine brought suit challenging the ban in the Federal District Court for the Southern District of New York, presided over by Judge Learned Hand. The judge granted the requested injunction against the postmaster. In so doing, he struck an early blow for protection of freedom of expression, although he did not base his decision on the First Amendment. Rather, Judge Hand rejected the postmaster's interpretation of the law as punishing material that had a "bad tendency." The judge acknowledged the validity of the postmaster's contention that the law might well arouse unrest among the people, causing them to criticize the war effort and the draft, and to wish to follow the lead of well-known antiwar demonstrators. Yet, he refused to accept the contention that such action constituted obstruction of the war effort. Judge Hand was concerned with the vagueness inherent in the bad-tendency doctrine, contending that its lack of specificity in defining actions that were illegal would make it virtually impossible for alleged violators to defend themselves against the government's charges. He contended that language should be deemed punishable only if it constituted direct advocacy of antiwar actions or direct interference with the draft.

Judge Hand's decision did not win over other judges. A circuit judge stayed the injunction while rejecting the judge's argument, and the full Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed his opinion altogether. The judge changed course a few years later, becoming an advocate of the clear-and-present-danger test established by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., in his majority opinion in Schenck v. U.S., 249 U.S. 47 (1919).

Judge Hand's opinion in Masses was significant because it rejected a blanket interpretation of the Espionage Act of 1917 to allow the government to punish any and all types of expression critical of the U.S. war effort in World War I. While Hand was willing to acknowledge that the government might restrict freedom of expression in wartime, he argued that the laws passed in so doing must be interpreted carefully so as not to be overbroad in their application. The decision reflects current thinking that freedom of speech should be interpreted to apply primarily to political speech and that the common law, rather than the First Amendment, should be regarded as its basis.

The judge's decision in Masses, although an important early step in what would become a long and difficult process in defining the reach of free speech, was out of step with the prevailing judicial thinking at the time, which was reflected in a series of U.S. Supreme Court decisions upholding enforcement of the Espionage Act against antiwar activists. It was to be several decades before judicial thinking eventually devised a much broader definition of freedom of expression, a process that some scholars argue culminated with the Supreme Court's decision in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969).

REBECCA S. SHOEMAKER

References and Further Reading

Gunther, Gerald, Learned Hand and the Origins of the Modern First Amendment: Some Fragments of History, Stanford Law Review 27 (1975): 719–773.
———. Learned Hand: The Man and the Judge. New York: Knopf, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

See also Bad Tendency Test; Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969); Clear and Present Danger Test; Hand, (Billings) Learned; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

MASSIAH v. UNITED STATES, 377 U.S. 201 (1964)

The Sixth Amendment guarantees an accused person the effective assistance of counsel. In Massiah v. United States, the Supreme Court found that the Sixth Amendment could apply even when the accused is unaware that he needs assistance.

After being indicted for violating federal narcotics law, Massiah retained a lawyer and was released on bail. Prior to a meeting with Massiah and without his knowledge, codefendant Colson, who was cooperating with government agents, allowed a federal agent to install a radio transmitter under the front seat of his automobile. This transmitter allowed the agent to overhear conversations in Colson's car, including one in which Massiah made incriminating statements. At Massiah's trial, the agent testified to these statements, over defense counsel's objection, and Massiah was convicted.

The Court determined that the government's use of Massiah's statements denied him Sixth Amendment protection. Earlier cases had described the assistance of counsel as vital during the period between arraignment and trial. Although Massiah did not realize that a government agent was listening, the Court reasoned he was still entitled to counsel because he had been indicted. The Court held that the Sixth Amendment bars the use at trial of a criminal defendant's statements when those statements have been deliberately elicited by federal agents after indictment and in the absence of counsel.

Later cases expanded Massiah by holding that a criminal defendant's right to counsel arises when adversarial judicial proceedings have been initiated against him, not just after indictment. This right applies to deliberate elicitation, surreptitious or not, by government agents.

MARGARET M. LAWTON

References and Further Reading

- American Jurisprudence*, 2nd ed., vol. 21A (Criminal Law), sec. 1206 (West Group, 1998), and vol. 29A (Evidence), sec. 750 (Lawyers Cooperative Publishing, 1994).
 Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Procedure, 3rd ed. LexisNexis Publishing, 2002, pp. 508–523.
 LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure, vol. 2. Criminal Practice Series. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999, chapter 6, sec. 4(b-e).
Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159 (1985).
 Tomkovicz, James J., An Adversary System Defense of the Right to Counsel Against Informants: Truth, Fair Play, and the Massiah Doctrine, University of California Davis Law Review 22 (1988): 1–92.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brewer v. Williams*, 430 U.S. 387 (1977)
Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972)
Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436 (1986)
Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264 (1980)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Rights of the Accused; Right to Counsel; Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959)

MATERIAL WITNESSES

A material witness is an individual who has unique information about a crime, beneficial to defense or prosecution. Without this person to provide testimony, the matter may not be resolved. The term is most often used when there is a concern that this witness may flee or otherwise become unavailable to testify and the government seeks to have the witness held against his or her will to ensure the presence at trial or grand jury. While many states have respective material witness statutes, the current federal material witness statute went through its biggest revision as a part of the Bail Reform Act of 1984 and is codified at Section 3144 of Title 18 of the U.S. Code.

Generally, in order for the government to obtain a material witness warrant, it is necessary that a party demonstrate that the witness has information “material” to a criminal proceeding—whether at trial or grand jury proceeding—and that it may become impracticable to secure the witness’s presence at the proceeding by normal subpoena. Once arrested, a material witness may be detained for a reasonable period, until his testimony can be secured. Material witnesses who are to be considered for detention are entitled to certain basic procedural safeguards which include the right to counsel, notice of the allegations relied upon for detention, a hearing before a magistrate judge, the opportunity to be heard in person and to present witnesses and documentary evidence, and written findings by the judge as to the reason for any adverse decision detaining the witness.

While one of the cornerstones of the American justice system is the requirement that a person be neither subjected to an unreasonable seizure nor deprived of liberty without due process of law, a witness could conceivably be held indefinitely while a grand jury or successive grand juries investigated a case. The Supreme Court has stated that a statute that permits indefinite detention of people, except in such cases as a criminal conviction or a finding that a person poses a threat to himself or others as the result of mental illness, would raise a serious constitutional problem under the due process clause (Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 690, 2001). With the attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001, material witness laws have been brought to the forefront as an investigatory tool for the government; it is anticipated that further litigation and legislation will continue to grow from this once rarely used law.

ROBERT DON GIFFORD

References and Further Reading

- Carlson, Ronald L., Jailing the Innocent: The Plight of the Material Witness, Iowa Law Review 55 (1969–1970): 1.
 Studnicki, Stacey M., and John P. Apol, Witness Detention and Intimidation: The History and Future of Material Witness Law, St. John’s Law Review 76 (2002): 483.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Zadvydas v. Davis*, 533 U.S. 678, 690 (2001) 18 U.S.C. 3144
 The First Judiciary Act of Sept. 24, 1789, ch. 20 §§ 30, 33, 1 Stat. 73

MATHIS v. UNITED STATES, 391 U.S. 1 (1968)

While he was in state prison, the petitioner was visited and questioned by an agent from the Internal Revenue Service for a “routine investigation” of tax returns he filed in 1960 and 1961. Without being warned of his right to remain silent, his right to counsel, or that any information he might give could be used against him, the petitioner responded to the agent’s questions. Statements and documents obtained from the petitioner during these visits were later used as evidence to convict him of knowingly filing false tax returns. The court of appeals affirmed the conviction.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed. Pursuant to its decision in Miranda v. Arizona, 348 U.S. 436 (1966), the Court held that when an individual is in government custody and interrogated on matters that may incriminate him, he must be warned beforehand of his right to remain silent and his right to counsel. Any information obtained, absent these warnings, must be excluded from trial. The Court's decision therefore extended the Miranda warning requirement in two important ways. First, it was made clear that tax investigations of people in government custody necessitate a Miranda warning. Under the Court analysis, since tax investigations are often made in contemplation of a criminal prosecution, the person under investigation needs to be warned of his or her rights. Second, the Court's decision made it clear that a Miranda warning is required to be given to a person in custody even when, as here, the investigation is unconnected to the reason why the person is in custody.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

Israel, Jerold H., and Wayne R. LaFare. Criminal Procedure in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 348 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Miranda Warning; Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution

MATTERS OF PUBLIC CONCERN STANDARD IN FREE SPEECH CASES

The public concern standard has operated primarily in two categories of free-speech cases: those involving speech by government employees and those involving defamation. In both, the public concern standard limits the constitutional protection of speech. The Supreme Court has held that government employee speech must relate to a matter of public concern to be protected from retaliation by employers (Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563, 1968).

If speech meets this threshold test of public concern, a balancing test is applied. If the interests of the employer in providing efficient government outweigh the employee's speech interests, the employer can discipline the employee based on the speech. In defamation cases, the Court held in Dun & Bradstreet v. Greenmoss Builders, 472 U.S. 749 (1985), that the First Amendment is not implicated when the plaintiff claiming defamation is not a public figure and the allegedly defamatory speech does not relate to a matter of public concern. Accordingly, the plaintiff need not prove actual malice to obtain damages under state law.

Determining when speech is a matter of public concern has not proved to be an easy task. In Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983), the Court indicated that matters of public concern are those of "political, social or other concern to the community." The content, form, and context of the speech will determine whether it is protected, with content the most important factor. The manner, time, and place of delivery are encompassed within this test. The speaker's motive alone does not determine whether speech is protected, but may be a relevant factor.

The standard has been applied most frequently in employee speech cases. In Connick, the Court concluded that speech that relates to an employee's personal grievance does not rise to the level of public concern, even if it raises questions about the efficient functioning of the government, for every employee complaint is not a constitutional matter. But in Ran-kin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378 (1987), the employee's statement to a coworker about the attempted assassination of President Reagan that "if they go for him again, I hope they get him" met the threshold. The Court noted that the statement was in the context of a discussion on the president's policies and just after the attempt on his life. Additionally, the Court indicated in Givhan v. Western Line Consolidated School District, 439 U.S. 410 (1979), that discrimination is inherently a matter of public concern.

In the October 2005 term, in Garcetti v. Ceballos (361 F.3d. 1168, 9th Cir. 2004, cert. granted, 125 S. Ct. 1395, 2005), the Court considered whether an employee's speech in the course of his job duties is protected when it deals with a matter of public concern. The employer is arguing that such speech is not protected; instead, the protection only inheres in citizen speech by a government employee. If this argument prevails, some employee speech designed to bring governmental wrongdoing to public light will lose protection. Regardless of the outcome, the decision in this case will provide further guidance to the lower courts, employers, and employees in determining what is protected employee speech and it may modify the public concern requirement in government employee speech cases.

ANN C. HODGES

References and Further Reading

Deskbook Encyclopedia of Public Employment Law. Malvern, PA: Center for Education and Employment Law, 2005.

Estlund, Cynthia Y., Speech on Matters of Public Concern: The Perils of an Emerging First Amendment Category, George Washington Law Review 59 (1990): 1.
 Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech, vol. 2. Eagan, MN: Thomson/West, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983)
Dun & Bradstreet v. Greenmoss Builders, 472 U.S. 749 (1985)
Garcetti v. Ceballos, 361 F.3d. 1168 (9th Cir. 2004), cert. granted, 125 S. Ct. 1395 (2005)
Givhan v. Western Line Consolidated School District, 439 U.S. 410 (1979)
Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378 (1987)

See also Defamation and Free Speech; Disciplining Public Employees for Expressive Activity; Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968); Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378 (1987); Speech of Government Employees

MCCARRAN–WALTER ACT OF 1952

The McCarran–Walter Act, formally known as the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, was a comprehensive reworking of the nation’s immigration laws. Passed at the height of the cold war, the law reflected anxiety about the large numbers of refugees from southern and eastern Europe who entered the United States following World War II and their possible connection to Soviet Communism. It also removed many of the racial exclusions, primarily affecting Asians, of earlier immigration laws. The act prohibited immigration of any person found to be a member of a subversive organization by the attorney general and allowed for the deportation of resident aliens who were, or had been, members of communist and “communist-front” organizations.

The McCarran–Walter Act built upon earlier prohibitions regarding radical aliens. U.S. immigration law had prohibited admission of anarchists since 1903, and the Smith Act of 1940 had allowed for exclusion of members of organizations advocating the violent overthrow of the government. The act specifically allowed for the admission of a formerly communist alien if that individual had been actively opposed to Communism for at least five years or had joined the Communist Party under threat or compulsion.

The McCarran–Walter Act provided for greater administrative discretion in exclusions and deportations and curtailed federal courts’ ability to review immigration decisions. All grounds for deportation were made retroactive, and noncitizens might be deported for acts that were legal at the time committed. These provisions caused President Harry Truman to veto the act, stating that its lack of adequate judicial safeguards departed from the traditional American insistence on established standards of guilt. Congress overwhelmingly overrode his veto, and the McCarran–Walter Act set America’s immigration standards until 1965.

The act also provided for the denial of a visa of any person who advocated Communism or the violent overthrow of the U.S. government, while allowing for a waiver under the attorney general’s authority. This section was used to exclude a number of foreign intellectuals from touring the United States and speaking or teaching at universities. It was upheld by the Supreme Court in Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753 (1972), but was limited by amendments in 1977 and repealed in 1990, though restrictions remained on travel from Cuba. A similar provision, allowing the government to deny visas to those advocating or publicly endorsing terrorist activity, was enacted in the USA PATRIOT Act of 2001.

DANIEL LEVIN

References and Further Reading

Hull, Elizabeth. Without Justice for All: The Constitutional Rights of Aliens. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1985.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753 (1972)
 Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, 66 Stat. 163 (1952)
 USA PATRIOT Act, 115 Stat. 272 (2001)

MCCARTHY, JOSEPH (1908–1957)

A United States senator from Wisconsin, Joseph McCarthy from 1950 to 1954 led a campaign against communists in government that was routinely disdainful of civil liberties. He was so ruthless and effective that the term “McCarthyism” was applied to all of his era’s red-baiting and, more abstractly, to outbursts in later eras of rabid political labeling employing innuendo, assigning guilt by association, and lying shamelessly.

McCarthy was born in Grand Chute, Wisconsin, the son of devout Catholics who were struggling farmers. He received his early education in a one-room schoolhouse and quit school at fourteen. However, after unsuccessful ventures as a grocer and chicken farmer, he returned to school at the age of twenty and managed to complete four years of high school in only one year. He then enrolled at Marquette University in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, where he worked part and even full time, enjoyed poker and amateur boxing, and graduated with a law degree in 1935. When running for class president, he and his opponent agreed that each would vote for the other. When McCarthy won by two votes, he admitted that he had voted for himself.

After admission to the Wisconsin bar, McCarthy hung his shingle in the northern Wisconsin towns of Waupaca and Shawano. Three years later he was elected as a circuit judge. He then became known throughout the state for his willingness to issue quick and easy divorce decrees, something much sought in the final years of the fault divorce regime. Milwaukee divorce lawyers were said to drive carloads of clients to McCarthy's Shawano County court.

In 1942, McCarthy took a leave of absence from the bench and was commissioned as a first lieutenant in the Marines. He served in military intelligence in the Pacific, but when he left the Marines in 1945, he altered and, some would say, improved his military record. He claimed he had begun as a "buck private," served as a tail gunner, and was wounded in action.

McCarthy employed the sobriquet "tail gunner Joe" in his victorious campaign for the U.S. Senate in 1946. In the Republican primary he defeated incumbent Robert M. LaFollette, Jr., scion of Wisconsin's most distinguished political family. In the November general election he spoke out against New Deal bureaucrats and also argued that his Democratic opponent, Howard McMurray, was "communistically inclined."

When McCarthy arrived in Washington, D.C., he found the decorum, cordiality, and seniority system of the Senate stifling. Freshmen senators were supposed to remain deferential, but McCarthy was too irascible and ambitious for that. Indeed, he took on fellow senators publicly, often allowing his hot temper to boil over. Some senators considered him a renegade, while others considered him a menace.

McCarthy worried little about what his fellow senators thought of him, but he did worry about finding an issue that would enhance his prominence and assure his reelection. The issue on which he settled was the presence of communists in the government. In a legendary speech delivered on February 9, 1950, in Wheeling, West Virginia, he alleged that the United States, the leader of "the democratic Christian world," was losing the cold war against the Soviet Union and its allies because the government had been infiltrated by communists, fellow travelers, and other traitorous subversives. McCarthy claimed to have a list of 205 State Department employees whom he knew to be communists. The number turned out to be inaccurate, and most of the named individuals no longer worked in the State Department. But in this instance as well as in many subsequent instances, the naming and labeling more than the accuracy and precision was politically potent.

Many took eagerly to McCarthy's positions and claims, and within only a few months of the Wheeling speech he was the country's most discussed cold war politician. The Republican Party played off McCarthy to cast itself as the party that, unlike the pusillanimous Democratic Party, would stand firm against Communism. Even Dwight D. Eisenhower, who had great distaste for McCarthy's style and lack of character, appeared with him in the 1952 election campaign. Both won easily.

In the Senate, McCarthy showed virtually no interest in drafting and sponsoring legislation. Instead, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Government Operations and its Subcommittee on Investigations, he used investigations and hearings to pursue his enemy—former communists, suspected communists, and, occasionally, actual communists. His methods were anathema to civil liberties. McCarthy was rude and insulting to witnesses, sometimes ostentatiously reading newspapers while they gave statements and frequently badgering, ridiculing, and challenging them. One of McCarthy's favorite tactics was to announce to the hungry press what a witness was going to say before the witness actually testified. This undermined witnesses' subsequent testimony and irreparably harmed their reputations.

The targets of McCarthy's investigations included but were not limited to the Signal Corps, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Government Printing Office, and the International Information Agency, but McCarthy finally went too far when he launched an investigation of the Army. McCarthy's specific concern was the Army's alleged interference with an earlier investigation of a research center in Fort Monmouth, New Jersey. He was perhaps surprised to learn that the Army had its own allegations. According to Army records, on forty-four occasions McCarthy, his staff director Frank Carr, and his chief committee counsel Roy Cohn had attempted to obtain special treatment for David Schine, an inductee, unpaid staff member, and Cohn's best friend.

The hearings took place during April, May, and June of 1954 and, much to McCarthy's detriment, were televised. A smaller percentage of Americans had televisions than in the present, but one survey showed that two-thirds of the families with televisions were watching the hearings. Retailers also reported a huge surge in television sales. McCarthy attacked and belittled witnesses in his customary fashion, but his sweaty, discourteous aggressiveness came across badly on television.

In addition, McCarthy met his match in the person of Joseph Welch, a sixty-three-year-old Boston lawyer, who served as counsel for the Army. As sly as he was courtly, Welch confronted McCarthy directly on June 4, 1954, when McCarthy brought to light the earlier membership in a leftist organization of Fred Fisher, a promising young lawyer in Welch's firm. Welch deplored McCarthy for needlessly scarring the reputation of "the lad." Welch rhetorically asked McCarthy, "Have you left no sense of decency?" The assembled legislators burst into loud applause, leaving McCarthy grimly embarrassed.

After the hearings the Senate, offended for years by McCarthy's conduct and now realizing he was vulnerable, moved against him. On June 11, 1954, Senator Ralph Flanders of Vermont, a member of McCarthy's party, introduced a resolution to censure McCarthy. Censure carried no formal penalty, and even after censure, a senator could maintain his or her seniority, positions on committees, and right to vote in the Senate. Nevertheless, censure is a harsh symbolic gesture; prior to the McCarthy resolution, only five senators had been censured in American history. McCarthy fought the resolution, employing distinguished Washington, D.C. lawyer Edward Bennett Williams as counsel. The resolution carried sixty-seven to twenty-two, with all of the Senate's Democrats and half of its Republicans voting in favor. McCarthy's behavior was characterized as "contemptuous, contumacious, and denunciatory" and he was deplored for obstructing "the constitutional processes of the Senate."

McCarthy had four more years to serve in his second term, but he had virtually no remaining clout and standing in the Senate. Even more disappointing to McCarthy was the severe decline in his popularity with the general public. He no longer filled lecture halls, and his comments and allegations no longer made headlines. On one painful occasion he showed up at a dinner for Vice President Richard Nixon at a Milwaukee hotel and was asked to leave because he did not have an invitation. Newsmen later found McCarthy sobbing in an alley. Always a drinker, McCarthy was most likely an alcoholic when he came to Washington, D.C. His censure and decline pushed him over the edge, and he drank from morning to night. He died on May 2, 1957, with his wife and a priest at his side. Doctors listed the cause of death as "acute hepatitis."

Why did McCarthy achieve such great power and prominence in the early 1950s? Surely he was not the originator of rabid anticommunist politics; as early as the red scare of the early 1920s, the government deported and persecuted suspected communists. However, with the cold war as a backdrop, McCarthy stoked the fear of internal communist subversion more effectively than any other politician. Although his cause was self-serving, he appears to have believed in it. More importantly, he had a genuine talent for demagoguery. He was bolder than others, smarter than opponents thought, and more reckless than expected. He also had the knack of producing names, numbers, and allegations that the mass media could serve to consumers worried about the communists. McCarthy's supporters often shared his disdain for civil liberties, a reminder of how fragile those liberties are in wartime and, perhaps, in general.

DAVID RAY PAPKE

References and Further Reading

- Doherty, Thomas. Cold War, Cool Medium: Television, McCarthyism, and American Culture. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.
- Fried, Richard. Nightmare in Red: The McCarthy Era in Perspective. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Morgan, Ted. Reds: McCarthyism in Twentieth-Century America. New York: Random House, 2003.
- Oshinsky, David M. A Conspiracy so Immense: The World of Joe McCarthy. New York: The Free Press, 1983.
- Reeves, Thomas C. The Life and Times of Joe McCarthy: A Biography. Landam: Madison Books, 1997.

See also Cohn, Roy; Communism and the Cold War; Extremist Groups and Civil Liberties; Freedom of Association

McCLESKEY v. KEMP, 481 U.S. 277 (1987)

In McCleskey v. Kemp, the Court was confronted with the invidious nature of racism in the legal system, the limits of equal protection, and the algebra of death in the United States.

Warren McCleskey was convicted by the state of Georgia of the crimes of robbery and murder. More specifically, McCleskey, a black man, was convicted of killing a white police officer during the course of a robbery and was sentenced to death. The procedural posture of McCleskey's case was complex, with multiple petitions to the U.S. Supreme Court. Ultimately, two years after his conviction, the Supreme Court accepted his writ of habeas corpus petition. McCleskey presented two arguments. First, he argued that his death sentence was unconstitutional because Georgia had violated his right to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution because the sentencing process was "administered in a racially discriminatory manner." Second, McCleskey argued that his death sentence constituted "cruel and unusual punishment" in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

In support of his claims, McCleskey presented a now famous statistical study (the Baldus study) performed by Professors David C. Baldus, Charles Pulaski, and George Woodworth. The study found that in the state of Georgia, race was a determinant factor in whether (i) a prosecutor would seek the death penalty, and (ii) a death sentence would be imposed after conviction. In part, the study found that prosecutors sought the death penalty in 70 percent of cases where the defendant was black and the victim white compared to seeking the death penalty in 19 percent of the cases where the defendant was white and the victim black. Furthermore, the study demonstrated that in the former situation, black defendants were sentenced to death 22 percent of the time; in the latter situation, white defendants were sentenced to death 1 percent of the time.

Writing for the majority, Justice Powell upheld McCleskey's death sentence and rendered his argument ineffective despite accepting the statistical validity of the Baldus study. The majority arrived at its holding by requiring that McCleskey prove that the state of Georgia "acted with discriminatory purpose" in his case.

A year earlier, in Batson v. Kemp, the, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), Court articulated the requirements for a showing of purposeful discrimination on the part of the state and consequently a violation of a defendant's equal protection under the law in the jury selection process. The Batson Court required that the defendant show that "the totality of the relevant facts gives rise to an inference of discriminatory purpose." Such showing could include evidence reflecting that "[the defendant] is a member of a racial group being singled out for different treatment." Once the defendant met his burden, that burden would then shift to the state. The Batson v. Kemp majority reiterated the tenor of Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229 (1976), that "[c]ircumstantial evidence of invidious intent may include proof of disproportionate impact." From that, a trial court can reasonably shift the defendant's burden of proof to the state, which would then have to "come forward with a neutral explanation" that goes beyond a simple denial of discriminatory motive or intent.

The majority disregarded the calculus of Batson v. Kemp and proceeded with a conceptual analysis that would make it impossible for McCleskey to satisfy his burden. Because jury deliberations are secret and "discretion is essential to the criminal justice process," the majority placed the white supremacist valuation of life in Georgia death penalty cases beyond the possibility of scrutiny. If the operation of white supremacy in Georgia death penalty cases cannot be proved by statistical study (even statistical studies accepted as valid by the Court) or by piercing the veil of the secret jury deliberation (even of a jury system charged with meting out the ultimate sanction of death), then the operation of white supremacy in Georgia death penalty cases is proved to be a valid form of racial discrimination under the U.S. constitutional system.

Equal protection analysis in cases involving racial discrimination requires "strict scrutiny." However, as Justice Brennan pointed out, the majority proceeded with a lesser level of scrutiny, focusing on the state of Georgia's interest in sentencing a murderer to death. The majority felt that discretion in every aspect of McCleskey's case, from the state's decisions to the jury's recommendation in the capital sentencing process was important to protect. Furthermore, the majority felt that the appeal system establishes "statutory safeguards" against the violation of civil liberties. Effectively, the majority foreclosed a Batson v. Kemp analysis, which would have shown that the evidence presented by McCleskey proved that "he is a member of a group that is a recognizable, distinct class, singled out for different treatment"; (ii) that there was "showing of a substantial degree of differential treatment"; and (iii) that criminal procedure in his case was "susceptible to" abuse. The majority foreclosed the analysis because "McCleskey's claim, taken to its logical conclusions, throws into serious question the principles that underlie our entire criminal justice system." Thus, the Court was able to hold that there were no Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment violations in McCleskey's case.

McCleskey v. Kemp was the last significant challenge to the use of the death penalty in the United States until the Court invalidated execution of the mentally retarded and minors.

GEIZA VARGAS-VARGAS and ANTHONY PAUL FARLEY

References and Further Reading

- Baldus, David C., George G. Woodworth, and Charles Pulaski, Jr. Equal Justice and the Death Penalty: A Legal and Empirical Analysis. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1990.
- Kennedy, Randall, McCleskey v. Kemp: Race, Capital Punishment and the Supreme Court, Harvard Law Review 101 (1988): 1388.
- Lazarus, Edward. Closed Chambers. New York: Times Books, 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Batson v. Kemp*, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)
- Washington v. Davis*, 426 U.S. 229 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment and Race; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Race and Criminal Justice

McCOLLUM v. BOARD OF EDUCATION, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)

The eight-to-one Supreme Court ruling in McCollum v. Board of Education declared the use of public school time and property for devotional religious instruction to be unconstitutional. The legal precedent restricted organizations from using compulsory education for the dissemination of religious ideals. It also set the standard for the application and interpretation of the First Amendment's nonestablishment of religion clause in public school settings.

In 1940, members of the Jewish, Catholic, and Protestant communities in Champaign, Illinois, formed the Champaign Council on Religious Education. This group struck an agreement with the board of education whereby public school students would receive religious instruction. The council provided rabbis, priests, and ministers to teach the classes; the school system provided the students. Parents received a release form on which they indicated whether their child should be given Jewish, Catholic, or Protestant instruction. Children whose parents did not consent to the program were given what amounted to an additional study hall once a week while the other students attended their respective classes. Vashti McCollum, a mother, taxpayer, and resident of Champaign, found this arrangement unacceptable. She filed legal suit against the school board for its approval of "released time" religious instruction as violations of her child's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights.

The Supreme Court sided with McCollum after the case was argued in December 1947. Justice Hugo Black delivered the Court's decision. He described the situation as the clear "utilization of the tax-established and tax-supported public school system to aid religious groups to spread their faith." The ruling denounced the school board's arrangement as a violation of Jefferson's famous "wall of separation" between church and state.

In fact, the Court had resuscitated the phrase when ruling on a closely related case only a year before. Justice Black also authored the majority opinion in Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947). In this case he referenced the "wall of separation" to ensure that New Jersey's statutes did not establish a state church by denying parochial school children transportation on public school buses. Justice Frankfurter, who dissented in the Everson decision, further clarified the position of the Court in the McCollum case. He wrote that the wall of separation should remain a wall, not a "fine line easily overstepped" and declared it the role of the court to maintain this absolute partition.

This case is often overshadowed by more prominent decisions regarding church and state matters, but it has a judicial legacy of its own accord. Here, the Supreme Court first articulated that the state's failure to assist a religious group is not tantamount to hostility toward religion. In addition, the McCollum decision is sometimes cited as an early example of "legislating from the bench," or interpreting existing law so as to achieve unforeseen applications. However, the opinion of the Court offered in McCollum v. Board of Education provided a model for future jurisprudence and for the protection of religious freedom.

KEVIN JAMES HOUK

McCORMEY, NORMA (JANE ROE) (1947–)

Norma McCorvey was the lead plaintiff, "Jane Roe," of the controversial U.S. Supreme Court decision Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), that legalized abortion in the United States. McCorvey was raised in a poor, broken home in Louisiana and Texas. She dropped out of high school in the ninth grade, abused drugs and alcohol, and worked at a variety of jobs including as a respiratory therapist, cleaning person, and a carnival barker. In 1969, McCorvey became pregnant for the third time at the age of twenty-one. Family members had adopted her first two children. McCorvey's doctor refused to provide her with information about abortion because of the strict Texas laws prohibiting the practice. The doctor referred her to an adoption attorney who then arranged a meeting for McCorvey with Sarah Weddington and Linda Coffee, attorneys in search of a pregnant woman to challenge the Texas law banning abortion. Soon after the meeting, McCorvey signed on as the lead plaintiff.

On June 17, 1970, the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Texas held that the state ban on abortions was unconstitutional, but would not issue an injunction against enforcement of the anti-abortion laws. Because of this, Weddington and Coffee appealed the decision to the U.S. Supreme Court. On January 23, 1973, in a seven-to-two decision, the Court ruled that a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy during the first trimester was constitutionally protected under the right to privacy rooted in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty. The Court further held that the state could regulate abortion during the second trimester to protect the health of the mother. During the third trimester, the state could proscribe abortion except in cases when the mother's life or health was at risk. The decision came after McCorvey had given birth to a daughter, whom she gave up for adoption.

In the 1980s McCorvey, who by now had announced that she was Jane Roe, worked with pro-abortion activists and found employment at various jobs, including positions at abortion clinics. In 1995, the pro-life group Operation Rescue opened an office next door to the abortion clinic where McCorvey was employed. McCorvey met and effectuated friendships with several of the pro-life advocates. Soon thereafter, McCorvey became a Christian and later converted to Roman Catholicism. Following her conversion, she dedicated herself to the pro-life cause. McCorvey worked with Operation Rescue for two years and in 1997 began her own pro-life group, Roe No More.

On June 17, 2003, the thirty-third anniversary of the original Texas lawsuit, McCorvey announced that she would petition the court to reopen the Roe case on the grounds that scientific knowledge and medical technology had advanced far beyond the 1973 standards to prove that life begins at conception and to show the harmful effects of abortion on women. Days later a federal court dismissed her claim on the grounds that it was not made within a reasonable amount of time after the 1973 decision. To this day, McCorvey continues her battle for the rights of women and the unborn.

MARY K. MANKUS

References and Further Reading

- Faux, Marian. Roe v. Wade: The Untold Story of the Landmark Supreme Court Decision That Made Abortion Legal. New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 1988.
- McCorvey, Norma, with Andy Meisler. I Am Roe: My Life, Roe v. Wade, and Freedom of Choice. New York: Harper Collins Publishers, 1994.
- McCorvey, Norma, with Gary Thomas. Won by Love: Norma McCorvey, Jane Roe of Roe v. Wade, Speaks out for the Unborn as She Shares Her New Convictions for Life. Nashville: Thomas Nelson Publishers, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Abortion; Abortion Laws and the Establishment Clause; Abortion Protest Cases; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Weddington, Sarah Ragle

McCULLOCH v. MARYLAND, 17 U.S. 316 (1819)

McCulloch arose out of the decades-old dispute concerning the extent of congressional power under Article I, Section 8 of the federal Constitution. As early as 1791, Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson had debated the question whether Congress might charter a banking corporation in President George Washington's cabinet, and the denial of that power was one of the chief planks on which the platform of the Jeffersonian Republicans was built. Although President Washington signed the first bank bill into law in 1791, Republicans then in control of Congress killed the bill to recharter the bank in 1811. However, difficulties in financing the War of 1812 led some Republicans, including President James Madison, to change their minds, and the Second Bank of the United States received a charter from a Republican Congress in 1816.

In McCulloch, the Supreme Court faced the questions whether Congress might constitutionally charter a bank and, if so, whether a state could tax it. Adopting reasoning very similar to Hamilton's, Chief Justice John Marshall ruled that yes, the bank bill was constitutional, and no, a state (in this case, Maryland), could not tax the bank.

Justice Marshall's opinion relied upon purported intentions of the framers of the Constitution. Ironically, Luther Martin, the counsel for Maryland, was one of the Constitution's framers, and his understanding of Congress's powers tracked the Republican argument Jefferson had made in 1791. According to Martin, Congress could exercise only those powers that it was expressly granted by the Constitution, and neither the power to charter a bank nor the power to charter any other kind of corporation was among them.

Justice Marshall said, however, that the bank bill's end was clearly contemplated by the Constitution and that the means—chartering a bank—were not prohibited. Under his broad reading of the necessary and proper clause, it might be justified as related to some of the economic powers in Article I, Section 8. One could not expect, he lectured, for a constitution to enumerate every single act a legislature might have to take; "it is a constitution we are expounding," as he put it. Thus, he concluded, the bill was constitutional. Like many of the justice's other opinions, this one infuriated the reigning Jeffersonian Republicans, for whom the limitation of congressional powers to those expressly delegated was an article of faith. Yet, their vehement protests against McCulloch came to naught, and congressional power has been interpreted thus broadly ever since.

KEVIN R. C. GUTZMAN

References and Further Reading

- Gunther, Gerald, ed. John Marshall's Defense of McCulloch v. Maryland.
Gutzman, Kevin R. C. "Old Dominion, New Republic." Ph.D. diss., University of Virginia, 1999.
Hobson, Charles F. The Great Chief Justice: John Marshall and the Rule of Law.
Hobson, Charles F. et al., eds. The Papers of John Marshall.
Smith, Jean Edward. John Marshall: Definer of a Nation.

McDANIEL v. PATY, 435 U.S. 618 (1978)

In the earliest days of the Republic, a number of colonies (and then states) disqualified ministers from holding public office, purportedly to further the disestablishment of the church from the state. Over time, states gradually moved toward the position advanced by James Madison that religious liberty meant clergy should not be forced to choose between their ministerial calling and serving the public through office-holding. In McDaniel v. Paty, the Supreme Court abolished clergy disqualification provisions, holding they unconstitutionally violated ministers' First Amendment free exercise rights.

At issue in McDaniel was a Tennessee statute that barred ministers from serving as delegates to Tennessee's 1977 constitutional convention. (The statute arose as a cousin to a long-standing state constitutional provision barring ministers from serving as legislators.) Paul McDaniel, an ordained Baptist minister from Chattanooga, Tennessee, filed as a candidate to the convention. An opposing candidate, Selma Cash Paty, sued for a declaratory judgment that McDaniel should be disqualified from serving and that his name should be removed from the ballot. The lower court held that the statute violated the First Amendment (as applied to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment in Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 1940) and permitted McDaniel to remain on the ballot. On appeal (after McDaniel convincingly won the election), the Tennessee Supreme Court reversed, holding the clergy disqualification statute constitutional. McDaniel appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

All eight justices who heard the case voted to reverse, permitting McDaniel to serve as a delegate to the convention, but they did not agree on a rationale. The four-member plurality opinion, authored by Chief Justice Burger, held that the clergy disqualification statute violated McDaniel's free exercise right to act upon his religious beliefs by conditioning that action upon the surrender of his right to seek public office. McDaniel could not constitutionally be forced to choose between these two rights. The plurality averred that McDaniel's freedom to act upon his religious beliefs could be limited only by government "interests of the highest order" (quoting Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 1972). Tennessee attempted to meet this compelling interest test by asserting an establishment clause interest in preventing the establishment of a state religion. But when balanced against McDaniel's free-exercise right to act upon his religious beliefs (including vocationally), the state interest was insufficient and outdated, the Court held.

McGAUTHA v. CALIFORNIA, 402 U.S. 183 (1971)

The plurality did not think that Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961), which it said held the "freedom of belief" to be inviolable, governed. The plurality stated that Tennessee's statute did not affect McDaniel's belief but rather operated specifically against his status as a minister. Three other justices, in concurrences, thought Torcaso was directly controlling because the Tennessee statute created an impermissible classification based upon religion, which was specifically disallowed by Torcaso. Two of those justices also thought the state's act of setting up religious classifications violated the establishment clause.

Read together, Torcaso and McDaniel provide a sort of symmetry on religious neutrality: Just as the state cannot require office holders to subscribe to a certain religious belief, neither can it exclude them for having a religious belief.

JOEL A. NICHOLS

References and Further Reading

- Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
Stokes, Anson Phelps. Church and State in the United States, 1950.
Witte, John, Jr., Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment, 2nd ed., Westview, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

See also Belief–Action Distinction in Free Exercise Clause History; Compelling State Interest; Incorporation Doctrine; Limitations on Clergy Holding Office; Wall of Separation

McGAUTHA v. CALIFORNIA, 402 U.S. 183 (1971)

In McGautha v. California, the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that sentencing schemes granting capital juries unfettered discretion to determine whether a defendant should be sentenced to death did not violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. As the Court explained, the jury represents the link between the community and the criminal justice system and, to perform its proper role, the jury must be free to express its desire for mercy. Standards to guide the jury's discretion, the Court reasoned, would unduly limit the jury because countless factors could influence its sentencing decision. The Court further expressed its belief that it was impossible to devise a set of standards that would distinguish between death-worthy and non-death-worthy crimes with precision. Previous legislative attempts to draw such a distinction had failed, largely because sentencing juries began to engage in jury nullification—ignoring the law in order to exercise mercy.

McGautha was effectively overruled one year later by Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), which held that unbridled jury discretion resulted in arbitrary and discriminatory sentencing decisions in violation of the Eighth Amendment. In Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), the Court subsequently ruled that legislatures must limit and guide the jury's discretion as it determines whether a defendant is eligible for the death penalty. But the Court later made clear that the government may not limit the jury's ability to consider, and the jury may not decline to consider, any relevant mitigating circumstances that might justify a sentence less than death.

CELESTINE RICHARDS McCONVILLE

References and Further Reading

- Kirchmeier, Jeffrey L., Aggravating and Mitigating Factors: The Paradox of Today's Arbitrary and Mandatory Capital Punishment Scheme, William and Mary Bill of Rights Journal 6 (Spring 1998): 345–459.
- Steiker, Carol S., and Jordan M. Steiker, Sober Second Thoughts: Reflections on Two Decades of Constitutional Regulation of Capital Punishment, Harvard Law Review 109 (December 1995): 355–438.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972); Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976); Jury Nullification in Capital Punishment; Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978)

McGOWAN v. MARYLAND, 366 U.S. 420 (1961)

See Sunday Closing Cases

McKEIVER v. PENNSYLVANIA, 403 U.S. 528 (1971)

In McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, the Supreme Court held that Fourteenth Amendment due process does not require a jury trial in juvenile court delinquency proceedings, which charge that a youth has committed an act that would be a crime if committed by an adult. McKeiver concluded that jury trials were not necessary to assure accurate fact finding in the rehabilitative juvenile court. Only three years earlier, the Court, in Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968), had called the criminal jury a “fundamental right, essential for preventing miscarriages of justice and assuring that fair trials are provided.”

A few states have granted alleged delinquents a general right to jury trial under the state constitution or by statute or court rule. In most states, however, delinquency proceedings (like other juvenile court proceedings) are decided by the judge sitting without a jury.

States have enacted sweeping “get tough” juvenile justice legislation since McKeiver, but lower courts have rejected contentions that this legislation has made delinquency dispositions so much more punitive that the federal and state constitutions must now guarantee alleged delinquents a general right to a jury trial. In In re C.B., 708 So.2d 391 (La.1998), however, the Louisiana Supreme Court held that the state constitution guarantees the right to a jury trial when the adjudicated delinquent may be incarcerated in an adult prison before or after reaching majority. In Monroe v. Soliz, 939 P.2d 205 (Wash.1997), however, the Washington Supreme Court held that potential adult incarceration does not trigger a state constitutional right because “[t]he nature of incarceration remains juvenile regardless of the custody venue.”

DOUGLAS E. ABRAMS

References and Further Reading

- Abrams, Douglas E., and Sarah H. Ramsey. Children and the Law—Doctrine, Policy and Practice, 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2003, pp. 1178–1187.
- Davis, Samuel M. Rights of Juveniles 2d: The Juvenile Justice System, 2005 ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2005, pp. 271–279.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Duncan v. Louisiana*, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)
- In re C.B.*, 708 So.2d 391 (La.1998)
- Monroe v. Soliz*, 939 P.2d 205 (Wash.1997)

See also Due Process of Law (V and XIV); In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967); Jury Trial; Jury Trial Right

McLAUGHLIN v. FLORIDA, 379 U.S. 184 (1964)

In a majority opinion authored by Justice Byron White, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that a Florida law that punished interracial cohabitation more severely than cohabitation by individuals of the same race violated the Fourteenth Amendment equal protection clause. Appellants were convicted, fined, and imprisoned for violating this statute. The statute proscribed the following conduct: habitual occupation of a room at night by a Negro and a white person who are not married. No couple other than an interracial one (that is, black and white) could have been convicted under this statute. Moreover, there were no other statutory provisions that proscribed this sort of conduct for individuals of the same race. In fact, the appellants' conduct would not have been illegal if they had both been white or both been black.

At issue in this case was a classification based on race and embodied in a criminal statute. In its analysis, the Court noted that classifications based on race are constitutionally suspect and subject to the most rigid scrutiny. Such classifications will only be upheld if they are necessary to the accomplishment of a legitimate state policy. Although each member of the interracial couple was subject to the same penalty under the law, the Court looked to whether or not the classifications drawn in the statute were reasonable in light of its purpose. The state argued that the purpose of the statute was to prevent breaches of basic concepts of sexual decency (that is, pre- or extramarital promiscuity).

Despite this argument, the Court found no overriding statutory purpose to proscribe interracial cohabitation, but not cohabitation by couples of the same race. In essence, there was nothing that made it essential to punish the promiscuity of one racial group and not that of another. Simply put, mere disapproval of a singular group of people was not a sufficient justification for banning conduct specific to that group. Thus, as the Court went on to hold, the appellants were denied equal protection under the law. Of particular note, two of the justices (Stewart, joined by Douglas, concurring) went further than the majority opinion. Neither justice could ever conceive of a valid legislative purpose that makes the color of a person's skin the test of whether his conduct is a criminal offense.

The state of Florida also argued that the interracial cohabitation law was ancillary to its currently valid miscegenation law, which banned interracial marriages. However, the Court refused to address the question of that statute's validity. Nevertheless, it is clear that this decision paved the way for the Supreme Court's eventual invalidation of state laws prohibiting interracial marriages in the 1967 Loving v. Virginia (388 U.S. 1, 1967) case. Overall, McLaughlin affirmed the notion that racial classifications are constitutionally suspect and will only be upheld if they are necessary to serve a legitimate state interest. The application of criminal statutes must be even handed; regulating the particular conduct of one race and not another, solely because of race, is unconstitutional.

KERRY L. MUEHLENBECK

References and Further Reading

Cruz, Barbara C., and Berson, Michael J. "The American Melting Pot? Miscegenation Laws in the United States." OAH Magazine of History 15(4) (Summer 2001).
Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review, <http://www.law.harvard.edu/students/orgs/crcl/>. "Remember the Legalization of Interracial Couples." www.lovingday.org.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Loving Et Ux. v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)

McNABB v. UNITED STATES, 318 U.S. 332 (1943)

A major issue in criminal law is determining when confessions should be excluded from trial evidence. American courts ask whether confessions are "voluntary," while also incorporating the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule, the Fifth Amendment self-incrimination right, and the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment due process clauses. A prominent case addressing confession admissibility is McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943), where the Supreme Court determined that confessions can be excluded if obtained after "unnecessary delay" in arraigning suspects.

The McNabb petitioners confessed to killing a federal officer, but were never brought before a magistrate upon arrest, though federal legislation required prompt arraignment. Relying on the congressional statute, the Court excluded the confessions, holding that they were made during unlawful detentions. McNabb was reaffirmed by Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957). Accordingly, the McNabb-Mallory doctrine prohibits "undue delay" in arraignment and invalidates confessions derived from lengthy delays.

In Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964), the Court held that self-incrimination protections apply to the states, thus paving the way for Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), where the Court stated that the Fifth Amendment requires notification of constitutional rights before interrogation. In reaction to Miranda and McNabb–Mallory, Congress passed the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (18 U.S.C. § 3501), which contradicted the decisions by applying only the traditional “voluntariness” standard for confession admissibility. In Dickerson v. United States (530 U.S. 428, 2000), however, the Court invalidated that act, stating that Congress could not nullify Supreme Court decisions.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Baker, Liva. Miranda: Crime, Law and Politics. New York: Atheneum, 1983.
- Brandt, Charles. The Right to Remain Silent. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.
- Grano, Joseph D. Confessions, Truth, and the Law. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996.
- Hancock, Catherine. Due Process Before Miranda, Tulane Law Review 70 (1996).
- Hogan, James E., and Joseph M. Snee. The McNabb–Mallory Rule: Its Rise, Rationale, and Rescue, Georgetown Law Journal 47 (Fall 1958).
- Imwinkelried, Edward J., Paul C. Giannelli, Francis A. Gilligan, and Fredric I. Lederer. Courtroom Criminal Evidence, 3rd ed. Philadelphia: Michie Publishing, 2003.
- Inbau, Fred Edward, John E. Reid, and Joseph P. Buckley. Criminal Interrogation and Confessions. Baltimore, MD: Williams & Wilkins, 1986.
- Macnair, Michael R. T., The Early Development of the Privilege Against Self-Incrimination, Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 10 (1990).
- Rutledge, Devallis. Criminal Interrogation: Law and Tactics. Placerville, CA: Copperhouse Publishing, 1994.
- Wigmore, John Henry. A Treatise on the Anglo-American System of Evidence in Trials at Common Law, 3rd ed. 1940.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Dickerson v. United States*, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)
- Malloy v. Hogan*, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
- Mallory v. United States*, 354 U.S. 449 (1957)
- McNabb v. United States*, 318 U.S. 332 (1943)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- 18 U.S.C. § 3501

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Miranda Warning; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

McREYNOLDS, JAMES C. (1862–1946)

Cantankerous and highly individualistic, James C. McReynolds was one of the most controversial individuals to ever sit on the Supreme Court. Although known for his generally conservative economic and social views, McReynolds nonetheless made some significant contributions to the evolution of civil liberties in the United States.

McReynolds was born in Elkton, Kentucky, the son of a prominent surgeon. After private schooling in Elkton, he attended Vanderbilt University. An excellent student, McReynolds was active in debate societies and finished first in his graduating class, winning the Founder's Day Medal in 1882. Although he studied the natural sciences at Vanderbilt, he decided upon a legal career and entered the University of Virginia School of Law in 1883. There, McReynolds was influenced by Professor John B. Minor, whose teaching stressed personal morality and protection of economic rights and personal liberty from governmental encroachment.

Upon graduation in 1884, McReynolds served for two years as secretary to Senator Howell E. Jackson of Tennessee. He then settled in Nashville and established a law practice in that community. His practice was primarily devoted to commercial and corporate law, and he usually represented local business interests. In 1900, he was named professor of law at Vanderbilt, where he taught commercial and insurance law. Active in Democratic Party politics, McReynolds unsuccessfully sought a seat in the House of Representatives in 1896. A “sound money” Democrat, McReynolds was appalled at the populist campaign of William Jennings Bryan.

Early in the twentieth century McReynolds's career moved in a new direction. Despite his Democratic Party affiliation, he was appointed assistant attorney general by President Theodore Roosevelt in 1903. Monopolistic business combinations had become a major issue in American politics. As assistant attorney general, McReynolds successfully prosecuted a number of cases under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and appeared frequently before the Supreme Court. In 1907, while in private practice in New York City, he accepted a special assignment to prosecute the tobacco trust, prevailing before the Supreme Court four years later. Although he primarily sought to preserve competition, McReynolds gained a public reputation as something of a radical on business-related matters.

McReynolds returned to private practice in 1912 and campaigned actively for the election of Woodrow Wilson as president that year. In 1913, Wilson appointed McReynolds attorney general. In that post he continued to seek vigorous enforcement of antitrust policy by litigation and negotiated settlements. His often abrasive personality, however, irritated other members of the Wilson cabinet and Democratic Party leaders.

In the summer of 1914, Wilson appointed McReynolds to replace Horace H. Lurton as a member of the Supreme Court. Historians have long speculated about the reasons for Wilson's choice, with some suggesting that the president wished to remove a troublesome person from his cabinet. In fact, Wilson continued to hold Justice McReynolds in high regard and, on the basis of his trust-busting record, was confident that he was a liberal at heart. McReynolds was promptly confirmed by the Senate, with strong backing from Democratic senators.

Wilson, of course, was badly mistaken about Justice McReynolds's constitutional jurisprudence. Intensely committed to individual freedom, the justice usually voted to restrain the reach of government. He looked skeptically at the expansion of congressional power under the commerce clause and at the growth of the administrative state. Treating property rights and contractual freedom as essential elements of individual liberty, he believed that the market economy was most compatible with the rights secured by the Constitution. Given these views, it is not surprising that the justice consistently voted against the validity of New Deal-era legislation. In Nebbia v. New York (1934), for example, he wrote a forceful dissenting opinion that maintained that a state price-fixing scheme for milk was an unconstitutional interference with economic liberty. Indeed, Justice McReynolds is best remembered as a stalwart conservative and a foe of economic regulatory power by government.

Still, the justice's concern for individual liberty was not confined to economic matters. In two leading cases he insisted that liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment embraced a number of personal rights, such as the right to pursue common occupations, to marry, and to bring up children. At issue in Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), was a state law that prohibited the teaching of German to primary school children. Writing for the Court, Justice McReynolds struck down the law on the grounds that the state could not interfere with the right of parents to have their children instructed in a foreign language in a private school. In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 368 U.S. 510 (1952), he ruled that an Oregon law that required every pupil to attend a public school was an unreasonable interference with the liberty of parents to direct the upbringing of their children secured by the Fourteenth Amendment. In reaching this conclusion Justice McReynolds invoked the "fundamental theory of liberty upon which all governments in this Union repose" (p. 535). He clearly viewed the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as protecting certain fundamental individual rights against state abridgement.

The justice had no hesitancy in affirming what would later be termed "substantive due process," and much the same reasoning would be used to invalidate economic regulations. Meyer and Pierce become important precedents as the Supreme Court moved toward a more civil libertarian position in the mid-twentieth century. The continued vitality of these decisions was demonstrated in a line of decisions recognizing a substantive due process right to privacy concerning sexual behavior.

Justice McReynolds's record on other civil liberties issues was mixed. He joined in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925), which started the process of incorporating the First Amendment as among the liberties protected by the due process clause. Yet he was strongly committed to federalism and states rights. He generally resisted application of the criminal procedural guarantees in the Bill of Rights to state court proceedings. In United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174 (1939), the most important case addressing the scope of the Second Amendment, the justice upheld the restrictions of the National Firearms Act and ruled that the right to bear arms protected only the ownership of firearms that were ordinary militia weapons.

Justice McReynolds's tenure on the Court was marred by his intolerant attitude. Rude and self-righteous, he had generally poor relations with fellow justices. He was openly anti-Semitic and racist. He was disinterested in claims of equal rights from racial minorities. Yet, even unlikable persons can promote the cause of civil liberties, as in Meyer and Pierce.

JAMES W. ELY, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Bond, James E. I Dissent: The Legacy of Justice James Clark McReynolds. Fairfax, VA: George Mason University Press, 1992.
- Hutchison, Dennis J., and David J. Garrow. The Forgotten Memoir of John Knox: A Year in the Life of a Supreme Court Clerk in FDR's Washington. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.
- Jones, Calvin P. "Kentucky's Irascible Conservative: Supreme Court Justice James Clark McReynolds." Filson Club History Quarterly 57 (1983): 20–30.
- Ross, William G. Forging New Freedoms: Nativism, Education, and the Constitution, 1917–1927. Lincoln, NE: University of Nebraska Press, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- Meyer v. Nebraska*, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 368 U.S. 510 (1952)
- United States v. Miller*, 307 U.S. 174 (1939)

MEDIA ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Although information has played a pivotal role in the affairs of humankind since the dawn of civilization, the notion of access to information as a civil right is a uniquely modern invention. But based upon the liberal concepts of the autonomy of the individual and the sovereignty of the people in politics, access to information is an organizing principle of democratic societies. Cato's letters on "Freedom of Speech," published in England prior to the American Revolution, energized the Framers of the First Amendment with the assertion that it "ought to be the Ambition, of all honest magistrates, to have their Deeds openly examined, and publicly screened." James Madison echoed these sentiments, remarking that the right to "freely examine public characters and measures, and of free communication thereon" was "the only effectual guardian of every other right."

However, since most citizens have neither the time nor inclination to attend public meetings, inspect public records, or personally cultivate a familiarity with newsworthy events, the media are the surrogates through which the individual citizen's right to know is vindicated. The media's legal and philosophical claim to a right of access to information may properly be characterized as a civil right because of its derivation from the right of the public generally to receive ideas, opinions, and facts that make their participation in community affairs and democratic self-governance meaningful. While there are many theories undergirding freedom of expression, two in particular are pertinent to the media's right of access to information. The marketplace model, which is reflected in Justice Holmes's famous declaration in Abrams v. United States (250 U.S. 616, 1919) that "the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the marketplace," implies a right to gather information to enhance the quality of marketplace discourse. Similarly, the democratic model, often associated with Professor Alexander Meiklejohn, values speech because it is essential to self-government, which depends upon an informed electorate that has access to a diversity of ideas and opinions.

Thus, the right of access to government-controlled information is a natural corollary to the political purposes of the First Amendment. Although the Supreme Court first recognized the essential link between the First Amendment and self-government as early as 1936 (Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 1936), the Court has been reticent in extending a constitutional right of access to a broad spectrum of government information and institutions. The Court has acknowledged that "news gathering is not without its First Amendment protections" (Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 1972), but has not clearly defined the parameters of this rather ambiguous affirmation. The seminal case recognizing the media's right of access is Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia (448 U.S. 555, 1980), in which the Court recognized a right to attend criminal trials. The Court subsequently extended this access right to other judicial proceedings, but a right of access to most other public bodies and official records remains primarily a function of legislatively enacted public records and "sunshine" (open meetings) laws. Such access is thus a product of the democratic process, but it can be limited in the same manner.

LOUIS A. DAY

References and Further Reading

- Branscomb, Anne Wells. Who Owns Information? From Privacy to Public Access. New York: Basic Books, 1994.
- Dienes, C. Thomas, Lee Levine, and Robert C. Lind. News-gathering and the Law, 2nd ed. Charlottesville, VA: Lexis Law Publishing, 1999.
- Dyk, Timothy B., Newsgathering, Press Access, and the First Amendment, Stanford Law Review 44 (1992): 927-960.
- Emerson, Thomas, Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment, Yale Law Journal 72 (1963): 877-956.
- Hayes, Michael J., What Ever Happened to "the Right to Know"? Access to Government-Controlled Information Since Richmond Newspapers, Virginia Law Review 73 (1987): 1111-1143.
- Levy, Leonard W. Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Meiklejohn, Alexander. Political Freedom: The Constitutional Powers of the People. New York: Harper, 1960.
- Middleton, Kent R., William E. Lee, and Bill F. Chamberlin. The Law of Public Communication, 2003 ed. Boston: Pearson Education, Inc., 2003.
- Note, the First Amendment Right to Gather State-Held Information, Yale Law Journal 89 (1980): 923-939.
- Splichal, Slavko. Principles of Publicity and Press Freedom. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Branzburg v. Hayes*, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)
- Grosjean v. American Press Co.*, 297 U.S. 233 (1936)
- Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia*, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)
- See also Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919); Access to Government Operations Information; Access to Judicial Records; Access to Prisons; Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972); Cameras in the Courtroom; Free Press/Fair Trial; Freedom of Information Act (1966); Freedom of Information and Sunshine Laws; Media Access to Judicial Proceedings; Media Access to Military Operations; Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974); Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980); Saxbe v. Washington Post, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)

MEDIA ACCESS TO JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

Though the First Amendment to the Constitution appears to afford no right of access to official proceedings, the Supreme Court decided in a string of cases from 1979 to 1986 that the public and media have a presumptive constitutional right to witness criminal judicial proceedings, independent of the Sixth Amendment right of the accused to a public trial.

In Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980), the keystone case, a plurality ruled improper a trial closure upon the defendant's motion. Under the Court test, a right of public access depends first on an "uncontradicted history," or experience, of open proceedings, and second on a logical "function" served by openness, such as building public confidence in the judiciary or fostering community catharsis.

If the test is met, then any closure order must be narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling state interest, such as ensuring a fair trial. A judge must consider alternatives to closure, such as careful voir dire, change of venue, or sequestration, and must make written findings on the record in support of closure.

The Court held that the test satisfied for criminal jury selection and a criminal pretrial suppression hearing. Lower courts have extended Richmond Newspapers to civil cases. Federal courts have divided over access to administrative deportation hearings and have held that access does not entail a right to photograph or videotape.

A common-law right of access to judicial proceedings may pertain when the constitutional right does not, but the common-law right may be outweighed by countervailing interests.

RICHARD J. PELTZ

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 (1979)
Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court, 457 U.S. 596 (1982)
Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court (I), 464 U.S. 501 (1984)
Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court (II), 478 U.S. 1 (1984)
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)

See also Access to Judicial Records; Access to Prisons; Burger Court; Cameras in the Courtroom; Discovery Materials in Court Proceedings; Duty to Obey Court Orders; Gag Orders in Judicial Proceedings; Media Access to Information; Media Access to Military Operations; Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980); Right of Access to Criminal Trials; Sealed Documents in Court Proceedings; State Courts

MEDIA ACCESS TO MILITARY OPERATIONS

Journalists have no First Amendment right to cover American military operations. The amount of press access and the extent to which press reports are subject to military censorship depend upon the attitudes of the president, secretary of defense, and military commanders in the field. Over the course of American military history, press access has varied considerably.

The greatest amount of press access to military operations occurred during the Vietnam War. Accredited journalists were generally permitted to travel with troops and their reports were not subject to military censorship. Many military officials, however, believed the largely unrestricted press coverage in Vietnam turned American public opinion against the military. Consequently, in the 1983 invasion of Grenada, reporters were excluded from the invasion force. Similarly, during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, journalists were largely kept away from scenes of breaking news and their reports were subject to military censorship. During the 2003 invasion of Iraq, though, nearly seven hundred journalists were "embedded" or placed within military units. The Pentagon allowed this extensive access to shape public opinion about the war and counter Iraqi claims of American atrocities. As in other wars, journalists agreed to follow a lengthy set of ground rules to protect troop safety. For example, embedded reporters agreed not to report information about tactics or specific numbers of troops and equipment.

Press organizations have rarely challenged limits on access to military operations and facilities. The few challenges that have occurred have been unsuccessful; no court has ruled unconstitutional a Pentagon policy limiting access to combat operations or facilities. Judicial support for a First Amendment right to gather information in military settings has merely been in the abstract; some courts have suggested that this right could be recognized in an appropriate case in the future. Other courts, however, have ruled that the Pentagon is under no obligation to open military operations to the press. Consequently, press access remains at the discretion of government officials.

In Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the public had a First Amendment right to attend criminal trials. The Court found that there was a long-standing tradition of open judicial proceedings and the presence of the public enhanced the integrity of trials. In Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974), however, the Court held that the press is not entitled to information unavailable to the public. In JB Pictures, Inc. v. Department of Defense, 86 F.3d 236 (D.C. Cir.

1996), a restriction on public access to a military base was upheld because military bases do not share the tradition of openness of courtrooms. Moreover, the restriction on public access, like that in Pell, applied equally to the press and the public.

In Flynt v. Rumsfeld, 355 F.3d 697 (D.C. Cir. 2004), a federal appellate court upheld restrictions on press access to American military forces operating in Afghanistan. The appellate court noted that military battlefields, unlike trials, have not been traditionally open to the public. "There is nothing we have found in the Constitution, American history, or our case law" to support the claim that the press has a First Amendment right to accompany troops into combat, the appellate court wrote. Similarly, in Getty Images News Services v. Department of Defense, 193 F. Supp. 2d 112 (D.C. 2002), a federal district judge upheld U.S. military restrictions on press access to prisoners held as "unlawful combatants" at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base. In light of the "unique military context," the court held that press access to the prisoners was not guaranteed by the First Amendment. However, if the military granted some members of the press access to the facility, the selection procedures must be reasonable, the court wrote.

WILLIAM E. LEE

References and Further Reading

- Cassell, Paul A., Restrictions on Press Coverage of Military Operations: The Right of Access, Grenada, and "off-the-Record" Wars, Georgetown Law Review 73 (1985): 931-973.
- Jacobs, Matthew A., Note: Assessing the Constitutionality of Press Restrictions in the Persian Gulf War, Stanford Law Review 44 (1992): 675-726.
- Smith, Jeffery A. War and Press Freedom: The Problem of Prerogative Power. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Flynt v. Rumsfeld*, 355 F.3d 697 (D.C. Cir. 2004)
- Getty Images News Services v. Department of Defense*, 193 F. Supp. 2d 112 (D.C. 2002)
- JB Pictures, Inc. v. Department of Defense*, 86 F.3d 236 (D.C. Cir. 1996)
- Pell v. Procunier*, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)
- Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia*, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)
- See also Guantanamo Bay, enemy Combatants, Post 9/11

MEDIA LIABILITY FOR CAUSING PHYSICAL HARM

If a journalist or entertainer directly injures another person or damages property while pursuing a news story or performing, legal liability arises just as in any other setting. Engaging in expressive activity creates no shield or immunity for such harms as assault or trespass for which any other perpetrator would have to compensate a victim. Hard questions arise, however, when media activity is blamed for having indirectly caused physical harm, such as when the assailant has just watched a violent movie, played a violent video game, or read a book that offers detailed instructions for murder.

Victims have frequently brought suit against the creator, producer, or distributor of the violent material that allegedly caused them harm, claiming that a legal duty of care had been breached and thus created a wrong for which damages should be recoverable. The courts have dismissed almost all such lawsuits, typically because the requisite causal link between the violent material and the injury could not be established; in virtually all such cases someone else's unlawful act inflicted the injury, whatever material that person may have read or seen. Some courts have added their concern that, even if the causal link could be proved, imposing such liability on the media or entertainment purveyors would severely chill freedom of speech and press. Indeed, only three courts have ever ruled that such liability could be imposed; most recently a federal appeals court allowed a murder victim's family to sue the publisher of a book (Hit-Man Manual) that a hired assassin had followed in committing the homicide.

WILLIAM E. LEE

References and Further Reading

- O'Neil, Robert M. The First Amendment and Civil Liability. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.

MEESE, EDWIN, III (1931-)

Edwin Meese, III served as attorney general of the United States under President Ronald Reagan from 1985 to 1988. Meese worked in various capacities in the Reagan administration before his appointment to the cabinet, but he first came to Reagan's attention during the 1960s while the latter was governor of California. As a deputy district attorney for Alameda County, California, Meese was a stern handler of student protesters at the University of California at Berkeley, directing the arrest of over seven hundred fifty antiwar activists.

After serving on the president's National Security Council, among other positions, Meese acceded to attorney general after lengthy, contentious hearings that stalled his nomination for over a year. Meese shared Reagan's political views, and as a long time confidante with close access to the president, he pressed the president's conservative agenda. Meese was opposed throughout his term by such groups as the American Civil Liberties Union for his views on civil rights and the Constitution.

Meese's legal ideology found its moorings in the "jurisprudence of original intention," a position that advocated interpretation of the Constitution in line with the plain meaning of the constitutional text and the intentions of the Framers. His view that "the Constitution said what it meant and meant what it said" led him to contend that the Bill of Rights was designed only to apply to national government. As such, Meese bucked the Supreme Court's jurisprudential trend since the 1960s, which viewed most of the rights' provision of the Constitution as "incorporated" by the Fourteenth Amendment and thus applicable to the states. Meese also advocated the reversal of the Court's Miranda v. Arizona (384 U.S. 436, 1966) and Mapp v. Ohio (367 U.S. 643, 1961) decisions, contending famously that the latter "only helps guilty defendants." Meese had little success, though, in effecting a fundamental shift in the Supreme Court's civil rights jurisprudence.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Jenkins, John A. "Mr. Power." The New York Times, October 12, 1986, sec. 6, p. 19.
- McBride, James, Religion and the First Amendment: An Inquiry Into the Presuppositions of "the Jurisprudence of Original Intention," Journal of Law and Religion 6 (1988).
- Meese, Edwin, II, The Supreme Court of the United States: The Bulwark of a Limited Constitution, South Texas Law Review 27 (1985–1986): 455.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Mapp v. Ohio*, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

MEGAN'S LAW (FELON REGISTRATION)

"Megan's law" is the popular term for provisions requiring selected criminal offenders to register with local law enforcement authorities and mandating that these agencies notify the community of the offenders' presence. The first Megan's law was passed in New Jersey in 1994 after Jesse Timmendequas, a convicted sex offender, raped and killed his neighbor, seven-year-old Megan Kanka. The story captured the interest of national media, igniting broad public outrage. New Jersey swiftly adopted a community notification statute. Other states and the federal government quickly followed suit. By 1999, every state had adopted some form of Megan's Law.

Although they are typically cast as child-protection provisions, the actual scope of the statutes is somewhat different. Every state registration and community notification law covers all offenders convicted of serious sex crimes against adults or children and those convicted of crimes of violence against children. In some states, however, these laws include other serious violent offenses or less serious sexual offenses such as adult prostitution.

Notification procedures varied widely in the early years. While some states maintained offender data at local police stations, subject to review by community members, others distributed handbills, posted notices, and provided the information via the Internet. In recent years, states have increasingly utilized publicly available Web-based databases. In 2005, the federal government created a National Sex Offender Public Registry.

Megan's laws are best seen as the product of "moral panic": intense public anxiety about a problem exceeding its actual scope. In fact, the sorts of cases embodied by the Kanka murder—child abduction and violence perpetrated by people who are not family members—are actually very rare. Nonetheless, the surge of public anxiety caused by media portrayals of the problem made Megan's laws effectively unstoppable.

Critics of these provisions have offered a number of arguments against Megan's laws, chief among them that they are ineffective and create a false sense of security for the public. Other criticisms include the argument that notification laws violate the constitutional protections against double jeopardy and ex post facto punishment; that they apply a permanent stigma to offenders that is morally unjustifiable and counterproductive; that they might spur vigilante justice against offenders; and that they have a racially disparate impact.

Defenders of the laws say that they provide a public service and are an important check against recidivism. They argue that the privacy rights of offenders are outweighed by the need for communities to defend themselves against serious crime. They also argue that sexual offenders have uniquely high recidivism rates and thus must be monitored more closely than other offenders.

Whatever their efficacy, Megan's laws remain very popular. Public concern about sexual violence against children ebbs for periods, but the national media have found such cases to be highly engaging. When new crimes occur and receive broad public scrutiny, interest in Megan's laws surges and legislators attempt to fashion new initiatives to expand their reach.

DANIEL M. FILLER

References and Further Reading

Filler, Daniel M., Silence and the Racial Dimension of Megan's Law, Iowa Law Review 89 (2004): 1535–1594.

See also Rape; Sex and Criminal Justice

MEIKLEJOHN, ALEXANDER (1872–1964)

Few philosophers of civil liberties have had such a major impact on the Supreme Court's jurisprudence of the First Amendment as Alexander Meiklejohn. His views on what the speech and press clauses mean were almost fully adopted in the Court's landmark decision in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964).

Born in England, Meiklejohn was eight years old when his parents emigrated to Rhode Island. After completing undergraduate studies at Brown University, he earned a doctorate in philosophy at Cornell in 1897. Upon graduation, he accepted an assistant professorship at Brown, and four years later became dean. In 1912, Amherst College offered him its presidency.

His eleven years at Amherst were marked by curriculum innovation, and his educational reforms in many ways tracked the civil liberties arguments he would later enunciate. As at Brown he spent a great deal of time on student matters and won a national reputation as a motivator of young men. During World War I he brought controversial speakers to campus, and insisted that the opponents of American entry into the fray should be given equal time with those in support. He brought younger faculty onto the campus, who proved—to his and the students' delight—to be not only excellent teachers but also thought provoking. Meiklejohn did not believe that education consisted of indoctrination, but rather of providing students with the basic tools they needed to think and to challenge the accepted pieties. He also hired the first-ever college writer-in-residence, the poet Robert Frost.

Given the politically charged atmosphere of the war years, it is no surprise that the conservative trustees, led by financier Dwight Morrow, disapproved of Meiklejohn's leadership and fired him on the morning of commencement in June 1923. The firing triggered an uproar. A dozen students refused to accept their degrees, several faculty members resigned that day, and newspapers in Boston and New York carried the story, with both sides stating their cases, for weeks. After his dismissal, Meiklejohn, reportedly a spell-binding speaker, traveled around the country, giving a number of talks on academic freedom and his ideas as to what constituted a good education, and he published a number of these in Freedom and the College (1923).

In 1926, Meiklejohn accepted an invitation to join the faculty at the University of Wisconsin and to found a college that would implement his pedagogical ideas. He ran the Experimental College, as it was called, from 1927 to 1932; while in the short run the effort proved unsuccessful, many of its ideas would later be incorporated into the curricula of a number of American schools. The students in the school lived together in designated dorms and, unlike the regular students, had no required classes or even examinations. In the first year they studied ancient Athens in the age of Pericles; the following year they explored contemporary American society. They did this through a variation of the English system of tutorials and papers. In their third year they rejoined the regular undergraduates or transferred to another college.

The Experimental College brought a great deal of national attention to Meiklejohn and his ideas, and he even made the cover of Time magazine. But like his work at Amherst, it roused the opposition of traditionalists, especially among faculty and administrators wedded to the idea of lectures, set curricula, and graded examinations. They in turn began to tell Wisconsin parents that children educated in the Experimental College would be unfit to earn their livings or function in the outside world after graduation. As a result, enrollment fell and the university ended the experiment in 1932.

Meiklejohn wrote of his experience at Wisconsin and of his belief in a core curriculum in The Experimental College (1932). His ideas, which struck many as radical, were really not fitted for a large state university. The use of tutorials is labor intensive and requires a student-to-faculty ratio that one normally finds only at small private colleges. But the idea of a core curriculum was later picked up and proved successful at Columbia, from which it spread to a number of other schools. The great books curriculum has been the hallmark of St. John's College in Annapolis, where it was installed by one of Meiklejohn's former students. The two-year nonrequirement curriculum is at the heart of the Echols Scholars Program at the University of Virginia and at the interdisciplinary Evergreen State College in Washington State.

After leaving Wisconsin, Meiklejohn moved to Berkeley, California, where he lived and worked until his death. He continued his educational reforms through a privately financed program in adult education, the San Francisco School of Social Studies. He also wrote widely, and books such as What Does America Mean? (1935) and Education Between Two Worlds (1942) are extensive critiques of American society and education. He considered many of the problems a result of what he termed “Protestant capitalist civilization.” Scholars who have analyzed his work conclude that Meiklejohn was not a Marxist; in fact, he did not fit easily into any defined school of social thought or philosophy. He admired and developed ideas from Jean-Jacques Rousseau and Immanuel Kant, both of whom wrote about the role of education and the moral life.

From the start Meiklejohn had been interested in and a champion of civil liberties and had antagonized conservatives at Amherst by his insistence that opponents of World War I have the opportunity to present their case. Now he began to devote more of his energies to that field. He founded and for a number of years headed the northern California chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, one of the earliest chapters in the ACLU’s history and from the beginning one of its most active. During the “red scare” of the 1940s and 1950s, Meiklejohn was among the very few defending the right of communists to speak their views, and he opposed the national ACLU’s expulsion of an admitted communist from its board. He also defended University of California faculty members who refused to sign a loyalty oath pledging that they had never been communists.

He also began to think more about the philosophical basis of free speech, and wrote about it in a number of articles and in two very important books, Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government (1948) and Political Freedom: The Constitutional Powers of the People (1960).

The jurisprudence of free speech in the United States was still in its rather early stages when Meiklejohn began writing. As late as 1907, in Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454 (1907), the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment did little more than prohibit prior censorship of a statement; once uttered or printed, however, the speaker or writer could be prosecuted for libel. In the World War I cases, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. (who had also written the opinion in Patterson) laid out the idea of a “clear-and-present danger” test. Initially, the justice used this test to justify governmental suppression of free speech in wartime, but later converted it to a more speech-protective standard. For Justice Holmes, free speech was necessary so that various notions could be presented in the marketplace of ideas.

Meiklejohn appears to have been influenced by Justice Louis D. Brandeis’s opinion in Whitney v.

California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927), in which the justice laid out the notion of free speech as necessary in a democratic society. Certainly much of Meiklejohn’s theory tracks Justice Brandeis’s ideas, although he would in the end go much further in what he considered the types of speech that the First Amendment protects.

Like Justice Brandeis, Meiklejohn considered the free exchange of ideas necessary for a democratic society to function. Citizens had to make decisions, and in order to make those decisions intelligently, they needed to have information and to hear all sides of an issue before making up their minds. For Justice Brandeis, this meant freedom of speech for the speaker, even the speaker of unpopular ideas. Meiklejohn expanded this to include a “right to hear.” No matter how heated an issue, no matter how unpopular the ideas of one side or the other might be, the public had a right to hear any point of view, since knowledge is essential in democratic decisionmaking. This overrides any governmental interest in silencing a particular point of view, and Meiklejohn emphatically rejected Justice Holmes’s “clear-and-present danger” test.

Meiklejohn did not argue that the speaker had a right to speak the truth or that the public had a right to hear the truth, but rather that for the people to be their own rulers, they had to have access to different truths. Many ideas are subjective, such as the best tax rate to spur economic growth or to protect middle-income families. Is capitalism the best system to promote happiness and well-being? The people could, in the end, decide that they really did in fact like and want to keep in the current system, but in order for them to make a wise decision they needed to hear all sides of the arguments.

Meiklejohn initially believed that freedom of expression ought to be confined to governmental or political issues, and this would have allowed regulation of other forms of speech, such as obscenity. He later refined his position to say that in order to make decisions about government and political issues, discussion of issues related to education, philosophy, arts, science, and so forth was necessary. In fact, one could never be sure just what issues would prove to be important, so Meiklejohn eventually moved to a near-absolutist position similar to the one espoused by Justices Hugo L. Black and William O. Douglas.

To allow this much speech, of course, could lead to raucous interactions, and Meiklejohn was prepared to accept that as one of the prices of democracy. Perhaps the best exposition of this notion came in Justice Brennan’s opinion in the landmark case of New York Times v. Sullivan (376 U.S. 254, 1964), in which the justice described discussion in a free society as “wide open and robust.” If it at times it seemed overly noisy or disjointed, and even if at times misguided ideas were shouted about, that was all right too. The opinion, which struck down traditional libel limits on criticism of public officials, tracked Meiklejohn’s ideas closely, and when he heard of the decision, he declared it “an occasion for rejoicing in the streets.”

Few philosophers not only have seen their work influence the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court, but also have that influence acknowledged by the justices. When Meiklejohn received the Presidential Medal of Freedom from John F. Kennedy in 1963, four members of the Court came to the White House to join the ceremony. After his death, Justice Brennan wrote a tribute in which he acknowledged the importance of Meiklejohn’s ideas in developing First Amendment jurisprudence.

Since Meiklejohn’s death the Supreme Court has retreated in large measure from his equation of the “right to hear” with the “right to speak,” and First Amendment jurisprudence is focused primarily on the speaker rather than the listener. This has been especially true in cases involving the press clause. Justice Potter Stewart took a very “Meiklejohnian” approach in his idea of the press as an institutional entity, in which the press reported to the people information they needed but which they could not necessarily secure themselves. For example, it is important to have open and free coverage of trials so that people know that the criminal justice system is working properly, although it is clear that the vast majority of the citizenry could neither take the time to attend nor, if they could, be accommodated in the courtroom. The people had a right to know, and the press served the institutional role of providing that information.

Because he died before the Court began dealing with other types of speech, it is unclear how much protection Meiklejohn would have given to nonpolitical speech or how far he would have been willing to go to allow that some forms of art, for example, might have political components. But his influence in education and civil liberties theory remains important; if the Court is no longer as attached to Meiklejohn’s principles as it used to be, the heart of First Amendment jurisprudence still derives primarily from Justice Brandeis’s Whitney opinion and Meiklejohn’s elaboration and expansion of those ideas.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Brennan, William J., The Supreme Court and the Meiklejohn Interpretation of the First Amendment, Harvard Law Review 79 (1965): 1.

Kalven, Harry, Jr. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.

Nelson, Adam R. Education and Democracy: The Meaning of Alexander Meiklejohn, 1872–1964. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2001.

Schauer, Frederick. Free Speech: A Philosophical Enquiry. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1982.

MENNA v. NEW YORK, 423 U.S. 61 (1975)

The Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution prohibits double jeopardy, wherein criminal defendants are prosecuted twice for the same crime. In Menna v. New York, 423 U.S. 61 (1975), Menna appealed his case to the U.S. Supreme Court, claiming that his Fifth Amendment right was violated. When he was before a grand jury, Menna refused to answer questions in connection with a murder conspiracy investigation. He was then given immunity from prosecution and ordered to return to the grand jury and testify about the same investigation. He refused to obey the court order and was charged with contempt of court and sentenced to jail for a period of thirty days.

The grand jury then indicted Menna for refusing to answer questions before them. Menna pleaded guilty to the indictment and was sentenced, but appealed his case under the double jeopardy clause of the Fifth Amendment. Menna claimed that it was unconstitutional for the grand jury to indict him on charges on which he had already plead guilty and served his sentence. The New York Court of Appeals, based on the merits of Tollett v. Henderson, 411 U.S. 258 (1973), upheld the conviction. Tollett held that a double jeopardy claim was “waived” when a defendant pleaded guilty.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the New York court and precluded the state from prosecuting individuals more than once on the same charge. The Court thus ruled that under federal law, a conviction must be set aside even if the petitioner pled guilty.

NATALIE R. GREGG

Cases and Statutes Cited

Tollett v. Henderson, 411 U.S. 258 (1973)

See also Double Jeopardy (v) Early History, Background, Framing

MENTALLY ILL

People with mental illness are subject to special treatment in all three settings in which the law deprives people of liberty. In criminal cases, only people with mental illness have a special defense (insanity). In the preventive detention setting, only people with mental disorders can be subject to long-term police power commitment based on a prediction that they are dangerous to others. In most jurisdictions, only people with mental illness are presumed incompetent and thus subject to involuntary hospitalization or guardianship under the state's parens patriae power. The impact of insanity defense on civil liberties is discussed in that entry.

Police power commitment at one time was reserved for people whose impairment was so serious they would be considered insane were they to commit a crime. But in Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346 (1997), the U.S. Supreme Court held that even sane individuals, such as sex offenders, may be subject to prolonged detention based on a prediction of danger, as long as they have a “mental abnormality” that makes them “dangerous beyond their control.” With respect to the state's parens patriae authority, the Court held in O'Connor v. Donaldson, 422 U.S. 563 (1976), that the state may not commit someone merely because he or she is mentally ill or if he or she can survive safely in freedom with the help of relatives or friends. Nonetheless, in many jurisdictions, homeless people who would rather be on the streets can be hospitalized, and people who are committed can be forcibly medicated even if they give plausible reasons for not wanting the medication.

CHRISTOPHER SLOBOGIN

References and Further Reading

Melton, Gary et al. Psychological Evaluations for the Courts: A Handbook for Mental Health Professionals and Lawyers, 2nd ed. New York: Guilford Press, 1997, chapter ten.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346 (1997)
O'Connor v. Donaldson, 422 U.S. 563 (1976)

See also Dusky v. U.S., 362 U.S. 402 (1961); Guilty but Mentally Ill; Insanity Defense; Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715 (1972); Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127 (1992)

METRO–GOLDWYN–MAYER STUDIOS (MGM) v. GROKSTER, 545 U.S. (2005)

Copyright law started with the printing press. Once copies could be multiplied more rapidly than a scribe could write, someone could charge for making copies of books composed by others. Copyright gives the author the exclusive right to authorize multiplication and distribution of copies. As technology changes, law needs to balance giving the author enough incentive so that he will write and publish his work, promoting investment in new distribution technologies by not allowing copyright holders power to block change in distribution methods, and providing the public with reasonably priced access to cultural materials. For example, at the beginning of the twentieth century, music distribution was revolutionized by the first technology allowing live music without the aid of a trained performer: the player piano. Composers and sheet music publishers were outraged when the U.S. Supreme Court held that manufacturers of player piano rolls were not required to pay copyright royalties (White-Smith v. Apollo Company, 209 U.S. 1, 1908).

A related recurring problem is when someone should be held liable for another's infringement (“secondary liability”). The U.S. copyright statute has never been explicit on secondary liability, but the courts have used their common-law power to create two basic doctrines: vicarious and contributory infringement. Person C is liable for contributory infringement when someone else infringes, C knows of the infringement, and C gives the infringer material help. Person C is liable for vicarious infringement when someone else infringes, C makes money from the infringement, and C has the right and ability to supervise the infringer. Under these rules, landlords who rent stores were not held liable if their tenants sell infringing records, but the operator of a department store was held liable for infringement by the person operating the record department as a concession. People running dance halls were held liable when the bands played copyrighted music without paying royalties. The operator of a swap meet was held liable when one of the vendors sold infringing music recordings.

Secondary liability and technological change meet when a copyright holder claims that someone should be liable because he provided equipment or technology used by its purchasers to infringe copyright. The technology provider does not control the customers. Making him liable would chill the development of technology that may provide major social value in the future; for example, such a claim could have been used to ban reprographic copiers or player pianos. In 1984, the Supreme Court considered such a claim brought by major motion picture studios against the manufacturer of the first video home recorder (VCR), Sony v. Universal City Studios (464 U.S. 774).

The Court borrowed a doctrine from the patent statute; it held that providing a device capable of infringing and “substantial noninfringing uses” does not create secondary liability. The noninfringing uses of the VCR included taping programs whose copyright holders did not object and “time shifting”—making copies of programs broadcast on free TV for the purpose of seeing the programs at more convenient times. With the legal immunity created by the Sony doctrine, VCRs became ubiquitous and movie studios obtained an unexpected major source of revenue from providing VCR copies of movies for home viewing. The Sony doctrine is also credited with encouraging venture capitalists to back the commercialization of new technologies, including the digital video recorder and various computer applications.

With the development of the Internet, many people began swapping unlicensed music through peer-to-peer networks (P2P)—computing uses where the infringing files are scattered among the computers of the users, as opposed to being hosted on a central server operated by a large entity. Napster, the first very popular P2P system, depended on a central index of files available for swapping. Because Napster maintained the index, it was held secondarily liable for its users’ copyright infringement, A&M Records v. Napster (239 F.3d 1004, 9th Cir. 2001). Later P2P software eliminated the need for a central index. Once users had the software, they could continue to swap files even if the software supplier vanished. Federal courts disagreed on how to apply secondary liability rules to these decentralized systems. The central dispute was how to decide when noninfringing uses were sufficiently “substantial” to trigger Sony.

The Supreme Court was expected to clarify the Sony doctrine in a case involving two decentralized P2P systems, Grokster and StreamCast (MGM v. Grokster). Instead, the unanimous Court borrowed another patent doctrine; it ruled that Grokster and StreamCast should be forced to defend the assertion that they had “induced” others to infringe by taking “affirmative steps” for the “object of promoting” users of their software to infringe, such as advertising their services to Napster’s former customers as the “new Napster” and advising their customers on how to copy specific copyrighted songs. Two concurring opinions discussed Sony. Three justices read Sony narrowly; three justices read Sony broadly. Since a legal rule is not law unless five justices agree, the meaning of Sony is still unclear. However, promoters of new technology definitely face a new type of secondary liability based on “inducement” of infringing conduct.

MALLA POLLACK

Cases and Statutes Cited

A&M Records, Inc. v. Napster, Inc., 239 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2001)

Sony Corporation of America v. Universal City Studios, Inc., 464 U.S. 774 (1984)

White-Smith Music Publishing Co. v. Apollo Company, 209 U.S. 1 (1908)

See also Common Law or Statute

MEYER v. NEBRASKA, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)

Meyer v. Nebraska addressed the constitutionality of a state law that prohibited the teaching of any foreign languages in any private, denominational, parochial, or public school to any child who had not completed the eighth grade. The petitioner, an instructor at a private school, was tried and convicted of unlawfully teaching German to a ten-year-old child. The statute at issue provided that “[n]o person, individually or as a teacher, shall, in any private, denominational, parochial or public school, teach any subject to any person in any language other than the English language” (262 U.S. at 396). A conviction under this statute would result in a fine or confinement in a jail for up to thirty days. Enacted in the wake of World War I, the apparent purpose of the statute was to prevent the inculcation of ideas and sentiments foreign to the best interests of the United States.

The Court considered whether the statute, as construed and applied, unreasonably infringed on the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. In finding the statute unconstitutional, the Court first considered the meaning of “liberty.” Liberty “denotes not merely the freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness” (262 U.S. at 398). Thus, at issue were the right of teachers to teach, the right of students to acquire desired knowledge, and the right of parents to control the education of their children.

The due-process doctrine established by the Court holds that “this liberty may not be interfered with, under the guise of protecting the public interest, by legislative action which is arbitrary or without reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State to effect” (262 U.S. at 399–400). Indeed, as the Court explained, mere knowledge of a foreign language cannot reasonably be regarded as harmful. It recognized that the state may go very far “in order to improve the quality of its citizens, physically, mentally and morally,” including prescribing a school curriculum, compelling school attendance, and requiring that instruction be given in English. The Court nevertheless stated that the fundamental rights of the individual “must be respected” (262 U.S. at 401). While the state’s purported purpose—universal understanding of English and the promotion of civic development—may be desirable, it cannot be promoted by prohibited means.

Meyer v. Nebraska is significant for many reasons. It was the first time the Supreme Court invoked the substantive due-process doctrine to protect noneconomic personal liberties. In so doing, it opened the door for the recognition of numerous other personal liberties and paved the way for the process of incorporation of the Bill of Rights into the Fourteenth Amendment (Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 666, 1925). Meyer was the first case to recognize parents’ due-process liberty interest in raising and educating their children and it continues to be followed today (Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 63, 2000; “the liberty interest at issue in this case—the interest of parents in the care, custody, and control of their children—is perhaps the oldest of the fundamental liberty interests recognized by this Court”). Along with Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), Meyer set the precedent for the right to privacy cases beginning in the 1960s—for example, Griswold v. Connecticut (381 U.S. 479, 1965, penumbra or zone of privacy includes married couple’s right to use contraceptives) and Roe v. Wade (410 U.S. 113, 1973, invalidating anti-abortion statute on right to privacy grounds).

Not only is the Meyer case significant for its far-reaching impact on personal liberties, but it also continues to be relevant in cases involving parental rights and education. The Supreme Court continues to recognize that the state may control the classroom curriculum, subject to certain constitutional limits (for example, Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 1968, invalidating a law prohibiting the teaching of Darwinian theory). Indeed, it remains the only Supreme Court case involving school curriculum, other than cases involving issues of religion, such as school prayer and Bible recitations.

EMILY R. FROMSON

References and Further Reading

Ross, William G., A Judicial Janus: Meyer v. Nebraska in Historical Perspective, University of Cincinnati Law Review 57 (1988): 125–204.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 666 (1925)

Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000)

MIAMI HERALD PUBLISHING CO. v. TORNILLO, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)

In 1972, the Miami Herald printed two editorials that were critical of Pat Tornillo’s candidacy for the Florida House of Representatives. Tornillo wanted to invoke his “right to reply” pursuant to Florida Statute Section 104.38, which required a newspaper to give equal space free of charge to a candidate for political office when a newspaper publishes criticism about the candidate.

The Dade County Circuit Court held the statute unconstitutional because it infringed on the freedom of the press, but the Florida Supreme Court reversed. Chief Justice Burger delivered a unanimous decision in which the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the Florida Supreme Court’s decision and articulated four reasons why the “right to reply” statute violated the First Amendment’s free press guarantee. First, the statute was effectively telling a newspaper what it must publish even if “reason” says that it should not be published. Second, by forcing a newspaper to publish certain information, the statute worked the same as a statute that restricts what a newspaper can publish. Third, the statute was exacting a penalty against the newspaper by forcing the paper to spend money and take up space in the paper. Fourth, the statute intruded on an editor’s decision about what material should go into a newspaper and chilled coverage of controversial issues.

This decision has effectively prevented states from intruding on a newspaper’s decision about what to publish and has curtailed any right of access to newspapers.

CHRISTOPHER E. EVERETT

References and Further Reading

Cook, Timothy E., ed. Freeing the Presses: The First Amendment in Action. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2005.
 Garry, Patrick M. Scrambling for Protection. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1994.
 Hayes, John, The Right to Reply: A Conflict of Fundamental Rights, Columbia Journal of Law and Social Problems 37 (2004): 551–583.
 Tedford, Thomas L., and Dale A. Herbeck. Freedom of Speech in the United States, 4th ed. State College, PA: Strata Publishing, Inc., 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Democratic National Committee, 412 U.S. 94 (1973)

Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)

Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214 (1966)

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)

Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. Federal Communications Commission, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)

See also Anonymity and Free Speech; Anonymity in Online Communication; Application of First Amendment to States; Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Broadcast Regulation; Cable Television Regulation; Compelling State Interest; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century

MICHIGAN DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE v. SITZ, 496 U.S. 444 (1990)

Sitz was argued February 27, 1990 and decided June 14, 1990 by a vote of six to three. Chief Justice Rehnquist delivered the opinion for the Court, with Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens dissenting. The Court held that while highway sobriety checkpoints allow for a “seizure,” the seizure is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The decision signifies that the Court recognizes the state’s “grave and legitimate interest in curbing drunk driving” (p. 444).

Michigan State Police established a highway sobriety checkpoint with guidelines governing checkpoint operations, site selection, and publicity. During the time frame at issue, 126 vehicles passed through the checkpoint with an average delay of twenty-five seconds, and two drivers were arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol.

Using the rationale from U.S. v. Martinez–Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976), Chief Justice Rehnquist argued that the degree of intrusion is minimal in comparison to the state’s interest. “No one can seriously dispute the magnitude of the drunken driving problem or the States’ interest in eradicating it. Media reports of alcohol-related death and mutilation on the Nation’s roads are legion. The anecdotal is confirmed by the statistical. ‘Drunk drivers cause an annual death toll of over 25,000 and in the same time span cause nearly one million personal injuries and more than five billion dollars in property damage.’” The empirical data coupled with the brief intrusion, Chief Justice Rehnquist reversed the Michigan Court of Appeals and affirmed the constitutionality of sobriety checkpoints.

Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens dissented. The dissent focused on the suspicionless seizure of motorists. Differentiating with Martinez–Fuerte, Justice Brennan noted that, in Sitz, the element of surprise played a large role. The majority decision gave unlimited discretion to detain the driver on the slightest suspicion. The dissent went on to argue that the majority misapplies the balancing test by assuming there is no difference between a routine stop at a permanent checkpoint and a surprise stop at a sobriety checkpoint. “This is a case that is driven by nothing more than symbolic state action—an insufficient justification for an otherwise unreasonable program of random seizures. Unfortunately, the Court is transfixed by the wrong symbol—the illusory prospect of punishing countless intoxicated motorists—when it should keep its eyes on the road plainly marked by the Constitution.”

AARON R. S. LORENZ

See also Checkpoints (roadblocks); City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32 (2000); Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979)

MICHIGAN v. DEFILLIPPO, 443 U.S. 31 (1979)

The Supreme Court adopted the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), to deter unreasonable searches and seizures. The exclusionary rule states that evidence seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment will be excluded. The “good faith” exception to the exclusionary rule, created by the Supreme Court in U.S. v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984), allows evidence seized by the police executing a facially valid search warrant issued by a judge to be admitted in court even though the search warrant was later found to be invalid.

In Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31 (1979), the Supreme Court extended the “good faith” exception to cover searches conducted in good-faith reliance upon a city ordinance that was later determined to be unconstitutional. A Detroit city ordinance authorized police officers to stop and question a person if there was “reasonable cause” to believe that the person’s behavior justified further investigation for criminal activity. Detroit police officers discovered DeFillippo in a compromising situation in an alley with a woman. When asked for identification, DeFillippo failed to identify himself properly, which resulted in his arrest. A subsequent search of DeFillippo turned up illegal drugs.

DeFillippo filed a motion to suppress the evidence obtained during the search, arguing that the police officers’ reliance on the city ordinance authorizing a warrantless search violated the Fourth Amendment. The trial court denied the motion to suppress. The court of appeals reversed the trial court's decision and held that the city ordinance was unconstitutionally vague, thus making the arrest and search invalid.

The Supreme Court reversed the Michigan Court of Appeals decision and applied the "good faith" exception to those situations where the police rely upon a city ordinance authorizing a warrantless search, even though the city ordinance was later found to be unconstitutional. The Court felt applying the exclusionary rule in such cases would not deter police misconduct because the police officers were following the law as written, and thus exclusion of the evidence would serve no legitimate purpose.

JENNIFER J. ASHLEY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
U.S. v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984)

See also Exclusionary Rule

MICHIGAN v. LUCAS, 500 U.S. 145 (1991)

In Lucas, the Supreme Court held that a criminal defendant's Sixth Amendment right to present defense evidence may be forfeited by his failure to follow procedural rules.

Charged with sexual assault, Lucas announced at the beginning of trial that he intended to prove that he had a prior sexual relationship with the complainant in order to support his claim that she had consented on this occasion. Under Michigan's "rape-shield" statute, however, evidence of the complainant's prior sexual activity with the defendant is admissible only if the defendant reveals his intent to present such evidence well in advance of the trial. Since Lucas gave no advance notice, the judge excluded the evidence, and Lucas was convicted. The state appeals court reversed, reasoning that the exclusion of relevant evidence violated Lucas's right to present a defense.

The Supreme Court reversed that decision by a vote of seven to two. The Court agreed, as it had in Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973), that Lucas had a right to present relevant evidence. The Court concluded, however, that Michigan had valid reasons to require rape defendants to give advance notice of their intent to introduce evidence of complainants' prior sexual activity and that the evidence could be excluded for failure to provide that advance notice. Lucas, therefore, is one in a series of cases, including Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), and Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988), holding that a defendant's right to present a defense does not insulate him or her from reasonable procedural rules designed to prevent unfair surprise to the prosecution.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Westen, Peter, Confrontation and Compulsory Process: A Unified Theory of Evidence for Criminal Cases, Harvard Law Review 91 (1978): 567.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973)
Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988)
Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970)

See also Chambers v. Mississippi*, 410 U.S. 284 (1973); Defense, Right to Present; Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988)

MICHIGAN v. MOSLEY, 423 U.S. 96 (1975)

The power of a criminal suspect to refuse to answer police questions is well known. The police may not question suspects who have invoked their so-called Miranda right to silence. But does the Miranda right to silence mean that the police are foreclosed at some later time from seeking a suspect's waiver of that right? That is the question the Supreme Court addressed in Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975).

Mosley was arrested for several robberies and received the requisite Miranda warnings. He invoked his right to silence and the police did not try to change his mind. Two hours later, at another location within the precinct, another detective sought to question Mosley about an unrelated murder. Mosley was again told of his right to remain silent and thereafter gave an incriminating statement. The Supreme Court had two paths it could take in addressing Mosley's argument that the second interrogation violated his right to silence: Miranda's right to silence disallows any and all questioning once that right has been invoked; or the suspect's invocation of the right to silence mandates only the immediate cessation of questioning, but that a resumption of interrogation would in appropriate circumstances be permitted after some passage of time. The Court chose the latter path, ruling against Mosley and, in so doing, clarifying what Miranda actually offers a criminal suspect.

"The critical safeguard [of Miranda]," the Court said, "is a person's right to 'cut off questioning.'"

That power effectively gives the suspect the ability to control the flow of the interrogation. The rule that police interrogators must “scrupulously honor” a suspect’s invocation of the right to silence—that is, to refrain from further questioning—“counteracts the coercive pressures of the custodial setting.” The power to control the flow of the interrogation does not mean any and all police-initiated questioning is forever foreclosed. As long as a reasonable amount of time has passed—a cooling-off period, if you will—and fresh warnings are given, the resumption of questioning may not violate the “scrupulously honor” test. Suspects may again insist that questioning cease or they may now change their minds and answer questions. What Mosley reflects is the view that the coercion that so concerned the Court in Miranda is deflated when the suspect is given a genuine power to cease interrogation whenever it becomes too oppressive. This means the line between voluntary and involuntary statements is one drawn by the suspects.

DANIEL R. WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Procedure, 3rd ed. 2002.
Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975).

See also Exclusionary Rule; Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Miranda Warning; Self-Incrimination (V); Historical Background

MICHIGAN v. SUMMERS, 452 U.S. 692 (1981)

In Summers, the police executed a search warrant for narcotics at the defendant’s house and detained him for the duration of the search. After finding narcotics in the basement, the police arrested and searched the defendant, finding heroin in his coat pocket. On the defendant’s motion, the trial judge suppressed the heroin as fruit of an illegal search and was affirmed on appeal. The Supreme Court reversed, five to three, announcing a bright-line rule that search warrants for contraband carry with them implied limited authority to detain the occupants of the premises for the duration of the search.

The central issue before the Court was whether police can detain a suspect during a search without an arrest warrant when he is not inside the premises at the time the search begins. After looking at the individual privacy rights and government interests involved, the Court applied a reasonableness test to determine the constitutionality of the detention. The Court likened this case to the detentions in Terry v. Ohio (392 U.S. 1, 1968) and Adams v. Williams (407, U.S. 143, 1972), while contrasting it with Dunaway v. New York (442 U.S. 200, 1979), and held that while this stop constituted a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, it was sufficiently limited in scope and justified by special law enforcement needs not to require a warrant. The dissent argued that the detention of a suspect without an arrest warrant for the duration of a search is not sufficiently justified by unique law enforcement needs to constitute an exception to the general rule against warrantless seizures.

SARA E. LINDENBAUM

References and Further Reading

Paul, Launice, Case Developments: Criminal Law—Search and Seizure—in the Execution of a Search Warrant for Contraband Police May Detain Occupants of the Premises While a Proper Search Is Conducted: Michigan v. Summers, Howard Law Journal 25 (1982): 143–158.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Adams v. Williams, 407, U.S. 143 (1972)
Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979)
Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)

See also Arrest; Arrest without a Warrant; Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983); Fruit of the Poisonous Tree; Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Seizures; Warrant Clause (IV)

MILITARY LAW

Perhaps no area of American law better illustrates the limits of the Bill of Rights than military law. While Abe Fortas memorably stated in Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), that students do not “shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech . . . at the schoolhouse gate,” these and other civil liberties are routinely withheld from military personnel.

The guiding principle, stated most clearly in Orloff v. Willoughby, 354 U.S. 83 (1953), is that the military is “a specialized community governed by a separate discipline from that of the civilian.” As a separate society, the military is not bound by customary civil liberties conventions and is allowed to infringe upon individual rights to a degree unheard of in civilian settings. This separation is so stark that civilian courts generally will not even hear cases filed by service personnel unless they have exhausted their military justice system appeals.

Furthermore, the military receives nearly total deference from civilian courts. The Supreme Court starkly outlined its deferential approach in Burns v. Wilson, 346 U.S. 137 (1953): “the rights of men in the armed forces must perforce be conditioned to meet certain overriding demands of discipline and duty, and the civil courts are not the agencies which must determine the precise balance to be struck in this adjustment.” Departures from this approach are rare; while the Court briefly imposed a rule that the military could not court-martial service personnel for non-service-related offenses committed in peacetime (invalidating the court-martial of an army sergeant accused of rape in O’Callahan v. Parker, 395 U.S. 258, in 1969), this rule was discarded in 1987 in Solorio v. United States, 483 U.S. 435 (1987).

Consequently, normal application of American civil liberties is invariably subordinated to military imperatives. In Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503 (1986), the Court acknowledged the invasion of the religious rights of a Jewish Air Force chaplain barred from wearing his yarmulke under his uniform cap, but nevertheless held that military esprit de corps trumped the free exercise clause. Military discretion also won out over civil rights claims in Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 496 (1983), in which the courthouse door was barred for naval enlisted men who filed a civil lawsuit accusing their commanding officer of taking their race into account when meting out discipline.

The Court has even grafted dubious military interests onto otherwise blatant civil liberties violations. In United States v. O’Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968), the Court prioritized the purported military necessity of maintaining a bureaucratically efficient draft system ahead of the free-speech rights of an antiwar protestor who burned his draft card. They did so notwithstanding voluminous evidence in the Congressional Record that the authors of the legislation were trying to censor antiwar speech and not trying to streamline Selective Service procedures.

Deference to the military, while overwhelming, is not absolute. Civilian courts will freely correct the military if it is attempting to court-martial individuals over whom it does not have authority, such as dependents of military personnel or civilian employees of the military. Additionally, this tradition of deference ebbs when there is an intersection of military life and civilian life. In Flower v. United States, 407 U.S. 197 (1972), the Court reversed a military order barring an antiwar leaflet from a public street that ran through an open army post. On the other hand, in Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828 (1975), the Court rejected the argument that the military had created a public forum by opening up parts of Fort Dix to civilian access and held that the military could permissibly ban political protests from these unrestricted areas.

Arguably, the most controversial dimension of military law is the use of military tribunals. In comparison with civilian juries, military commissions may meet in secret, need not follow ordinary evidentiary rules, and may convict with less than a unanimous vote. During World War II, the Court sanctioned the trial of eight accused Nazi saboteurs by military tribunal in Ex Parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942); all eight were convicted, and six were electrocuted. After the events of September 11, 2001, President George W. Bush authorized trial by military tribunal for any non-U.S. citizen accused of terrorism or accused of harboring terrorists. While this order has not yet had occasion to be evaluated by the Supreme Court, the Court rebuffed the government in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004). Noting the unconventional nature of the war on terrorism, the Court observed that the government’s asserted ability to hold Yaser Hamdi as an “enemy combatant” for the war’s duration without allowing him to contest his detention could result in Hamdi’s indefinite confinement without trial. If nothing else, Hamdi and its companion cases make clear that this aspect of military law is undergoing comprehensive contemporary reassessment.

STEVEN B. LICHTMAN

References and Further Reading

- Fisher, Louis. Military Tribunals and Presidential Power: American Revolution to the War on Terrorism. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 2005.
- Scheppele, Kim Lane, Law in Time of Emergency: States of Exception and the Temptations of 9/11, University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law 6 (May 2004): 1001.
- Turley, Jonathan, The Military Pocket Republic, Northwestern University Law Review 97 (2002): 1.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Burns v. Wilson*, 346 U.S. 137 (1953)
Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 496 (1983)
Ex Parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942)
Flower v. United States, 407 U.S. 197 (1972)
Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503 (1986)
Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828 (1975)
Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)
O’Callahan v. Parker, 395 U.S. 258 (1969)
Orloff v. Willoughby, 354 U.S. 83 (1953)
Solorio v. United States, 483 U.S. 435 (1987)
Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)
United States v. O’Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

See also Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Military Tribunals; Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969); United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

MILITARY TRIBUNALS

A military tribunal is a court created or established to hold trials of members of enemy armed forces or others subject to the court's jurisdiction during a time of war. On November 13, 2001, President George Bush signed a military order that authorized the creation of military tribunals to try some of those individuals seized during the war on terrorism. The presidential order was a reaction to the terrorist attacks on New York City on September 11, 2001. The order included specific findings that a state of emergency existed and set out many of the terms under which noncitizens would be detained, treated, and tried by the military tribunals.

Many have questioned the use of military tribunals to try persons charged with terrorist acts. In part, these are concerns about the status of those who are acting as warriors but who may not be wearing the distinctive identification of legitimate state combatants. Questions have included whether or not the traditional laws of war apply to such combatants and whether or not it would be more appropriate to try these combatants under the established criminal laws of the United States or other nations.

What Type of Tribunal Is Established?

These courts can be compared to and contrasted with the nation's civilian judiciary. The military tribunals are created under the authority of provisions in Articles I and II of the U.S. Constitution. Article I, Section 8, grants to the Congress the powers to declare war, raise and support army and naval forces, and make laws governing the conduct of the nation's armed forces. Article II confers the executive power upon the president and makes him the nation's military commander in chief.

The president's order gives exclusive jurisdiction to the military tribunals over these seized persons. The tribunals are not ordinarily bound by the procedures followed in civilian courts. Among the significant differences, for example, are the lesser standards for admissible evidence. Defendants are not allowed to appeal decisions to the federal courts. The president, furthermore, retains the power of final review. A series of Military Commission Instructions setting the organizational rules, procedural rules, and the elements of the crimes that could be tried by the tribunals were issued by the Department of Defense on April 30, 2003.

Have Military Tribunals Been Used Before?

The use of military tribunals is controversial. They have, however, been used in some form in every prior American war. Military tribunals were used extensively during and after the Civil War to try combatants and noncombatant civilians. The U.S. Supreme Court, shortly after the Civil War, ruled on the constitutionality of trials of citizens by military tribunals. But it was only with World War II that the Court ruled on the constitutionality of the use of military tribunals to try foreign belligerents.

Lambin Milligan, an Indiana resident, was tried and convicted by a military tribunal and sentenced to death for alleged disloyal activities during the Civil War. His sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment. Employing the Habeas Corpus Act of 1863, Milligan appealed to the federal courts. The U.S. Supreme Court did not decide the basic issue of the jurisdiction of a military tribunal or the power of military tribunals to try civilians. The Court held, however, that the president did not have the authority to try civilians in military tribunals in a state that was not in rebellion.

The next major case arose during World War II. President Roosevelt had issued a proclamation subjecting enemy combatants who entered the United States to trial by military tribunal. Eight German nationals trained in sabotage techniques were secreted into the United States. The eight were captured before they were able to carry out their plans. On appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, the petitioners argued that they were entitled to a trial by civil courts following the precedent set in Milligan. The Supreme Court, in Ex Parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942), upheld the constitutionality of military trials for offenses against the United States during time of war. The Court, however, reserved the right of the federal courts to review the constitutionality of further appeals in individual cases.

The Supreme Court did later affirm the constitutionality of military tribunals to try foreign combatants in In Re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946). The Court found that Congress had legally authorized the creation of military tribunals to try violations of the law of war.

Despite the extensive prior use of military tribunals, the perpetrators of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing in New York City and those accused of bombing two U.S. embassies in Africa in 1998 were all tried in the federal civilian courts. In addition, one of the accused September 11 hijackers, a French citizen, was also tried in federal court.

Are Military Tribunals Justified Today?

The use of military tribunals is controversial. The Court in Milligan asked the question whether American citizens should be subjected to military tribunals when the civilian courts are functioning. Human rights concerns are also raised when non-citizens are held for trial by the nation's military. With concerns like these in mind, the U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to rule on the constitutionality of the military tribunals. This appeal is a test of presidential wartime authority. On November 7, 2005, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the appeal in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld (415 F.3d 33, D.C. Cir. 2005, cert. granted, 74 U.S.LawW. 3284, U.S. Nov. 8, 2005, No.05-184), an appeal from the D.C. Circuit Court.

In Hamdan, the U.S. Supreme Court will be asked whether the noncitizen may be tried by the military tribunal; whether the military tribunal established to try alleged war crimes in the war on terror is authorized under provisions of the U.S. Constitution and federal law; and whether petitioners and others similarly situated can obtain civilian judicial enforcement from an Article III court of rights in an action for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the legality of their detention by the executive branch. A decision by the U.S. Supreme Court in Hamdan will be issued in 2006.

JERRY E. STEPHENS

References and Further Reading

- Council on Foreign Relations. Terrorism Questions & Answers: Military Tribunals. New York, 2004. (<http://cfrterrorism.org/responses/tribunals.html>).
- Crona, Spencer J., and Neal A. Richardson, Justice for War Criminals of Invisible Armies: A New Legal and Military Approach to Terrorism, Oklahoma City University Law Review 21 (1996): 349-407.
- Fisher, Louis. Military Tribunals: Historical Patterns and Lessons. (Report RL32458) Washington, D.C.: Congressional Research Service, July 2004. (The report is available at <http://www.fas.org/irp/crs/RL32458.pdf>).
- Tushnet, Mark, ed. The Constitution in Wartime: Beyond Alarmism and Complacency. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ex Parte Milligan*, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 2 (1866)
- Ex Parte Quirin*, 317 U.S. 1 (1942)
- Hamdan v. Rumsfeld*, 415 F.3d 33 (D.C. Cir. 2005), cert. granted, 74 U.S.LawW. 3284 (U.S. Nov. 8, 2005) (No.05-184)
- In Re Yamashita*, 327 U.S. 1 (1946)
- Habeas Corpus Act of 1863*, 12 Stat. 755 (1863)

MILKOVICH v. LORAIN JOURNAL CO., 497 U.S. 1 (1990)

In Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co., the Supreme Court clarified how the First Amendment affects state defamation law as relates to opinions. Milkovich, a high school wrestling coach, sued the Lorain Journal for libel after a sports writer for its newspaper wrote a column implying the coach committed perjury at a public hearing. The Ohio Court of Appeals upheld the dismissal of the suit because the article constituted an "opinion" protected by the First Amendment. In an eight-to-two decision, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed, holding the First Amendment did not create a special constitutional privilege for opinion.

The controversy over whether such a constitutional privilege exists is traceable to a dictum in an earlier Supreme Court opinion, Gertz v. Robert Welch, 418 U.S. 323 (1974). The Court in Milkovich decided Gertz did not create such a privilege. Otherwise, a person could escape liability by couching defamatory statements as opinion. The Court decided that opinion is defamatory if it is based on provably false facts. Because the connotation that Milkovich committed perjury was sufficiently susceptible to being proved true or false, it remanded the case to the Ohio courts for resolution.

The chief significance of Milkovich is that the Court found it unnecessary to create a new constitutional privilege to protect free speech. The Court noted that opinions not containing a provably false factual connotation enjoy full constitutional protection.

PHILIP L. MERKEL

References and Further Reading

- Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech, vol. 2, St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2005, sections 23-100-23-115.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.*, 418 U.S. 323 (1974)

MILL, JOHN STUART (1806–1873)

Background

John Stuart Mill was born in London, the son of English philosopher and historian James Mill. The elder Mill believed that by educating his son in advanced subjects from a very young age and shielding the boy from the distraction of other children, he could train the boy to be a great thinker. Under his father's strict tutelage, the young John Stuart became extremely precocious. His feats of scholarship included mastering Latin and Greek by age ten and beginning his work on logic and political economy in his early teens.

Like his father, John Stuart Mill believed fervently in the utilitarian principles of Jeremy Bentham. At seventeen, John Stuart founded the Westminster Review with Bentham to educate the public about utilitarianism. However, at the age of twenty-one John Stuart suffered a nervous breakdown that he attributed to the extraordinary intellectual discipline of his childhood and his failure to cultivate feelings or sentiment. This experience taught him the importance of taking pleasure in day-to-day life, and he found special spiritual solace in the poetry of Wordsworth.

Mill was a devoted husband and collaborated with his wife, Harriet Taylor, on many of his best works. He worked in the British East India Company most of his life and wrote in his spare time. From 1865 to 1868 he represented Westminster in Parliament, in which capacity he advocated for women's rights, women's suffrage, and anticolonialism. He loved to test his opinions in rhetorical contests with his peers and set up a kind of moot court for that purpose.

Relationship with American Civil Liberties

Mill's relationship with American civil liberties is complex and indeterminate because he never lived in America and wrote little about it. However, his influence on America during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries was very great. Mill worked in the same libertarian tradition as Locke and Smith that influenced America's founding fathers. However, Mill differed from Locke and Smith in important ways that mirror the ways that American law diverged from classical liberalism in the twentieth century. For example, Mill believed that a free market economy must be supplemented by government regulation. Furthermore, his defense of freedom was not based on an imaginary "social contract" or "natural law," but on the principle of utility. Mill feared the tendency of mercantilism to promote conformity, due partially to his reading of de Tocqueville. Mill's metaphor of the "marketplace of ideas" has been extensively used in American jurisprudence, especially when dealing with issues of free speech.

Writings

Mill's writings are range too broadly to do justice in the format of an encyclopedia entry. Only those writings most relevant to American civil liberties have been summarized.

Utilitarianism

In Utilitarianism Mill explained the principle of utility as a foundation for all ethics. He said the highest moral principle is that "actions are right in proportion as they tend to produce happiness, wrong as they tend to produce the reverse of happiness." From this principle one can extrapolate secondary principles, such as "do not steal." These secondary principles govern everyday actions. Only in a difficult moral dilemma need one refer to the first principle. The principle of utility gives structure to judgments of guilt or innocence. It is the result of an act that matters, not the actor's intention.

The difference between utilitarianism and natural law is that Mill did not believe that freedom is good when it produces the "reverse of happiness." Thus, Mill believed in state-subsidized education and foundations to serve the public good, since consumers' free choices in the market may not produce happiness. However, Mill also believed that the state only had the power to coerce to prevent harm to another, not harm to oneself. Thus, theoretically Mill would have opposed the use of state power to force people to wear safety belts or not to use drugs.

On the Subjection of Women

In On the Subjection of Women, Mill described male domination of women as a last vestige of early law, which was really a regularization of primitive systems of rights and obligations based on power. Europeans had largely outgrown other vestigial forms of domination, such as slavery and feudalism. However, those systems only directly benefited the king and those with property. The male domination of women benefited every man with a wife, and was therefore more pernicious. However, Mill believed that depriving one half of the species of any legal rights or capacity to participate in civic and political life was a great handicap and did not produce any benefit but plenty of suffering.

On Liberty

In On Liberty, Mill argued for complete freedom to act on one's conscience. Mill argued that society has no right to interfere with the individual except to prevent harm to someone else. Thus, one should be completely free in matters of religion, speech, lifestyle, and conduct that only concerns oneself. Mill's main argument was that suppressing beliefs contrary to accepted wisdom assumes that accepted wisdom is infallible. However, history shows that accepted wisdom is not infallible.

Mill fairly summarized the main arguments against complete liberty in order to refute them. First, some might object that the enforcing of wisdom poses no threat to contrary truths because when a contrary opinion really is true, it wins out in the long run anyway. This was the case with modern cosmology, which struggled mightily with Earth-centered cosmology but eventually carried the day. Mill agreed, but felt suppression causes needless suffering and can set the truth back hundreds of years. Second, some might say one has a duty to correct error, and one cannot believe every contrary opinion is the new truth. Mill agreed, but said complete freedom to refute a belief was the very thing that justifies believing it in the first place. Error is better corrected by experience and open discussion. Third, some might say certain beliefs are too important to public safety to suffer dissent. Mill countered that it is possible for one to be wrong about how salutary a belief is. Finally, some might say free expression is good in general, but not when "pushed to an extreme." On the contrary, Mill argued that unless the arguments for free speech were true in an extreme case, they were not true in any case.

Thus, Mill believed in a "marketplace of ideas," in which all opinions were free to enter and compete for adherents, becoming sharper and stronger in the process. Mill was the best example. Because of his rigorous testing of his ideas in rhetorical contests with his associates, Mill was very good at summarizing the arguments against his positions and refuting them. This openness to entertaining opposing views, obvious from the clarity and respect with which he treated them, is the illustration of his argument. Because of Mill's openness, his arguments were on sounder footing, and he truly did acquire good judgment by listening to the arguments against him.

Aesthetic Experience

Mill believed that analytical thinking could only get one so far and that, to achieve true understanding, the intellect must be supplemented by the cultivation of feelings. He believed Wordsworth had illuminated areas of human experience not known to philosophy. Mill believed that there was utility in nonintellectual sensation for its own sake. It is here that the criticism that Mill thought people were just acting on intellectual beliefs about proper conduct misses the point. As described in his Autobiography, Mill's humane vision was that variety of experience for its own sake produces happiness. He believed happiness occurs when one is busy doing something else; one must be open to new sensation. Thus, in his "Inaugural Address at St. Andrews," Mill encouraged the students to cultivate their aesthetic senses as well as their intellects.

Mill's career was long and very influential. His writings are an eloquent defense of liberty as fresh and relevant today as they were in the nineteenth century.

CHRISTOPHER D. KING

References and Further Reading

- Mill, John Stuart. A System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive: Being a Connected View of the Principles of Evidence, and Methods of Scientific Investigation. London: J. W. Parker, 1843.
- . Essays on Some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy. London: J. W. Parker, 1844.
- . Principles of Political Economy. Boston: C. C. Little & J. Brown, 1848.
- . On Liberty. London: J. W. Parker and Son, 1859.
- . Considerations on Representative Government. New York: Harper, 1862.
- . Utilitarianism. London: Longmans, Green, Reader, and Dyer, 1864.
- . On the Subjection of Women. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1869.
- . Autobiography. London: Longmans, Green, Reader, and Dyer, 1873.
- . Three Essays on Religion. New York: H. Holt, 1874.

See also English Tradition of Civil Liberties; Freedom of Expression in the International Context; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History (1791–1917); Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Low Value Speech; Philosophy and Theory of Freedom of Expression; Self-Governance and Free Speech; Theories of Civil Liberties; Theories of Civil Liberties, International; Theories of Free Speech Protection; Theories of Punishment

MILLER TEST

The Miller test defines obscene material that is left outside the First Amendment's freedoms of speech and press. The test asks the trier of fact in an obscenity prosecution to determine

(a) whether the "average person applying contemporary community standards" would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest . . . ; (b) whether the work depicts, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value.

The test draws its name from Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), which while a major step in its delineation, was but one of a series of cases in that development.

Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), recognized that obscenity is unprotected and began the process of defining that category. Roth rejected the test from the English case Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. 3 Q.B. 360 (1868), that had judged obscenity based on the effect of even isolated passages on the most susceptible person. Roth only excluded from protection material appealing to the average person's prurient interest and required that the work be considered as a whole. Roth also defined "prurient" as material likely to excite lustful thoughts. Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966), added a requirement that, to be obscene, material must be "utterly without redeeming social value." Miller changed that aspect by considering the work as a whole and requiring serious value. Even with Miller the development was not complete. While the test's first two prongs employ community standards, Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987), explained that the test of serious value does not vary from community to community.

The first prong of the test has raised interesting issues. The doctrine of variable obscenity was adopted to allow the test to depart from the "average person" standard in cases in which the materials were marketed or distributed to specific groups. Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966), held that material directed at a sexually deviant group is to be judged by appeal to the prurient interests of that group. Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968), similarly held that material sold to minors should be judged based on appeal to the prurient interests of minors, as well as offensiveness and value for minors.

More recently, the Court has addressed the community standards issue. While originally included so as not to require more socially conservative areas of the country to accept what would be acceptable in more tolerant areas, the application of the Miller test to the Internet raised the concern that, since access cannot be limited on a geographic basis, the most conservative areas would control the content of the Internet for the entire country. The Court addressed this concern, at least in the context of children, in Ashcroft v. A.C.L.U., 535 U.S. 564 (2002), and held that the inability to limit access community by community does not in itself prohibit regulation of the Internet.

KEVIN W. SAUNDERS

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ashcroft v. A.C.L.U., 535 U.S. 564 (2002)
Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968)
Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)
Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966)
Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987)
Regina v. Hicklin, (1868) L.R. 3 Q.B. 360
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

MILLER v. CALIFORNIA, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)

Marvin Miller was convicted by a state court jury in Orange County, California, of distributing obscene material. He mailed five unsolicited advertising brochures for adult books and a film to a restaurant whose manager complained to the police. The brochures displayed an array of photographs of sexual activity. The conviction was affirmed by a state appeals court.

Although the charge against Miller was only a misdemeanor and the state courts did not issue any written decisions, the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear Miller's case. The reason was that a new majority of the Court, led by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, was ready to reconsider the relationship between the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of speech and government censorship of sexually explicit material.

For a dozen years before Miller, the Supreme Court had wrestled with the definition of obscenity. In 1957, in Roth v. U.S., the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., said that obscene material was outside the protection of the First Amendment; the Court defined obscenity as sexual material that appeals to the "prurient interest" and stressed that this category should be narrow in scope. This effort at setting a standard satisfied no one on the Court or elsewhere, so throughout the 1960s the justices repeatedly revisited the issue and tried to refine or revamp the legal definition of obscenity.

This effort led ultimately to the Miller decision. Writing for a five-to-four majority, Burger said his aim was to "formulate standards more concrete than those in the past.” The result was a three-part test cobbled together from various prior decisions, but also modifying those precedents. To find material obscene, illegal, and unprotected by the First Amendment, Burger said, the legal questions are (1) whether the “average person” using “contemporary community standards” would find that the material appealed to the “prurient interest”; (2) whether sexual conduct regulated by a state’s law is shown or described in a “patently offensive” way; and (3) whether the work viewed in its entirety “lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.” Burger said that definitions would be left to the states, but that the term “patently offensive” in the second part of the test might include descriptions or depictions of actual or simulated “ultimate sexual acts” and of “masturbation, excretory functions, and lewd exhibition of the genitals.”

Burger’s opinion attempted to make a number of things clear about obscenity law. First, it contemplated that obscenity prosecutions would not involve a uniform, national standard but would vary from state to state, according to contemporary community standards and state law for each locale. “It is neither realistic nor constitutionally sound to read the First Amendment as requiring that the people of Maine or Mississippi accept public depiction of conduct found tolerable in Las Vegas or New York City,” Burger wrote.

Second, Burger rejected a more speech-protective standard that a plurality of the Court had adopted in 1966. In Memoirs v. Massachusetts, the plurality said a work could only be obscene if it were “utterly without redeeming social value,” but Burger said in Miller that there was no reason to adhere to the standard since it had never garnered majority support.

From the decision in Roth until Miller, it was Justice Brennan who tried repeatedly to come up with a workable standard to differentiate between sexually explicit material protected by the First Amendment and obscene material that was unprotected. But even as the majority in Miller settled on a new place to draw that line, Brennan decided that there was no way to distinguish. In a dissent in the companion case to Miller, Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973), Brennan said obscenity could not be defined with sufficient clarity and that the First Amendment should not permit prosecution of obscenity involving consenting adults.

The Miller test has required some tune-ups but remains the operative standard for obscenity cases. In Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S. 153 (1974), one year later, the Court made clear that the term “patently offensive” did not confer unbridled discretion on local juries and had to implicate “hard core” sexual activity. In Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987), the Court said that the third part of the test involving the “value” of the work was not intended to be a local standard but should be based on the values of the “reasonable person.”

The Miller ruling seems to have resolved few of the issues and problems that existed prior to the decision. “Virtually every word and phrase in the Miller test has been the subject of extensive litigation and substantial commentary in the legal literature,” the Attorney General’s Commission on Pornography observed in 1986.

One thing the decision accomplished is that the Supreme Court got out of the practice it followed in the 1960s of having to review every obscenity appeal to weigh the evidence and make a determination of whether the material was obscene. The Court was able to step back and decide obscenity cases only when the legal standard needed changing or fine-tuning.

But four themes developed in the wake of Miller and have remained central in debate over obscenity. One is the criticism that government has failed to adequately prosecute obscenity cases. On several occasions since Miller, U.S. attorneys general have announced stepped-up efforts to focus on obscenity prosecutions, but the results are difficult to quantify. Related to this issue, a second theme is how to deal with the vast proliferation of sexually explicit material available through new technologies that were not prevalent when Miller was decided, from the Internet to cable television to handheld video players. A third theme is a long-running debate over whether sexually explicit material should be viewed as harmful to women—whether it actually causes gender violence or contributes to the degradation of the status of women.

A fourth theme is the continuing values debate over the degree to which sexually explicit material should be considered protected not just by free-speech standards but also by societal notions of personal privacy. The Supreme Court’s 2003 decision striking down a Texas sodomy law (Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558) fueled the legal argument that consensual sexual activity involving adults should be protected by privacy doctrines.

STEPHEN J. WERMIEL

References and Further Reading

- Cohen, Daniel Mark. Unhappy Anniversary Thirty Years Since Miller v. California: The Legacy of the Supreme Court’s Misjudgment on Obscenity. St. Thomas Law Review 15 (2003): 545.
- Final Report of the Attorney General’s Commission on Pornography*. 1986.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.

Strossen, Nadine. Defending Pornography: Free Speech, Sex, and the Fight for Women's Rights. New York: Scribner, 1995.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S. 153 (1974)
Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973)
Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987)
Roth v. U.S., 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

See also A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966); Burger, Warren E.; First Amendment and PACs; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S. 153 (1974); Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973); Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987); Privacy; Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

MILLS v. ALABAMA, 384 U.S. 214 (1966)

Mills v. Alabama helped establish the role of the press in the electoral system. Mills, editor of the Birmingham Post-Herald, published an election-day editorial supporting a proposition changing city government from commission to mayor–council form and criticizing the mayor. The editorial violated an Alabama criminal statute prohibiting soliciting votes for or against candidates or ballot proposals on election day. The trial court determined that a conviction would violate the state and federal constitutions, but the Alabama Supreme Court reversed, finding the statute a reasonable restriction on the press.

The U.S. Supreme Court said that a major purpose of the First Amendment is protecting free discussion of government affairs and that the press serves as a “powerful antidote” to abuse of government power. The act “muzzle[d] one of the very agencies the Framers . . . thoughtfully and deliberately selected to improve our society and keep it free.” This occurred at the time the press could be most effective and denied the opportunity to respond to charges or arguments offered the day before an election. The importance of the role of the press in the political process made the act an “obvious and flagrant abridgment of the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of the press.”

The related issue of requiring newspapers to allow candidate response to allegations is addressed in Miami Herald v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974). The Mills Court also noted that the case did not address conduct at polling places, an issue later addressed in Burson v. Freeman, 504 U.S. 191 (1992).

KEVIN W. SAUNDERS

Cases and Statutes Cited

Burson v. Freeman, 504 U.S. 191 (1992)
Miami Herald v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)

MINCEY v. ARIZONA, 437 U.S. 385 (1978)

It is often said that warrantless searches are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment, “subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions” (Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 357, 1967). Entering and searching a home in an emergency situation—an exigent circumstance, in the parlance of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence—qualifies as an exception to the warrant requirement. In Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978), the Supreme Court underscored the importance of exigency in warrantless searches of the home.

Ten plainclothes police officers came to Rufus Mincey’s apartment to arrest him for narcotics offenses. A shootout ensued, leaving one officer dead and Mincey injured. For four days and without a search warrant, the police searched Mincey’s entire apartment, opening drawers, closets, and cupboards, pulling up the carpet, digging bullet fragments out of the walls and floors. “In short,” the Court said, “Mincey’s apartment was subjected to an exhaustive and intrusive search.” The state argued that a search of a homicide scene, which Mincey’s apartment was, “should be recognized as . . . an exception [to the warrant requirement].”

The Court refused to add a crime-scene exception to the growing list of exceptions to the warrant requirement. With no emergency impelling the search here, the Court “decline[d] to hold that the seriousness of the offense under investigation itself creates exigent circumstances of the kind that under the Fourth Amendment justify a warrantless search.” The warrantless search must end when the exigency ends. The Court’s refusal to “sacrifice[d]” the privacy people have in their homes “in the name of maximum simplicity in enforcement of the criminal law” reflects the settled understanding that the Fourth Amendment regards the sanctity of the home as the apex of privacy.

DANIEL R. WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Procedure, 3rd ed. New York: LexisNexis, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978)

See also Exclusionary Rule; Search (General Definition); Seizures; Warrantless Searches

MINNESOTA v. DICKERSON, 508 U.S. 366 (1993)

This case further defined the parameters of a pat-frisk under Terry v. Ohio (392 U.S. 1, 1968). Police encountered Dickerson as he left a “notorious ‘crack house.’” Dickerson walked towards police but abruptly changed course when he saw them. Suspicious, police stopped him. One officer pat-frisked Dickerson, finding no weapons but feeling a small lump in Dickerson’s nylon jacket. The officer later testified that he could tell, through the jacket, that the lump was crack-cocaine in cellophane. The officer retrieved a bag of cocaine from the pocket.

Appealing his conviction, Dickerson asserted that the search violated the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition of unreasonable searches, claiming it exceeded the limits of a permissible Terry pat-frisk. The Supreme Court reaffirmed (six to three) that police may pat-frisk an individual when reasonable suspicion arises. The search’s purpose is to find weapons, and police may seize any items found in that search in “plain view” whose unlawful nature is readily apparent. Because the officer had to manipulate, squeeze, and slide the lump to discern its illicit nature, the search exceeded Terry’s scope since these actions were unnecessary to find weapons. The Court reversed Dickerson’s conviction since the exclusionary rule compels suppression of unlawfully obtained evidence.

Justice Scalia’s concurrence articulated a central pillar of his constitutional philosophy. Reasoning that the original intent of the Fourth Amendment controlled, he questioned Terry’s propriety given that a “pat-frisk” would likely have been unlawful when the Constitution was adopted. The justice has favored this same rationale in intimating that he would abandon the exclusionary rule altogether.

LOUIS N. SCHULZE, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Cooper, Frank Rudy, Cultural Context Matters: Terry’s “Seesaw Effect,” Oklahoma Law Review 56 (2003): 833, 858–859.
- Dery, George M., III, The Uncertain Reach of the Plain Touch Doctrine: An Examination of Minnesota v. Dickerson and Its Impact on Current Fourth Amendment Law and Daily Police Practice, American Journal of Criminal Law 21 (1994): 385.
- Harris, David A., Using Race or Ethnicity as a Factor in Assessing the Reasonableness of Fourth Amendment Activity: Description, Yes; Prediction, No, Mississippi Law Journal 73 (2003): 423.

Urbonya, Kathryn R., Rhetorically Reasonable Police Practices: Viewing the Supreme Court’s Multiple Discourse Paths, American Criminal Law Review 40 (2003): 1387.

Wallin, Howard E., Plain View Revisited, Pace Law Review 22 (2002): 307.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983)
Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85 (1979)

See also Arrest without a Warrant; Exclusionary Rule; Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961); Plain View; Scalia, Antonin; Search; Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968); Warrantless Searches

MINNESOTA v. OLSON, 495 U.S. 91 (1990)

Minnesota v. Olson addressed an important procedural question in Fourth Amendment litigation: Is the person seeking to challenge the legality of the search or seizure the “victim” of the governmental activity?

A person must have a legally protected interest in the area searched to be able to challenge a governmental search of that area. Olson was an overnight guest in another person’s home when the police entered the house without a warrant and arrested him. That warrantless entry violated the Fourth Amendment. But did Olson have any right to complain because it was not his home? The Supreme Court held that he did, reasoning that his status as an overnight guest created a reasonable expectation of privacy in the home. The Court observed: “We will all be hosts and we will all be guests many times in our lives.” It accordingly believed the long-standing social custom of having such guests was recognized as valuable by society.

Olson gives protection against unreasonable governmental intrusions to individuals when they travel and stay in another’s home. Left unanswered by Olson is whether other social guests have protection. In a subsequent case, Minnesota v. Carter, 119 S. Ct. 469 (1998), the Court was divided on that question. Some justices saw Olson as the absolute limit of protection, while other justices believed that almost all social guests would have an expectation of privacy in another’s home. In Carter, the Court held that a person who was in another’s apartment for a short time to package cocaine did not have a protected interest. Which other visitors have a protected interest in someone else’s home has yet to be answered by the Court.

THOMAS K. CLANCY

References and Further Reading

- Clancy, Thomas K., What Does the Fourth Amendment Protect: Property, Privacy, or Security? Wake Forest Law Review 33 (1998): 307.
- Weinreb, Lloyd L., Your Place or Mine? Privacy of Presence Under the Fourth Amendment, Supreme Court Review (1999): 253.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Jones v. United States*, 362 U.S. 257 (1960)
- Minnesota v. Carter*, 119 S. Ct. 469 (1998)
- Minnesota v. Olson*, 495 U.S. 91 (1990)

See also Exclusionary Rule; Search (General Definition)

MIRANDA v. ARIZONA, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

The Miranda case included three other cases from across the country, all of which dealt with police interrogation of persons suspected of a crime.

Phoenix police officers arrested Ernesto Miranda at his home on suspicion of rape and kidnapping. He was transported to the police station and placed in an interrogation room. After two hours of interrogation the police obtained a written confession from Miranda. He was convicted of the charges and his attorney appealed, stating that he was not advised of his constitutional rights, namely his Fifth Amendment right to be free from self-incrimination and his Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The Arizona Supreme Court affirmed the trial court. In its analysis, great weight was given to the fact that Miranda had not specifically requested counsel. However, during the trial, the police admitted that Miranda had not been advised that he had the right to have counsel present.

If the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution states, in part, “No person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself,” and the Sixth Amendment states, “the accused shall . . . have the Assistance of Counsel,” why were these defendants confined and interrogated by law enforcement? Isolated and given incomplete or nonexistent information about their constitutional rights, they were convicted on the confessions obtained from this process.

Though Miranda is sometimes characterized as a giant leap by the Supreme Court, it was at best a small hop, as a child hops from one stone to another to cross a creek. To understand this one must understand a bit of history. Two years previously the Supreme Court decided Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, which involved a defendant under very similar circumstances. Handcuffed and forced to remain standing, he was interrogated until a confession was obtained four hours later. The police failed to honor his request to speak with an attorney and, furthermore, prevented him from speaking to his retained attorney when the attorney arrived at the police station. The Court held that this violated the defendant’s Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights and his confession was inadmissible. Thus, the Supreme Court affirmed Escobedo in deciding Miranda. However, a difference lies in the fact that in the Miranda consolidated cases there was no prevention of counsel from speaking with the client. Miranda’s roots, therefore, lie in the Fifth Amendment—the right to be free from self-incrimination.

The Supreme Court held that under two circumstances a person must be given precautionary warnings, creating the two-prong test of Miranda. The first prong is custody, which is when a person is in the custody of law enforcement or his or her freedom of movement is restricted by law enforcement. The second prong is interrogation, which is when the person is then questioned about a criminal matter in which he or she is involved. If the two-prong test is met, the precautionary warnings must be given if the information obtained is to be admissible. The warnings are as follows:

The person must be advised of his right to remain silent and that anything said could be used in court against him.

The person has the right to have an attorney present during questioning, whether he can afford one or not.

The person can waive his rights but only if it is done in a knowing, voluntary, and intelligent manner.

If the person does not waive his rights, the police may not question him.

The facts from the consolidated line of cases appear obvious in the sense that all of the defendants were questioned without being advised of their constitutional rights. Yet the Court in its holding relied on other evidence to support the conclusion that a warning should be given. Among the most poignant were police training manuals, which advocated police officers honoring a defendant’s initial request to remain silent, but then pointing out how guilty it made the defendant look. If a defendant requested an attorney, the police officer was to advise the defendant that he or she should first be honest with the officer before involving the lawyer. Many of the manuals also advocated a “good cop, bad cop” approach with the bad cop using trickery, intimidation, and threats. From this evidence it appeared the problem was systemic, a conclusion that influenced the Court to hold that the warnings need be uniform and apply broadly.

Police departments abhorred the Miranda decision initially. Many said the guilty would go free and police would be powerless to obtain confessions. Though this is still argued, what is true is that it has demanded a more professional police force and ensured that the amendments of the Constitution are more than just words. Although Miranda has been controversial, the Court reaffirmed it by a seven-to-two vote in Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000).

DAVID BLACKETT

References and Further Reading

- Hogrogian, John G. Miranda v. Arizona: The Rights of the Accused. San Diego, CA: Lucent Books, 1999.
- Sobel, Nathan R. The New Confession Standards, Miranda v. Arizona; a Legal Perspective, a Practical Perspective. Jamaica, NY: Gould Publications, 1966.
- Stuart, Gary L. Miranda: The Story of America's Right to Remain Silent. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Dickerson v. U.S.*, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)
- Escobedo v. Illinois*, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

MIRANDA WARNING

The arrest and interrogation of Ernesto Miranda would cause reverberations in the criminal justice system and create defendants' rights that are still enforced to the present day. Miranda v. Arizona created the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination; the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution says no one "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The U.S. Supreme Court acknowledged the only safeguard against overzealous police interrogation tactics. Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote the Miranda opinion. Justice Warren became one of the great judicial activists in the history of the Supreme Court.

History

The doctrine of the right against self-incrimination has its history in English common law. During the reign of Charles I (1625–1649), the right emerged as a response to the repressive measures taken by the government. English trial judges restricted the use of involuntary confessions, but in 1783 it became written law. English judges were keenly aware of physical and psychological coercion and its effect on involuntary confessions. The law presumed that judges could determine whether a confession was voluntary or involuntary. The voluntariness rule became prevalent in American jurisprudence as well. In the nineteenth century, during a major reform period in the English criminal justice system, judges had the right to review police interrogation practices. In 1848, by parliamentary act, preliminary interrogation of suspects was subject to judicial review. In contrast, American jurisprudence was far less sophisticated and took nearly a century to subject police interrogations to judicial review. The right against self-incrimination would develop even later.

The United States did recognize a right against torture in a 1783 case, Commonwealth v. Dillon. However, the Supreme Court did not review state prosecutions until the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868. The Fourteenth Amendment due process clause prevents states from depriving "... any person of life, liberty or property without due process of the law." The Supreme Court limited its review of depriving a person of the due-process rights to federal prosecutions. The Court did not establish a common law rule against torture until it overturned a murder conviction and death sentence in Hopt v. Utah.

The Court continued to have a narrow view of when the Fourteenth Amendment should be applied. In 1895, Justice Melville Fuller wrote in Wilson v. United States that a voluntary statement was not rendered inadmissible by the mere failure to provide the suspect with a lawyer during questioning to advise him that he need not answer questions posed to him and that any statement he made would be used against him. The Supreme Court began one of the most conservative eras in its history with the landmark decision of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), which created the Jim Crow separate-but-equal doctrine. With few exceptions the Court began a hands-off approach to state and federal prosecutions.

Twentieth Century

The Supreme Court did an about-face in Bram v. United States (1895) and applied the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. Justice White wrote the opinion that overturned a murder conviction after finding that the accused's statements introduced into evidence as a confession of guilt were involuntarily made. The Court relied on the principle that the Fifth Amendment was meant to exclude "all manifestations of compulsion whether arising from torture or moral causes.” However, the Court again retreated from uniformly applying the Fifth Amendment to inadmissible confessions. In 1902, the Court affirmed a murder conviction and rejecting the defendant’s claim in Hardy v. United States that his statements were involuntary. The Court made no reference to the Fifth Amendment. The Court went further in Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U.S. 78 (1908), and rejected outright the contention that the right against self-incrimination was applicable to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court began a complete turnaround from Bram v. United States.

The Court eventually rejected Bram’s rationale entirely. Starting in Powers v. United States, the Court held that the Fifth Amendment guarantee was not violated by the admission of voluntary statements made at the preliminary hearing, even though the accused was not warned that the statements he made could be used against him. The Court began to retreat against taking any action in federal cases. In a 1923 deportation case, United States ex rel Bilokumsky v. Tod, Tod alleged that absence of counsel at the preliminary hearing and the failure of officers to apprise the defendant of his right to remain silent violated his due-process rights. The Supreme Court disagreed. Justice Brandeis found that, absent a rule forbidding interrogation or requiring counsel, “a mere examination does not render the hearing unfair.”

While the Court did reverse the murder conviction in Ziang Sung Wan v. United States, it did not apply the federal Constitution. The police held Wan in a hotel room incommunicado for one week under relentless interrogation and used coercive methods such as sleep deprivation to garner a confession eventually admitted into evidence. The Court would remain silent for years on the use of the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause and the right against self-incrimination.

The 1930s saw a judicial revolution take place. The Supreme Court began to address the horrible and brutal legacy of race in the southern criminal justice system. The infamous Scottsboro case became the first of several cases the Supreme Court decided in the defendants’ favor. In the 1932 case, Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), several young black men were charged and convicted of the rape of two white women. The trial court assigned local attorneys for all nine defendants. The trial court found them guilty, sentenced them to die, and set the execution date. The Supreme Court reversed the convictions and found that defendants had the Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel in death penalty cases. The right to counsel at the interrogation phase would not come until some years later. Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936), was the seminal case that raised the question of coerced confessions to a constitutional level. The U.S. Supreme Court determined that law enforcement would not be able to use torture as a coercive tactic to garner confessions.

In McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943), the Court held that police were to show “with reasonable promptness” some legal cause for holding persons. The Court would not allow convictions to stand when the police failed to allow defendants a prompt preliminary hearing. The Court extended the McNabb rule in Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 499 (1957). The Supreme Court reversed a rape conviction and death sentence. The Court held that federal law that required Mallory be brought before a magistrate “without unnecessary delay” had been violated. The McNabb–Mallory rule put law enforcement on notice that a statement obtained from a defendant during a period of unnecessary delay in having a probable cause determination should be excluded.

The Court began to eek out procedural safeguards for defendants. The Court guaranteed representation in death penalty cases, would exclude confessions that were physically coerced, and guaranteed defendants the right to be brought to court without delay. It would take Justice Earl Warren to create the modern doctrine of defendants’ rights.

Miranda v. Arizona

Prelude

Justice Warren began to carve out fundamental rights for defendants and challenge conventional law enforcement procedures. In Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), Gideon was charged with breaking and entering a poolroom with intent to commit—a felony under Florida law. Appearing in court without funds and without a lawyer, Gideon asked the court to appoint him counsel. The court refused and Gideon represented himself. The jury found him guilty and he received a five-year prison sentence. Justice Black succinctly stated, “The right of one charged with crime to counsel may not be deemed fundamental and essential to fair trials in some countries, but it is in ours.”

The Court began to give a nuanced definition of what it meant to have counsel. A Mexican immigrant and murder suspect continued to request his attorney while being interrogated, but the police refused his request. The Supreme Court held that once a suspect becomes the target of an investigation and is not warned about his constitutional rights, he is entitled to representation under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments. Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), gave suspects the right to counsel during the interrogation phase. The Court began to grant constitutional guarantees at the critical interrogation phase for defendants.

However, Escobedo required several criteria be met in order to conclude that denial of representation had taken place:

The investigation is no longer a general inquiry into an unsolved crime but has begun to focus on a particular suspect, the suspect has been taken into police custody, the police carry out a process of interrogations that lends itself to eliciting incriminating statements, the suspect has requested and been denied an opportunity to consult with his lawyer, and the police have not effectively warned him of his absolute constitutional right to remain silent, the accused has been denied "the Assistance of Counsel" in violation of the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution as "made obligatory upon the States by the Fourteenth Amendment."

Escobedo left categories of suspects without recourse; if they were not the target of specific investigation, they could not seek the assistance of counsel. The unprotected category included witnesses, potential witnesses, and sources of information or investigative leads. Only when the subject became the target of the investigation was he entitled to constitutional protection. The critical investigation and interrogation phase left many suspects without rights.

Facts

A bank teller was abducted from a parking lot in downtown Phoenix. She unlocked her driver's side door and was met with a short, slender Hispanic man wielding a knife. The man drove the car into an alley. He attempted to assault the teller, but she successfully fought back and told him to take the money in her purse. The man took eight dollars from her purse and left the car. Three months later, an eighteen-year-old telephone dispatcher was getting into her car when a short Hispanic male forcefully entered it. He held a small knife to her throat and demanded money. He then began to tear at her clothes and she screamed and scared the man away. A week later, an eighteen-year-old woman getting off the bus in mid Phoenix was accosted by man in a car. He grabbed her and placed her in the car and drove to the desert. She was assaulted and later returned to her neighborhood.

The police received a lead about a young Hispanic male driving a car in the area where the last woman was assaulted. Police went to Ernest Miranda's home and asked whether he would accompany them to the police station. He agreed. Once he was placed in the interrogation room, the police immediately began to question him about the assault and abduction of the eighteen-year-old woman. Miranda was asked to participate in a lineup. He agreed. Two victims could not conclusively identify him. The police told Miranda that they had identified him. Miranda then wrote a confession regarding assaulting the eighteen-year-old and verbally confessed to the robbery. The police reviewed with Miranda a standard statement form that stated the confession was free from coercion and given with knowledge of his legal rights.

Miranda had separate trials for robbery and assault. The trial courts found him guilty of all charges and sentenced him to prison. Defense counsel raised issues about the confession used in the trial; the major issue was whether Miranda was informed of his constitutional rights. The Arizona Supreme Court affirmed the conviction. The Supreme Court accepted the case for review.

Opinion

Justice Warren held that the prosecution may not use statements, whether exculpatory or inculpatory, stemming from custodial interrogation of the defendant unless it demonstrates the use of procedural safeguards effective to secure the privilege against self-incrimination. Justice Warren's opinion became the verbatim Miranda warnings that are so well known today:

An individual held for interrogation must be clearly informed that he has the right to consult with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him during interrogation.

If an individual indicates that he wishes the assistance of counsel before any interrogation occurs, the authorities cannot rationally ignore or deny his request on the basis that the individual does not have or cannot afford a retained attorney.

It is necessary to warn the individual not only that he has the right to consult with an attorney, but also that if he is indigent a lawyer will be appointed to represent him.

Aftermath

Miranda created a firestorm of debate that still rages today. In 1966, Congress attempted to overrule

MIRANDA WARNING

Miranda through legislation (18 U.S.C. § 3501). Congress enacted the statute that was intended to overrule the requirement that officers give Miranda warnings to suspects by once again making voluntariness, rather than the recitation of warnings, the touchstone for the admissibility of confessions. It set forth a nonexclusive list of factors, including whether the suspect was advised of his constitutional rights, that courts could consider in determining voluntariness. Although this statute was enacted in 1968, it was largely ignored by federal prosecutors. Thus, the Miranda warnings requirement remained intact simply by default.

Miranda opponents eagerly awaited a case that would overrule the landmark case and establish the congressional statute as law—it came in 2000. Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000), became one of the most anticipated cases to be argued before the Supreme Court in several years.

The FBI arrested James Dickerson for bank robbery after an eyewitness gave a license plate number that matched Dickerson's car. The agents went to Dickerson's house with guns drawn. They entered his apartment without a warrant and without Dickerson's consent. The agents took him to an FBI field office and failed to give him his Miranda warnings. Agents continued to talk to Dickerson and informed him that his apartment was being searched. Dickerson gave them a statement. The agents advised him of his rights after the statement was given.

Dickerson's attorney successfully had the statement suppressed before trial. The Fourth Circuit reversed the suppression of the statement using the language from Section 3501. Dickerson appealed to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court held that Section 3501 could not be enforced because the warnings component of the Miranda decision was a constitutional ruling. The debate rages about whether the Supreme Court would in future consider overturning Miranda. The Dickerson Court chose to yield to the original intent of Justice Warren.

The Future

The globalization of criminal procedures has become evident in the war on terror and in the investigation of the attack on September 11, 2001. In the era of Al Qaeda and a protracted war, the government has the power to suspend the civil liberties of its citizens by invoking enemy combatant status. Once the status is invoked, the person is placed outside the purview of American law and jurisprudence. An enemy combatant is not allowed to have regular contact with an attorney, has no judicial review, and may be detained indefinitely.

The government has taken two methods with American citizens accused of Al Qaeda activity. John Anthony Lindh became the first American charged with activities linked to the terrorist organization. The FBI treated him as any American citizen is entitled, including being advised of his Miranda rights and right to counsel. The government charged Lindh with treason and he pled to lesser charges. Counsel on both sides prepared for a trial in which questions of the voluntariness of Lindh's statement would have come into dispute.

Jose Padilla and Yaser Esam Hamdi are designated enemy combatants who have not been given the same level of protections as Lindh enjoyed. Padilla and Hamdi continue to fight to be under the purview of American jurisprudence and all the rights that are afforded them as American citizens. The Supreme Court has given the U.S. government leeway to designate Padilla and Hamdi as enemy combatants until the president deems that they are American citizens with rights under the Constitution again.

GENEVA BROWN

References and Further Reading

Godsey, Mark A., Rethinking the Involuntary Confession Rule: Towards a Workable Test for Compelled Self-Incrimination, California Law Review 93 (March 2005): 465.

Stuart, Gary. Miranda: The Story of America's Right to Remain Silent. 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936)

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)

18 U.S.C. § 3501

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Due Process

MIRANDA, ERNESTO ARTURO (1941–1976)

The name "Miranda" is now permanently linked to the requirement that police inform suspects of certain Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights before interrogating them. The recital of the so-called "Miranda rights" has become a ritual accompanying the act of placing someone under arrest, introducing a new verb, to “mirandize,” into the language. The connection between the name and the rights is at least partially due to the vagaries of chance: Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), just happened to be listed as the first of three cases considered together by the Supreme Court. As a result of that landmark decision, when police detain a suspect they almost inevitably recite the now familiar litany: “You have the right to remain silent. If you give up the right to remain silent, anything you say can and will be used against you in a court of law. You have the right to an attorney, and to have the attorney present during questioning. If you cannot afford an attorney, one will be appointed for you.”

Ernesto Miranda probably had very little idea of how his case would affect criminal justice in the United States. Unlike Clarence Earl Gideon of Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), Miranda did not play an active role in his appeal. Certain members of the Supreme Court were looking for cases like Miranda’s in order to clarify the implementation of previous decisions, including Gideon and Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964). Lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union assisted in the appeal process, filing an amicus curiae brief for the Supreme Court.

There was nothing extraordinary about the case, other than the prosecution’s reliance on Miranda’s confessions. A young woman was abducted and raped. Although she was mildly retarded, she was able to give police a description that fit Miranda and later identified him in a lineup. Miranda was charged with kidnapping and rape. He was also charged with robbery, when another victim identified him as the man who had robbed her at knifepoint. When police told Miranda that the victims had identified him, he confessed to both crimes. His version of events substantially matched those of the victims.

There was never any allegation that the police coerced the confessions; Miranda did not ask for an attorney as happened in the Escobedo case. At issue was whether a suspect detained by the police could waive his or her right against self-incrimination without the advice of a lawyer, and at what point in an investigation the police should be required to inform suspects of their rights. This was the basis of the defense strategy deployed by Miranda’s court-appointed attorney, Alvin Moore. Moore moved unsuccessfully to have the confessions excluded. He cross-examined the police officers, asking whether they had informed Miranda of his right to legal counsel.

Although the guilty verdicts for kidnapping and rape were overturned, Miranda remained incarcerated while the appeals were considered. The conviction for the robbery charge was never overturned. In the Court’s opinion, Chief Justice Warren argued, among other things, that confessions were not essential to good police work and successful prosecution. As if to underscore that point, Miranda was almost immediately retried, this time without the confessions, and was again convicted. He was sentenced, for the second time, to concurrent prison terms of twenty to thirty years.

Ernesto Arturo Miranda was in many ways typical of the occupants of prison. Raised in a somewhat disrupted family environment (his mother died when he was young, and he never developed close relationships with his father or stepmother), he did not do well in school and began getting into trouble with the law after dropping out of the ninth grade at age fourteen. He was in and out of reform school, jail, and prison. At the time of the arrest, he was living with his common-law wife, working as a truck driver, and appeared to have settled down. Psychiatric diagnoses conducted while he was awaiting trial described him as immature, lacking impulse control, and possibly suffering from a mental illness. His common-law wife testified for the prosecution in the second trial, following an incident in which Miranda had written to the state welfare authorities, suggesting that she was an unfit mother.

Freed on parole in 1972, Miranda felt cheated that he never profited from the famous case. At one point he tried to sell autographed cards printed with the Miranda warnings. He never adjusted to life outside prison; he was arrested once and was once reincarcerated for violating the terms of his parole. Miranda was murdered following a dispute over a three-dollar poker bet in Phoenix in 1976. Although his contribution to the development of civil liberties was not heroic, his name symbolizes the restraint of state power prized by civil libertarians.

B. KEITH CREW

References and Further Reading

- Cortner, Richard C., and Clifford M. Lytle. Modern Constitutional Law. New York: Free Press, 1971.
 Richard, R. Leo, and George C. Thomas, eds. The Miranda Debate: Law, Justice, and Policing. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1998.
 Walker, Samuel. Sense and Nonsense About Crime and Drugs, 5th ed. New York: Wadsworth, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Escobedo v. Illinois*, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964); Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963); Right to Counsel; Warren Court; Warren, Earl

MISCEGENATION LAWS

Miscegenation laws, sometimes referred to as antimiscegenation laws, regulated interracial sexual relations. The term “miscegenation” was first used in an 1863 New York pamphlet “Miscegenation: The Theory of the Blending of the Races, Applied to the American White Man and Negro” and is derived from the Latin words miscere (to mix) and genus (race), though the pamphlet advocated miscegenation as a way to end racial differences in America.

Laws regulating interracial sexual relationships have existed in many countries and at many times. In the twentieth century, Nazi Germany, apartheid South Africa, and the United States were notable proponents of such laws.

The nature and scope of miscegenation laws varied between jurisdictions. The history of miscegenation laws in the United States began in colonial times when Virginia passed a law in 1662 making the punishments for interracial fornication twice as harsh as intraracial fornication. In 1664, Maryland passed a law prohibiting whites and blacks from intermarrying. Generally miscegenation laws prohibited interracial fornication and marriage. These laws spread throughout the colonies, in the North and the South, before and after the American Revolution. As the United States expanded, so too did the number of states with miscegenation laws, before and after the civil war, with forty-one states having had laws prohibiting interracial marriage by 1914.

Miscegenation laws were introduced to prevent mixed-race offspring and were frequently justified as necessary to protect the purity of the white race under theories of racial superiority. In slave states the presence of mulattoes posed problems for the existence of racial slavery over whether mulattoes were freeborn because of their white parent or subject to slavery because of their black parent. Departing from English common law, mixed-race children gained their status from their mother. This placed the onus of maintaining the system of racial slavery onto white women, the protection of whose virtue was often cited as further justification for miscegenation laws. The illegitimate offspring of white men and black slave women were slaves. Despite rhetoric and public pronouncements to the contrary, sexual relations between white men and black slaves were common in the antebellum south. The most famous is the reputed relationship between Thomas Jefferson and Sally Hemmings, though public knowledge of such relationships then would have created a scandal.

During reconstruction the status of miscegenation laws was called into question by the passage of the Civil Rights Acts of 1866 and 1875, and the Fourteenth Amendment, which the Alabama Supreme Court used to strike down a miscegenation law in 1872 before being quickly reversed. However, the consensus was that these measures were not intended to prohibit miscegenation laws because they applied to all races equally.

After Reconstruction more states introduced miscegenation laws and, especially within the South, the existing laws were toughened and more vigorously applied. Criminal penalties ranged from fines to imprisonment and banishment from the state. The marriage could be declared void. This increased the stakes for civil enforcement of the statutes because voiding marriages nullified any spousal property claims and rendered any children illegitimate, thus affecting the inheritance of property.

Miscegenation laws were primarily aimed at preventing whites from mixing with blacks, but in some states white’s marrying Asians, Native Americans, and mulattoes was also prohibited. Sometimes the laws prohibited all races from marrying members of any other race. These laws required specific determinations as to one’s race; standards differed but could be as strict using “one drop of blood” to determine that a person was not white.

Pennsylvania repealed its miscegenation laws in 1780 and in the nineteenth century a few states repealed their miscegenation laws, starting with Massachusetts (1843) and ending with Ohio (1887). Oregon was the next state to repeal its miscegenation laws, but not until 1951. However, in 1912 and 1913, Vermont and Massachusetts passed laws voiding interracial marriages for nonstate residents to prevent interracial couples trying to avoid miscegenation laws in their own states. California was the only state to forbid interracial marriage and fully recognize such a union from a jurisdiction where it was legal.

In 1948, the California Supreme Court used the federal constitution to strike down the state’s miscegenation law in Perez v. Sharp, 32 Cal.2d 711 (1948). The U.S. Supreme Court appeared ready to enter the fray in 1955 when it accepted Naim v. Naim, 875 E. 2nd 749 (Va. 1955); 350 U.S. 891 (1955); 350 U.S. 985 (1956)—a challenge to the Virginia miscegenation laws. The Court later used a procedural device to avoid ruling on its constitutionality. It is thought that this was to avoid exacerbating the tensions caused by the Court’s recent ruling in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), 349 U.S. 294 (1955).

Public opinion was turning, however, and between 1951 and 1967, fourteen states repealed their miscegenation laws, leaving sixteen states with active bans on interracial marriage. In McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184 (1964), the U.S. Supreme Court struck down an interracial fornication statute and in 1967 the Court used Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), to declare that miscegenation laws prohibiting interracial marriage violated the Fourteenth Amendment's due process and equal protection clauses, thus ending the enforcement of miscegenation laws in the US.

In the time after Loving, many states removed their now unenforceable miscegenation laws and state constitutional provisions. Alabama was the last state to remove the miscegenation provision from its constitution in 2000, though approximately 40 percent voted to retain the clause.

The history of miscegenation laws is seen as potentially significant for same-sex marriage legalization, with many advocates of same-sex marriage drawing an explicit comparison. Opponents deny any such analogy on the grounds that marriage has only ever been between a man and a woman; miscegenation laws imposed an additional impediment, whereas same-sex marriage would require a redefinition of the fundamental meaning of marriage. States prohibiting any sort of same-sex unions are in a similar position to states with miscegenation laws in deciding whether or how to avoid acknowledging same-sex couples married in other states that do permit such unions.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- Bardaglio, Peter W. Reconstructing the Household: Families, Sex, and the Law in the Nineteenth-Century South. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.
- Kennedy, Randall. Interracial Intimacies: Sex, Marriage, Identity and Adoption. New York: Pantheon Books, 2003.
- Koppelman, Andrew. Same-Sex Marriage and Public Policy: The Miscegenation Precedents, Quinnipiac Law Review 16 (1996): 105–151.
- Wadlington, Walter. The Loving Case: Virginia's Anti-Miscegenation Statute in Historical Perspective, Virginia Law Review 52 (1966): 1189–1223.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Board of Education*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), 349 U.S. 294 (1955)
- Loving v. Virginia*, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)
- McLaughlin v. Florida*, 379 U.S. 184 (1964)
- Naim v. Naim*, 875 E. 2nd 749 (Va. 1955); 350 U.S. 891 (1955); 350 U.S. 985 (1956)
- Perez v. Sharp*, 32 Cal.2d 711 (1948)

See also Substantive Due Process

MISHKIN v. NEW YORK, 383 U.S. 502 (1966)

Mishkin was convicted for publishing and intending to sell publications of “hard core pornography” that depicted heterosexuality, homosexuality, sadomasochism, fetishism, etc. New York's appellate court upheld Mishkin's conviction. Justice Brennan, writing for the majority, affirmed the court decision; his opinion was the third of a trio of decisions handed down on the same day (Ginzburg v. United States, 383 U.S. 463, 1966; Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure v. Attorney General of Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413, 1966).

Mishkin argued the publications did not appeal to the prurient sexual interests of the “average person” and therefore were not obscene under the Roth ruling (Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 1957). Justice Brennan described this as “an unrealistic interpretation” of the prurient appeal requirement. The test is met if material is “designed for and primarily disseminated to a clearly defined deviant sexual group, rather than the public at large.” References to “average” or “normal” persons in Roth were intended merely to express the majority's rejection of Hicklin's (Regina v. Benjamin Hicklin, Law Reporter 3 Queen's Bench 360, 1868) “most susceptible person” standard. In this case, the Roth standard is adjusted to the “social realities” that material should be assessed “in terms of the sexual interests of its intended and probable recipient group.” This clearly excludes “sexually immature persons,” so Justice Brennan claimed it avoided the problems found with the Hicklin standard. Since the publications in question were intended to appeal to the erotic interests of “sexually deviant groups,” they are obscene under Roth.

ROY B. FLEMMING

Cases and Statutes Cited

- A Book Named “John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Attorney General of Massachusetts*, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)
- Ginzburg v. United States*, 383 U.S. 463 (1966)
- Mishkin v. New York*, 383 U.S. 502 (1966)
- Regina v. Benjamin Hicklin*, Law Reporter 3 Queen's Bench 360 (1868)
- Roth v. United States*, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

MISTRETTA v. UNITED STATES, 488 U.S. 361 (1989)

The 1984 Sentencing Reform Act revised the prior system of indeterminate sentencing in favor of fixed sentencing guidelines to be promulgated by a new Sentencing Commission. In Mistretta v. United States, the Supreme Court, with only Justice Scalia dissenting, upheld the constitutionality of the commission in the face of challenges from convicts awaiting sentencing under the guidelines.

Mistretta argued that the commission was unconstitutional because Congress unlawfully delegated authority to it and because it was established in violation of the doctrine of separation of powers. Mistretta's first argument, which implicated the non-delegation doctrine, was rejected because the Court found that Congress satisfied the requirements for lawful delegations set forth in J. W. Hampton, Jr., & Co. v. United States, which permits delegations of legislative authority as long as Congress articulates an "intelligible principle" the recipient of the delegation must follow.

The Court rejected Mistretta's second argument by finding that placement of the commission within the judicial branch was proper given the judiciary's traditional role in sentencing. The justices found no problem with the fact that the commission's membership consisted of a mixture of federal judges and political appointees.

The implications of this decision were to validate a system of determinate sentencing that for nearly twenty years generally resulted in the imposition of lengthier sentences for offenders that judges were not at liberty to reject. More recently, however, the Court in United States v. Booker held that the guidelines violate the Sixth Amendment right to jury trial and relegated them to "advisory" status.

A. BENJAMIN SPENCER

References and Further Reading

Aman, Alfred C., Jr., and William T. Mayton. Administrative Law. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2001.
Madison, James. The Federalist, Nos. 47 and 51.

Cases and Statutes Cited

J. W. Hampton, Jr., & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394 (1928)
United States v. Booker, 125 S. Ct. 738 (2005)

See also Sentencing Guidelines

MITCHELL v. HELMS, 463 U.S. 793 (2000)

Mitchell v. Helms concerned an as-applied challenge to a federal assistance program that provided educational materials and equipment, such as library media materials and computer software and hardware, to public and private schools, including religious schools. The plaintiffs alleged that the loan of the equipment and materials violated the First Amendment prohibition against religious establishments by subsidizing the education of religious and parochial schools. Mitchell is significant because the Supreme Court, in upholding the constitutionality of the funding program, significantly loosened the earlier prohibitions on public funding of religious elementary and secondary schools.

During the 1970s, the Supreme Court had adopted a firm "separationist" position on the issue of public funding of religious and parochial schools, striking most programs while allowing only the most incidental forms of assistance. Generally, the Court prohibited direct financial support for even arguably secular programs in religious schools on the ground that most schools were "pervasively sectarian," in that they integrated religious doctrine and values throughout the curriculum and had a primary purpose of religious indoctrination. Although the Court permitted some forms of assistance, the aid had to be discrete and supplemental to the schools' educational programs and the public monies had to contain safeguards to ensure that public funds did not pay for religious activity. Thus, while the Court had upheld the loan of secular textbooks to and the provision of health and diagnostic services in parochial schools, it had prohibited tuition subsidies, building construction and maintenance grants, and the loan of educational materials and equipment that could be diverted to religious uses (see Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 1975).

Starting in the mid-1980s, an increasingly conservative Supreme Court began to adopt a more "accommodating" position toward funding programs that benefited religious schools. In 1983 and 1986, the Court signaled that forms of indirect financial assistance provided through the "private choices" of beneficiaries satisfied many establishment clause concerns (Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388, 1983; Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481, 1986). In 1993, the Court allowed a state-paid sign-language interpreter to provide services in a parochial school.

The most significant deviation from earlier case law occurred with the 1997 case of Agostini v. Felton (521 U.S. 203). In that case, the Court took the extraordinary step of reversing earlier holdings prohibiting state-paid employees from entering parochial schools to provide supplemental remedial and enrichment services. The Agostini majority held that the criteria for determining whether a funding program violated the establishment clause had "significantly changed" over the years. Rather than assuming that all direct state aid would advance religion or result in excessive entanglement between church and state, the Court would now look to see whether the aid program resulted in “government-sponsored indoctrination.”

The services provided in Agostini had been under the control of state-paid employees, thus providing assurance that public monies would not be spent on religious activities. The issue in Mitchell was whether the new principles announced in Agostini extended to assistance that remained under the control of religious school officials, particularly since some of the materials being provided (for example, computers) could easily be diverted for religious uses. By a six-to-three margin, the Court held that those principles did apply and upheld the aid. The vote belied the deep division on the Court, however. A four-justice plurality, written by Justice Clarence Thomas, urged an even more accommodating rule that assistance to religious schools was permissible, provided it was administered under a program that was neutral toward religion and available to public and private institutions alike. “If the religious, irreligious, and areligious are all alike eligible for governmental aid, no one would conclude that any indoctrination that any particular recipient conducts has been done at the behest of the government,” Thomas wrote. The plurality also urged the rejection of the pervasively sectarian principle, calling it a doctrine “born of bigotry” due to its anti-Catholic antecedents in the nineteenth century.

Writing in concurrence for herself and Justice Stephen Breyer, Justice Sandra Day O’Connor characterized the plurality’s opinion as being of “unprecedented breadth.” “Reduced to its essentials, the plurality’s rule states that government aid to religious schools does not have the effect of advancing religion so long as the aid is offered on a neutral basis and the aid is secular in content . . . [T]he plurality’s approval of actual diversion of government aid to religious indoctrination is in tension with our precedents.” For Justices O’Connor and Breyer, the actual diversion of public funds for religious activities was still prohibited under the establishment clause.

Finally, writing in dissent, Justice David Souter agreed with much of the sentiment in Justice O’Connor’s concurrence, but argued that the risk of diversion for religious purposes was too great, and the amount of assistance crossed the line from supplementing to supplanting the educational functions of the parochial schools. Mitchell revealed that four justices were prepared to dispense with most prohibitions on public funding of religious schools; however, a majority of the justices insisted that the establishment clause still prohibited government-funded religious activity, even under an otherwise neutral funding program.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Gedicks, Frederick Mark, A Two-Track Theory of the Establishment Clause, Boston College Law Review 43 (2002): 1071–1109.
- Green, Steven K., The Constitutionality of Vouchers After Mitchell v. Helms, New York University Annual Survey of American Law 57 (2000): 57–73.
- Jeffries, John C., and James E. Ryan, A Political History of the Establishment Clause, Michigan Law Review 100 (2001): 279–370.
- Lupu, Ira C., The Lingering Death of Separationism, The George Washington Law Review 62 (1994): 230–279.
- McConnell, Michael W., Religious Freedom at the Crossroads, University of Chicago Law Review 59 (1992): 115.
- Monson, Stephen V., ed. Church–State Relations in Crisis: Debating Neutrality. New York: Rowman & Littlefield Pub., 2002.
- Ravitch, Frank S., A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to Neutrality: Broad Principles, Formalism, and the Establishment Clause, Georgia Law Review 38 (2004): 489.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Agostini v. Felton*, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)
- Meek v. Pittenger*, 421 U.S. 349 (1975)
- Mueller v. Allen*, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)
- Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind*, 474 U.S. 481 (1986)
- Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District*, 509 U.S. 1 (1993)
- See also State Aid to Religious Schools; Zelman v. Simmons–Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

MITCHELL, JOHN (1913–1988)

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, John Newton Mitchell climbed to the height of American jurisprudence with an appointment as the U.S. attorney general and promptly descended into controversy as an architect of the break-in of the Democratic Party’s national headquarters in the Watergate Hotel in Washington, D.C., and its subsequent cover-up, for which he served time in prison.

Mitchell was born on September 5, 1913, in Detroit, Michigan. He studied law at Fordham University in New York, earning his degree and commencing the practice of law in 1938. He served in the Navy during World War II and was awarded the Silver Star for gallantry. After his military service, he continued to practice law in New York City and eventually, in 1967, his law firm merged with Richard Nixon’s firm.

The following year, he served as Nixon’s presidential campaign manager. In January 1969, President Nixon appointed Mitchell as the sixty-seventh attorney general of the United States, a post he served in until 1972, when he resigned to manage the president's successful campaign for reelection.

Mitchell ardently asserted the power of government in matters that he felt involved the duration of the Republic, while persistently showing restraint on government involvement in civil rights issues. Consequently, he felt that civil liberties were rightfully restricted in cases involving the preservation of national security. In addition to engineering illegal searches of the offices and files of his political rivals; Mitchell attempted to silence the voices of anti-Vietnam war protesters in Washington, D.C., by having them arrested in mass.

Perhaps, his most pointed attack on the First Amendment came in 1971 with his role in attempting to suppress the publication of portions of the Pentagon Papers. Specifically, the New York Times and the Washington Post were prohibited by the attorney general from publishing the classified documents detailing political and military relations between the United States and Vietnam between 1945 and 1967. The Supreme Court of the United States subsequently found that this injunction was a direct violation of the First Amendment of the Constitution.

Mitchell died at the age of seventy-five on November 9, 1988, and was buried with full military honors at Arlington National Cemetery.

BOBBY R. HOLT

References and Further Reading

Kutler, Stanley. The Wars of Watergate: The Last Crisis of Richard Nixon. New York: Knopf (distributed by Random House), 1990.

Reeves, Richard. President Nixon: Alone in the White House. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2001.

MODERN POLITICAL AND LEGAL PHILOSOPHY, CIVIL LIBERTIES IN

It has been said that to the political philosophers of the ancient world, such as Plato and Aristotle, the most important question was, “Who shall govern me?” To the political philosophers of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries—those who profoundly influenced America’s founding generation, the U.S. Constitution, and our contemporary notions of civil liberties—the most important questions were, “How much government shall there be?” and “What rights does the individual retain against the larger society?”

The ancient philosophers such as Plato and Aristotle taught that the communal well-being of the polis, or city-state, was paramount to the individual. By contrast, modern political and legal philosophy (that which emerged during and since the Enlightenment) upholds the primacy of the individual. It begins from the key conceptual premise that human beings are innately free and independent; each is his own master and the sole judge of how best to lead and preserve his life. Organized societies and their governments exist not as natural phenomena, but rather as matters of convention; humans establish them as a means to the end of better protecting their lives and property. By chartering governments, humans agree to cede a defined and limited portion of the liberty they enjoyed in the “state of nature” in order to conduct their lives amid greater order, tranquility, and security.

Individual Liberty

In the ancient worlds, freedom referred to the ability to participate in the life of the Republic. In modern political philosophy, by contrast, liberty is thought to inhere in each individual. Philosophers such as John Locke (1632–1704), Benjamin Constant (1767–1830), and John Stuart Mill (1806–1873) believed that the health and vitality of a society depended primarily on the ability of individuals to pursue life according to their own lights, to gain property, and to participate in the market.

Locke distinguished between natural liberty, which humans enjoyed before they voluntarily came together to form societies, and civil liberty, or “the liberty of man in society.” Locke’s notion of a social contract required the sovereign to obey the agreed-upon limits to government authority; otherwise, there would be no advantage over existence in the state of nature. Government is not the creator of rights and liberty, but rather their safeguard, and government becomes illegitimate when it infringes liberty for any purpose other than to protect life and property. Arbitrary or tyrannical government is illegitimate because it mocks the core capacity on which all human endeavor is based: the capacity for reason.

The Enlightenment’s Influence on America

The Declaration of Independence, written primarily by Thomas Jefferson, drew on deep wells of Enlightenment thought. It articulates a philosophy of natural rights that continues to inspire libertarians, even if it has little to do with the modern jurisprudence of civil liberties. The Declaration invokes “the Laws of Nature and of Nature’s God.” It declares “self-evident” the principle that humans are “endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights,” among them “Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness.” Governments derive their “just Powers from the Consent of the Governed.” When government decays into despotism, it is the people’s right “to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future.”

Given its limited conception of the power of government over the life of the individual, Enlightenment philosophy assumed the need for a large sphere of personal privacy. As the twentieth century theorist and historian of philosophy Isaiah Berlin explained, the libertarian philosophers of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries assumed,

There ought to exist a certain minimum area of personal freedom which must on no account be violated; for if it is overstepped, the individual will find himself in an area too narrow for even the minimum development of his natural faculties which alone makes it possible to pursue, and even to conceive, the various ends which men hold good or right or sacred. It follows that a frontier must be drawn between the area of private life and that of public authority.

Although it would take several centuries for Western law to formally recognize a legal “right to privacy,” such a notion seems implicit even in the teaching of William Blackstone (1723–1780), the great expositor of English common law, who called civil liberty “the great end of all human society and government . . . that state in which each individual has the power to pursue his own happiness according to his own views of his interest, and the dictates of his conscience, unrestrained, except by equal, just, and impartial laws.” Battles over civil liberties typically come down to differing understandings about what constitute “equal, just, and impartial laws.”

Mill, the “Harm Principle,” and Tyranny of the Majority

One of the political philosophers most closely associated with contemporary ideas and discourse about civil liberties is John Stuart Mill, whose masterpiece, On Liberty, defined the appropriate limits of government power according to the “harm principle”: the idea that “the only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilised community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others. His own good, either physical or moral, is not a sufficient warrant.” The individual is accountable to society through law only for conduct that directly affects others. “In the part which merely concerns himself, his independence is, of right, absolute.”

Applied strictly and literally, the harm principle obviously would sweep away vast amounts of regulation and “morals legislation” that Americans continue to accept from their local, state, and federal governments. (What objective harm does anyone suffer, for example, if two members of the same sex decide to marry—something forbidden by law in most states?) While governments have long sought to regulate morality in the name of tradition, consensus, and majoritarian values, civil libertarians wield the harm principle to demand better and more reasoned justifications for laws that intrude on individual autonomy. Some version of the harm principle, albeit a highly compromised one, can be discerned in modern American constitutional jurisprudence in the requirement that laws that infringe certain “fundamental” rights must be justified by “compelling” governmental interests.

Consistent with his belief that liberty was necessary to the development of human creativity and genius, Mill warned against the potentially coercive nature of political majorities. He held that “it is only the cultivation of individuality which produces, or can produce, well-developed human beings.” Society needs a creative minority because “[t]here is always need of persons not only to discover new truths, and point out when what were once truths are true no longer, but also to commence new practices, and set the example of more enlightened conduct, and better taste and sense in human life.”

The Enlightenment’s faith in human reason also explains why separation of church and state is a defining characteristic of modern civil liberties. The capacity for reason that makes all persons equal as subjects before the law also means that beliefs and behavior may not be dictated by mere clerical authority, any more than by a tyrannical sovereign. Applied to contemporary polity, this principle by no means requires excluding religious voices from the public square. It simply means that any government policy must, in the end, be supportable by an adequate secular purpose because it is unethical for religious believers to use the machinery of law and government to coerce others who do not share their beliefs. The contemporary theorist Robert Audi argues that a law or policy is secular to the extent that it derives its legitimacy from its appeal to human reasoning, the only true common denominator in a diverse and democratic society.

Since civil liberties are not always popular and majoritarian political processes cannot be relied upon to protect individual rights, civil libertarians believe that an independent judiciary is critical to a just and effective democracy. John Marshall, the Supreme Court’s first great chief justice, wrote that the “very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury.” The suspicion of tyranny of the majority that animated the thought of philosophers like Mill has been echoed in some of the great legal decisions of the twentieth century that have articulated the American philosophy of civil liberties. As Justice Robert Jackson wrote in a decision upholding the religious liberty of Jehovah’s Witnesses not to salute the flag:

The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials, and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One’s right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections.

Civil Liberties and Democratic Values

The vigorous defense of individual liberty is in tension with social visions that emphasize stronger commitments to community; to the notion that the welfare of society must override the desires of the individual; or to what is sometimes called “civic republicanism”—the idea, advocated by contemporary theorists such as Michael Sandel, that government should actively inculcate the virtues of character necessary for effective citizenship. Other critiques of liberal philosophy question whether individual liberty as a value above all others can be reconciled with social conditions in which individuals may lack the leisure, education, or economic resources to enjoy liberty usefully and responsibly. Locke, with his enshrinement of rights over private property, has been criticized as less concerned with liberty for all than with protection of the economic interests of the bourgeoisie. The desire to be left alone by government or by one’s fellow citizens may be a mark of high civilization, but what of those citizens who are unable to feed or shelter themselves? What about those times when society is under grave threat from domestic disorder or external enemies?

The eighteenth- and nineteenth-century philosophers recognized that if civil liberties depend on a social contract, the extent to which those liberties are valued and flourish may depend on the extent to which the members of society share a common sense of history, culture, and nationhood, if not common ethnicity or religion. A related and even more basic question is when certain liberties must yield to other social imperatives such as health, social order, and security against external threats. An obvious tension exists between the principle that government should infringe as little as necessary on individual liberty, and the need for government to protect against social anarchy (and against modern threats such as terrorism). As Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes wrote in a 1941 decision, “Civil liberties, as guaranteed by the Constitution, imply the existence of an organized society maintaining public order without which liberty itself would be lost in the excesses of unrestrained abuses.”

The ongoing philosophical dilemmas of civil liberties were perhaps best encapsulated by James Madison, the key architect of the Constitution, who wrote in Number 51 of The Federalist:

But what is government itself, but the greatest of all reflections on human nature? If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself.

STEVE SANDERS

References and Further Reading

- Audi, Robert. Religious Commitment and Secular Reason. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Barnett, Randy E. Restoring the Lost Constitution: The Presumption of Liberty. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2003.
- Berlin, Isaiah. Four Essays on Liberty. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1969.
- Germino, Dante. Machiavelli to Marx : Modern Western Political Thought. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.
- Perry, Richard L., ed. Sources of Our Liberties. Buffalo: Hein, 1990.
- Ten, C.L. Mill on Liberty. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1980.

MOMENT OF SILENCE STATUTES

Moment of silence statutes require or permit the observance of moments of silence in public school classrooms. These statutes must be considered in light of the Supreme Court’s constitutional doctrine concerning prayer in public schools. In a long line of decisions, the Court has ruled that the establishment clause of the First Amendment forbids the public schools from sponsoring prayer or other religious exercises, even when student participation is designated as voluntary. Among the Court’s concerns is the risk of subtle and indirect coercion, which might impair dissenting students' religious liberty or liberty of conscience. Public school students are required to attend; they are of an impressionable age; and they are readily influenced not only by their teachers, but also by social pressure, including peer pressure. As a result, students may feel obliged to participate in religious exercises despite their formal right to decline. Indeed, even when attendance is formally voluntary, as, for example, at a graduation ceremony, the Supreme Court noted in Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), that a dissenting student might feel "that she is being forced by the State to pray in a manner her conscience will not allow."

The Court in Weisman also reiterated as a "cornerstone principle" that "it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as a part of a religious program carried on by government." Another core principle of the establishment clause is that the government cannot prefer one religion over another. More broadly, the establishment clause generally forbids the government, including the public schools, from promoting religion over irreligion, even if there is no preference for any particular religion. At the same time, however, private religious activity, even in the public schools, is protected by the free exercise clause of the First Amendment. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has stated that public schools are free to accommodate the private religious activity of students, as long as the schools do not promote or endorse that activity. Moment of silence statutes have been challenged on the ground that they go beyond accommodation of religion by impermissibly promoting prayer, but the Supreme Court has suggested that most such statutes are constitutional.

The leading case is Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), decided in 1985. In Wallace, the Supreme Court invalidated an Alabama moment of silence statute on a vote of six to three, but the Court's decision was narrowly tied to the legislative history of the enactment. Preexisting Alabama law had already authorized silent "meditation," and the challenged statute did little more than add a provision for "voluntary prayer." Indeed, the chief legislative sponsor conceded that he had no purpose except that of "returning voluntary prayer to public schools." Writing for a majority of five, Justice John Paul Stevens found that the challenged statute was "entirely motivated by a purpose to advance religion." As such, it violated the secular purpose requirement of the establishment clause, as set forth in the often cited constitutional test of Lemon v. Kurtzman (403 U.S. 602, 1971).

Despite the Court's holding in Wallace, the justices indicated that other moment of silence statutes would stand on a different footing. Taking account of the views expressed not only in the majority opinion, but also in five separate opinions (both concurring and dissenting), a majority of the justices suggested that they would approve most moment of silence laws. Perhaps the most important opinion was that of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who joined the Court's invalidation of the Alabama statute, but emphasized its exclusively religious motivation. In other circumstances, she declared, the establishment clause would not preclude a moment of silence statute, even if it explicitly stated that the moment could be used for prayer as well as meditation or reflection. Utilizing the no endorsement test that she had first proposed in Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984), Justice O'Connor wrote:

The relevant issue is whether an objective observer, acquainted with the text, legislative history, and implementation of the statute, would perceive it as a state endorsement of prayer in public schools A moment of silence law that is clearly drafted and implemented so as to permit prayer, meditation, and reflection within the prescribed period, without endorsing one alternative over the others, should pass this test.

A majority of the states have enacted moment of silence statutes. Most refer simply to a period of silence for meditation or reflection, but others include references to prayer. Some statutes make the moments of silence mandatory. Others merely authorize such moments, leaving their implementation to school boards or individual teachers. Despite their diverse provisions, most of these statutes appear to satisfy the analysis of Justice O'Connor and therefore probably do not violate the establishment clause. Indeed, lower courts have so concluded, upholding moment of silence statutes as long as their legislative histories do not suggest the improper purpose of promoting or endorsing religion. In Bown v. Gwinnett County School District, 112 F.3d 1464 (11th Cir. 1997), for example, the Eleventh Circuit approved a Georgia statute requiring "a brief period of quiet reflection," and in Brown v. Gilmore, 258 F.3d 265 (4th Cir. 2001), the Fourth Circuit upheld a Virginia statute requiring a "minute of silence" for students to "meditate, pray, or engage in any other silent activity."

Critics contend that moment of silence statutes are thinly veiled attempts to promote prayer and that they are likely to have that effect. Thus, students who might not be inclined to pray may feel social and peer pressure to do so. Moreover, moments of silence may have the effect of promoting some religions over others, thereby violating a core policy of the establishment clause. Brief silent prayer is commonplace in Judaism and Christianity, for example, but Islamic prayer may not easily fit this model.

Conversely, one can argue—and it seems that the Supreme Court has implicitly concluded—that neutrally crafted moment of silence statutes are an acceptable constitutional compromise. Although there is a risk of coercion, any such coercion is subtle indeed; students are free to sit silently and think about anything they like. The potential preference for some religions over others is a separate concern, but, like nonreligious students, religious students whose religion does not countenance silent prayer during this period are free to engage in nonreligious reflection. The government is not “compos[ing] official prayers for any group of the American people to recite.” Rather, it is permitting interested students to compose silent prayers of their own, an activity protected by the free exercise clause.

DANIEL O. CONKLE

References and Further Reading

- Davis, Derek H. “Moments of Silence in America’s Public Schools: Constitutional and Ethical Considerations.” Journal of Church and State 45 (2003): 429–442.
- Dellinger, Walter, The Sound of Silence: An Epistle on Prayer and the Constitution, Yale Law Journal 95 (1986): 1631–1646.
- Education Commission of the States. “School Prayer, Moment of Silence, Other Policies Concerning Religion, July 2000,” <http://www.ecs.org/clearinghouse/13/38/1338.htm>.
- Smith, Rodney K., Now Is the Time for Reflection: Wallace v. Jaffree and Its Legislative Aftermath, Alabama Law Review 37 (1986): 345–389.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bown v. Gwinnett County School District*, 112 F.3d 1464 (11th Cir. 1997)
- Brown v. Gilmore*, 258 F.3d 265 (4th Cir. 2001)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Lynch v. Donnelly*, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
- Wallace v. Jaffree*, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

See also Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses

MONROE v. PAPE, 365 U.S. 167 (1961)

Monroe v. Pape is a seminal case concerning the enforcement of constitutional rights. It declared no new rights, but its holding established an effective means for remedying violations of constitutional rights (42 U.S.C. § 1983).

Section 1983 was first passed as Section 1 of the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871. In relevant part, it then provided: “Every person who, under color of a statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States . . . to the deprivation of any rights privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured.” In the ensuing ninety years, Section 1983 fell into desuetude. The belief was that the “under color of law” language required formal legal authorization to commit the constitutional deprivation. But most deprivations did not enjoy the imprimatur of law; they were isolated acts of individual state employees. Such violations were thought to be redressable, if at all, only through ordinary state-law claims (such as tort or contract).

Monroe v. Pape arose from a classic violation of rights. Chicago police suspected James Monroe of murder. Early on October 29, 1958, thirteen police officers, led by Detective Frank Pape, burst through the door of Monroe’s home. Pape was a colorful cop. His adventures had inspired M Squad, a popular detective drama of the 1950s. In his career he killed nine suspects in gun battles and later remarked, “Everybody I shot and killed deserved it. I slept like a baby after every one.”

Pape broke into the bedroom where Monroe and his wife were sleeping, pointed his gun, and ordered the Monroes to stand naked in the living room. He and other officers manhandled the Monroes’ children, beat Monroe, and called him racial epithets. The officers ransacked every room. They dragged Monroe off and interrogated him for ten hours. He was denied access to a lawyer and was never brought before a judge. Pape had no search or arrest warrant and never charged Monroe for the murder.

The Monroes brought suit against the officers and the City of Chicago. Alleging violations of their rights under the Fourteenth Amendment, they used Section 1983 to enforce those rights. The district court dismissed the case, and the court of appeals affirmed.

The Supreme Court reversed, holding that Section 1983 could be used to redress constitutional deprivations that were not sanctioned by state law or custom. Specifically, Justice Douglas’s opinion found that the “under color of law” language encompassed authorized and unauthorized deprivations. The Court observed that Section 1983 was intended to accomplish three aims. First, it overrode state laws that directly infringed on constitutional rights. Second, it provided a remedy when state law contained no adequate remedy. Third, and most controversially, Section 1983 “provide[d] a federal remedy where the state remedy, though adequate in theory, was not available in practice” (365 U.S. at 174). The Court traced the legislative history of the statute, noting Congress’s concern with state officials who were unable or unwilling to enforce state law in the face of the Ku Klux Klan. Therefore, the Court concluded that inadequacy of state-law remedies was a motivating factor behind Section 1983.

The Court then made its critical move: It did not make litigants demonstrate that state-law remedies were actually inadequate before invoking Section 1983. “It is no answer that the state has a law which if enforced would give relief. The federal remedy is supplementary to the state remedy, and the latter need not be first sought and refused before the federal one is invoked” (365 U.S. at 183). The Court’s move required a logical leap, but the decision not to require proof of state-law inadequacy gave Section 1983 its broad scope as a remedial statute: “Congress, in enacting [Statute 1983], meant to give a remedy to parties deprived of constitutional rights, privileges and immunities by an official’s abuse of his position” (365 U.S. at 172).

In a separate holding, Monroe stated that the City of Chicago was not a “person” within the meaning of Section 1983. That holding was overruled in 1978. Today municipalities can be sued under Section 1983 in limited circumstances.

Although they thought the issue “very close indeed” (365 U.S. at 192), Justices Harlan and Stewart concurred in the decision. Justice Frankfurter’s vigorous dissent established the baseline for counterarguments that have influenced the Court in later, narrower interpretations of aspects of Section 1983. Invoking principles of federalism, Justice Frankfurter argued that Section 1983 should not be available to redress constitutional deprivations when state law provided a remedy. He feared that state laws that had traditionally provided redress would be pushed aside, and the power to protect individuals would shift from the state to the federal level. Only when state law failed to provide a remedy – in other words, when the deprivation was authorized “under color of” state law or custom – should Section 1983 apply.

Section 1983 is not the only statute that enforces civil rights. Its scope is limited, most notably in its application only to constitutional violations by state or local (not federal) officials. Nonetheless, it is the most important vehicle for enforcing rights, largely because it authorizes compensation for past constitutional violations. Invoked in about 10 percent of federal cases, it has become the most widely used remedial statute in federal court. The meaning and breadth of Section 1983 have also become the focus of a forty-five-year battle on the Supreme Court. The Court has decided myriad cases further interpreting the statute, and their outcomes wobble between the enforcement impulses of Justice Douglas and the federalist concerns of Justice Frankfurter. A lightning rod of controversy, Section 1983 occupies a central place in continuing arguments over the scope of American constitutional rights and the role of federal courts in controlling the actions of state and local officials.

Monroe v. Pape ushered in this modern era of enforcing constitutional rights. Frank Pape felt the decision’s sting. He paid the Monroes $8,000 for his actions.

JAY TIDMARSH

References and Further Reading

- Brief for Petitioners, Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961) (No. 39).
- Fallon, Richard H., Jr. et al. Hart & Wechsler’s The Federal Courts and the Federal System, 5th ed. 2003, pp. 1067–1097.
- “Frank Pape, Top Chicago Detective, Dies at 91,” New York Times, A49 (Mar. 12, 2000).
- Jeffries, John C., Jr. et al. Civil Rights Actions, 2000, pp. 26–43.

MONTESQUIEU (1689–1755)

Baron de Montesquieu, Charles-Louis Secondat, was an eighteenth-century French political philosopher who had a crucial impact on the development of liberalism, civil liberty, and democratic constitutionalism. He is perhaps most revered for his theory of the separation of powers, which influenced the framers of the American Constitution.

Montesquieu was born into a French family of nobility and affluence (1689) and studied law in Bordeaux and Paris. He presided over the criminal division of the Parlement of Bordeaux from 1716 to 1727, intimately familiarizing himself with the machinery and administration of criminal justice in pre-Revolutionary France. Montesquieu published his Persian Letters in Amsterdam in 1721, assuring him of a literary career, and thereafter pursued political and philosophical writing in earnest. While The Spirit of the Laws did not appear until 1748, it was a great (and controversial) success and has earned Montesquieu a permanent place in the history of Western political philosophy. He died in 1755.

Skeptical of governmental power, Montesquieu argued that individuals should be as free from restraint as possible as long as existing laws were adequate for the provision of public tranquility and personal safety. Many of Montesquieu’s ideas about individual liberty and public tolerance anticipated those of the English political philosopher, John Stuart Mill (1806–1873). Those who see the Bill of Rights of the U.S. Constitution, for example, as the heart and soul of American civil liberty can appreciate Montesquieu's early defense of liberal freedoms. But Montesquieu's most important contribution was to thinking about political structures and the forms of government in their relationship to democratic rule. It is the body of the U.S. Constitution, prior to the first Ten Amendments, where the blueprint for liberal rule is laid out and without which no regime of civil liberty could survive. The separation of powers, for example, a concept pioneered by Montesquieu, puts in place a system of checks and balances that by limiting concentrations of governmental power, limits the ability of the state to deprive citizens of legitimate freedoms and interests.

One need only consider the historical fate of civil liberty under “states of exception”—regimes where conventional safeguards on the power of the executive are temporarily suspended—to see just how fragile individual freedom and legal rights can become, dependent as they are upon a liberal system of free institutions grounded in separated governmental powers. Contemporary Italian political philosopher Giorgio Agamben has demonstrated the increasing reliance upon states of exception in the political management of liberal democracies in the past half century. Thus, one can argue that Montesquieu and his critique of the forms of government are as relevant today as ever.

There is an alternate (primarily French) and rather significant reading to be had of Montesquieu. Relying upon a close analysis of Montesquieu's writing, especially the generally ignored, “Notes on England,” as well as earlier research by Charles Eisenmann and Louis Althusser, Iain Stewart argues that contrary to a common criticism made of Montesquieu's historical foundations, the author of the “Notes on England” understood the true nature of British constitutionalism “but knew that British politics were thoroughly corrupt.” Conventionally understood, the basic notion of separating government powers would hardly cure the British system of its worst defects.

Why? Analogizing Montesquieu's Britain to the republican regime at Venice, Althusser quotes from The Spirit of the Laws: “But the mischief is, that these [three] different tribunals are composed of magistrates all belonging to the same body; which constitutes almost one and the same power . . .” (Althusser, 90–91). The heart of the problem is what Althusser calls “a political problem of relations of forces, not a juridical problem concerning the definition of legality and its spheres” (Althusser, 91). Whether one contrasts a purely formal and legalistic treatment of the separation of powers to a genuinely political analysis, as do Stewart, Eisenmann, and Althusser, or to a sociological critique, as does Franz Neumann, the fact is that the radical potential of Montesquieu's political theory has been systematically ignored, according to these writers, and a kind of harmless mythology put in its place.

In short, with contemporary American government in mind, what does the separation of powers mean when each of the separated powers is beholden to, or even run by, millionaires? The French think Montesquieu had already seen through the misuse of separation theory—its purely juridical reconstruction as a veil or mask for the concentration, not separation, of power. How much difference can there be, in terms of possible implications for civil liberty, between the notorious state of exception described by Agamben and the simulacrum of checks and balances, the mere projection of an image of separated powers onto a political screen, like the shadows in Plato's cave?

ANTHONY CHASE

References and Further Reading

- Agamben, Giorgio. State of Exception. Translated by Kevin Attell. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2005.
- Althusser, Louis. Montesquieu, Rousseau, Marx. Translated by Ben Brewster. London: Verso, 1982.
- Eisenmann, Charles. La Pensee Politique et Constitutionnelle de Montesquieu. Paris: Recueil Sirey, 1952.
- Neumann, Franz. The Democratic and the Authoritarian State. New York: Free Press, 1957.
- Stewart, Iain. Montesquieu in England: His Notes on England, With Commentary and Translation. Oxford University Comparative Law Forum 6 (2002).

MOONEY v. HOLOHAN, 294 U.S. 103 (1935)

Mooney v. Holohan clarified the requirements of due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment and held that exhaustion of state remedies was required before an inmate in state prison could file a petition for writ of habeas corpus in federal court. Mooney was convicted of murder and originally sentenced to death, but his sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment.

Mooney charged that he was denied due process of law by the prosecution's knowingly using perjured testimony to obtain his conviction and suppressing evidence that would have impeached that false testimony. In response, the attorney general of California stated that proper notice and hearing were all that was necessary to satisfy the requisites of due process of law. After discussing the importance of due process as a fundamental concept of justice, the Court held that it could not be satisfied by mere notice and hearing if a state deprived a defendant of liberty by deliberately deceiving the court and jury.

The Court declared that a state must afford corrective judicial process to remedy wrongs flowing from the denial of due process of law. Mooney, however, had never applied for a writ of habeas corpus on the grounds he asserted to the Supreme Court. Therefore, a remedy was still available in California, and Mooney was required to exhaust his remedies there.

Mooney emphasized the importance of due process of law and the role of the state in safeguarding it, and also instructed inmates that exhaustion of state remedies was required for writs of habeas corpus.

EARL F. MARTIN

See also Due Process; Habeas Corpus: Modern History

MOORE v. EAST CLEVELAND, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)

A plurality of the U.S. Supreme Court (Justices Powell, Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun) held that an East Cleveland housing ordinance limiting the occupancy of a dwelling unit to members of a single family, but defining “family” to include only certain categories of relatives, was unconstitutional because it violated the substantive due process guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. Moore lived in her East Cleveland home with her two children and two grandchildren, who were cousins. In 1973, she received a notice of violation from the city, stating that one of her grandsons was an “illegal occupant” according to the housing ordinance. When Moore failed to remove the child from the home, the city filed a criminal charge. She was convicted and sentenced to a fine and jail time.

The U.S. Supreme Court distinguished this case from previous cases on the basis that other cases affected only unrelated individuals. The Court held that when the government intrudes on choices concerning family living arrangements, the usual deference to the legislature was inappropriate, and that the Court should carefully examine the objectives of the ordinance and the extent to which those objectives are served. The government argued that the ordinance addressed overcrowding, traffic congestion, and the financial burden imposed on the school system. The Court found that, contrary to the government’s assertions, the city’s interests were only marginally served by the ordinance. The Court pointed out that the ordinance distinguished upon grounds of the traditional nuclear family and that traditional families with a large number of children would not be subject to the limits placed by the ordinance, but families comprising extended family members choosing to reside in one residence would be in violation of it.

In making its finding of unconstitutionality, the Court balanced the tenuous relationship to the government’s objectives vs. the strong constitutional protection of the sanctity of the family, as established by numerous Supreme Court decisions, extending the constitutional protection provided in other situations to the family choice involved in this case and not confined to the arbitrary limits of the nuclear family. The Court found support for its holding from careful “respect for the teachings of history [and] solid recognition of the basic values that underlie our society” and that the nation’s history and tradition compelled a larger conception of the family. The Court concluded that the choice of relatives in such a degree of kinship to live together may not lightly be denied by the government.

Justice Stevens concurred in the outcome of unconstitutionality, but found that, under previous cases, an ordinance could only be declared unconstitutional if it were clearly arbitrary and unreasonable as having no substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare. Justice Stevens concluded that the city had failed to explain the need for a rule that would allow a homeowner to have grandchildren live with her if they are brothers but not if they are cousins, and that the ordinance constituted a taking of property without due process and without compensation.

DAVID M. CARR

References and Further Reading

Rubinfeld, Jed, The New Unwritten Constitution, Duke Law Journal 1 (2001): 289.

MORAN v. BURBINE, 475 U.S. 412 (1986)

The Cranston, Rhode Island, police arrested the detainee in connection with various crimes. Prior to each interrogation, the police reminded him of his Miranda rights, and at no time did the detainee request an attorney. The detainee made various incriminating statements that were used in the eventual conviction. The U.S. Supreme Court, overturning the decision of the Rhode Island Supreme Court, held that the police’s failure to inform a detainee of an attorney’s unilateral efforts to contact the detainee did not deprive him of his ability to knowingly waive his Fifth Amendment rights to remain silent and to the presence of counsel. Once it is demonstrated that a suspect's decision not to rely on his rights was not coerced, that the detainee at all times knew he could stand mute and request a lawyer, and that the detainee was aware of the state's intention to use his statements to secure a conviction, the analysis is complete. A detainee's Sixth Amendment right to counsel does not attach only after the first formal charging procedure.

The police's actions were not so offensive as to deprive the detainee of the fundamental fairness guaranteed by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because the actions did not shock the sensibilities of civilized society. Events occurring outside the presence of a suspect—and entirely unknown to the suspect at the time of an interrogation—can have no bearing on the detainee's capacity to comprehend and knowingly relinquish a constitutional right.

DAVID M. CARR

References and Further Reading

- Godsey, Mark A., Miranda's Final Frontier—The International Arena: A Critical Analysis of United States v. Bin Laden, and a Proposal for a New Miranda Exception Abroad, Duke Law Journal 51 (2002): 1703.
- Leo, Richard A. "From Coercion to Deception: The Changing Nature of Police Interrogation in America." Crime, Law and Social Change 18 (1992): 35–59, Springer Science & Business Media B.V.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Beckwith v. United States*, 425 U.S. 341 (1976)
- Berkemer v. McCarty*, 468 U.S. 420 (1984)
- Brewer v. Williams*, 430 U.S. 387 (1977)
- Edwards v. Arizona*, 451 U.S. 477 (1981)
- Escobedo v. Illinois*, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
- Fare v. Michael C.*, 42 U.S. 707 (1979)
- Hill v. Lockhart*, 474 U.S. 52 (1985)
- Johnson v. New Jersey*, 384 U.S. 719 (1966)
- Johnson v. Zerbst*, 304 U.S. 458 (1938)
- Kirby v. Illinois*, 406 U.S. 682 (1972)
- Maine v. Moulton*, 474 U.S. 159 (1985)
- Massiah v. United States*, 377 U.S. 201 (1964)
- McMann v. Richardson*, 397 U.S. 759 (1970)
- Michigan v. Tucker*, 417 U.S. 433 (1974)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- New York v. Quarles*, 467 U.S. 649 (1984)
- North Carolina v. Butler*, 441 U.S. 369 (1979)
- Oregon v. Elstad*, 470 U.S. 298 (1985)
- Rochin v. California*, 342 U.S. 165 (1952)
- Schneekloth v. Bustamonte*, 412 U.S. 218 (1973)
- Snyder v. Massachusetts*, 291 U.S. 97 (1934)
- State v. Beck*, 687 S.W.2d 155 (Mo. 1985)
- State v. Burbine*, 451 A.2d 22 (1982)
- State v. Jones*, 19 Wn.App.850 (1978)
- United States v. Cronin*, 466 U.S. 648 (1984)
- United States v. Gouveia*, 467 U.S. 180 (1984)

- United States v. Wade*, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)
- United States v. Washington*, 431 U.S. 181 (1977)
- 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Right to Counsel

MORMONS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Overview

Mormons made, if unwillingly, much of the religious law of nineteenth century America in precisely the same way that minorities have always forced progress in the development of religious and civil rights: by being skunks at the garden party hosted by more conventional people in charge of the feast. In a world then dominated by monogamous capitalists—unbridled capitalists at that—the Mormons practiced polygamous marriage within a Christian communal theocracy. During the ensuing century, American governments, state and federal, would wage a relentless, ferocious war upon the Mormons. Within that century, women, immigrant groups, Native Americans, and people of color would still be excluded from significant participation. They would be invited to the party only midway through the twentieth century.

Mormons would experience the full weight of an invasion by the American Army and be denied the vote, the right to jury trial, the right of spousal immunity from being forced to testify against a mate, the right to hold political office without a religious test that demanded the renunciation of one's faith—all rights embedded within the original text of the American Constitution. They would survive an extermination order of the governor of an American state as well as the seizure and the destruction of their homes, farms, and livestock. They would see their homes and meeting houses seized and often burned and destroyed. As has been true in the experience of most religious and racial or ethnic minorities in this country, the mobs of the night were often the soldiers and the officers of the law by day.

Imprisoned en masse, the leadership of the church would send messages from inside prison to believers on the outside, exhorting members to keep the faith while others conducted the governance of their congregations and communities as outlaws in exile in western badlands or from Mormon colonies in Canada and Mexico. In the end, the Mormons had to give up polygamous marriage and their Christian socialism.

They accepted the ways of twentieth-century America, initially with reticence and then with such an excess that few traces of the nineteenth-century church, as reflected by those characteristics of difference and of conflict with American society, now exist in the practice of its twenty-first century successor.

What remains is a stark reminder of the limits of law to accomplish benign social change. The savagery employed by those who fashioned and enforced laws of such excess did not eradicate the so-called evils identified by the government for extermination. Some levels of Mormon theocratic ways remain, to the consternation of those, including Mormons, of a more pluralistic, democratic mind. More troubling to the moral majority, however, is the fact that there are more people of Mormon heritage presently practicing polygamy within the American West than ever practiced it during the height of the persecution of the Mormons. One legacy of the persecution is its lingering social cost.

As society, including the twentieth- and twenty-first-century Mormon faith that renounced polygamy as a necessary cost of statehood, first made criminal and then excommunicated and exiled nonconformists to the badlands, the exiles have since heard only their own echo. Marginalized and deprived of the civilizing influence of education, interaction with other faiths, and civic dialogue, these fringe Mormons now raise their children in an incestuous and monotonic culture far removed from that of the increasingly cosmopolitan towns. As the divide between the religion of the hinterlands and that of the towns grows, Mormons in the centers of power react with yet more outrage and more legal restraints, while the exiled, correspondingly, begin to behave more like real outlaws. Tragic as the effect on the Mormon fringe has been, however, it is the cost as measured in mainstream Mormonism that is most lamentable. This is a loss of a unique form of Christian socialism that Tolstoy predicted would revolutionize the world if given a chance.

Mormonism began in New York State. Its founder and prophet, Joseph Smith, Jr., was born in Sharon, Windsor County, Vermont. With his father, Joseph Smith, Sr., he moved with his family to Palmyra, Ontario (now Wayne) County, and then to Manchester. There, in his fifteenth year, in the midst of the revivals then sweeping New York and New England, Joseph entered a grove of trees near his family's farm and prayed for guidance regarding the competing claims of the Methodist, Presbyterian, and other groups active in the area. Joseph said that God and His Son appeared to him in answer to his prayer. Over the next several years, Joseph received a series of revelations that included an additional book of scripture, the Book of Mormon, to be used along with the Bible in directing the organization and functioning of a new American religion.

The Mormon practice of polygamy came to be the lightning rod for the violent repression visited upon the Mormons by state governments and finally by the national government. This might be expected. But in the early, pre-Utah years, it was the Mormon inclination toward economic and political communality that perhaps most inflamed the Mormons' neighbors. While Freud would find this hard to believe, Karl Marx would understand. The Mormons' communal and economic structures were part and parcel of a faith that sought to bring about a new world order, Zion, in the here and now—an earthly, palpable reality, not simply a finger-hold in heaven. As those practicing a gathered community have always believed—this is true of the first Christians, the early followers of Muhammad, and the followers of the Dalai Lama as well as of the Mormons—the power of conversion is most effective when multiplied in a community of believers. This is true even if such communities must live in tents, build new homes, and endure exile.

All such communities must also somehow come to terms with the dominant and often dominating larger communities. This usually entails anguishing compromise with the vision of the founders. What truly is the bedrock of the faith? What is the foundational theology of the group, the infrastructure, as contrasted with the sociological superstructure that can be jettisoned? In fact, all governments face this challenge as societies move through time and space. Persecution by a dominant culture may exacerbate such a crisis but does not change the central issue of continuity and change.

For the first-century Christians, the precipitating crisis was the phenomenon of Gentile Christianity. Should the Mosaic law, and especially circumcision, be required of the new Gentile convert? To the Jewish Christian, and for that matter Jews of any time, circumcision was and is the token of the covenant with Yahweh. Could this sacred act ever be seen as sociological superstructure and hence something that Gentile members could omit? St. Paul said yes (Acts 15). The Pauline Christianity that thereby survived this crisis thus became a world religion and began to distinguish itself from its Jewish parent. That choice, to a Christian observer looking back from the twenty-first century, may seem obvious. But to the first-century church led by men and women of Jewish background, the answer was anguishing and anything but obvious.

For early Utah Mormons, the practice of polygamy, which they believed continued into the next life and was essential for attaining ultimate salvation, was as central to their faith as circumcision was to many Jewish Christians. Like circumcision, it would be sacrificed in the interest of the survival and spread of the Latter-day Saints (LDS) faith. So too would be their communal economy, which they believed was essential for the establishment of the kingdom of God in the here and now. The arrival of that kingdom would have to await forces more powerful than those the Mormons could raise against the U.S. Army.

Before its demise, the Mormon social and economic order gave rise to a unique system of dispute resolution through “home teachers,” a pair of men assigned to every family in each ward (parish). In the nineteenth century, these home teachers mediated all Mormon disputes of a civil nature: all actions in tort, property, marriage and family law, water law, contracts, and taxation. Those conflicts not amenable to mediation—a small portion of the whole—were appealed to a local congregational court, the bishop’s court that was composed of the lay bishop and his two counselors. Beyond this, one could appeal to the diocesan level, the Mormon stake, if unanimity could not be reached in amity. The only sanction of these courts was loss of some portion of church privilege for a time.

These methods of conciliation, mediation, and fact-finding were fast, fair, and cheap. The Mormon church of the nineteenth century forbade going to Caesar’s courts, as did St. Paul (1 Corinthians 6), under threat of excommunication. Even more innovative and potentially revolutionary was the Mormon practice of shared property. Under the United Order, as it was known, each gave according to his capacity and received according to his needs, with the church acting as gathering house and dispensary. In contrast to contemporary Communism, living the United Order was voluntary, even within the church. Also unlike Communism, it was empowered by shared belief. All this and more was lost as the price to pay for citizenship within the American democracy.

In view of the loss of such effective social structures, the dominant culture must ask what degree of social, political, and religious uniformity is essential, at the minimum, in order to preserve a society’s original vision? How can the larger society avoid such debasement or, at least such dilution, of the existing order as to make inclusion of the new group not worth the cost? For nineteenth-century America, distinguished from its predecessor by a notable lack of vision at the top, the Mormons were too tribal to assimilate. In forcing America to address the question of assimilation, the Mormons, along with Irish Catholics and Jews from Eastern Europe, would push America’s legal system to the limits. In the process, the free exercise and nonestablishment clauses of the First Amendment would come to enjoy new importance and be interpreted with greater robustness than ever before.

History of Early Mormon–Government Relations

Although the LDS Church was officially organized in 1830 in upstate New York, the earliest significant gathering of the Mormons began a year later in Kirtland, Ohio. It was here that the Mormons built the first of several towns, more or less from the ground up. Among the important events of the Kirtland period was the construction of the first LDS temple. The Kirtland period was a critical one for the establishment of a central community of believers, for the introduction of new theology surrounding the temple and its ordinances, and for the expansion of the church’s missionary efforts, which contributed vital new blood to the young church. All of these activities, in LDS thinking, were part of the building of a new Zion, which was an economic and social paradigm as much as it was one of belief, and this fact inevitably brought the Mormon community into conflict with its neighbors.

Of critical importance to understanding the non-Mormon opposition is the fact that at this time the Mormons did not openly practice polygamy. They did, however, enjoy a form of socialist economic practice, with community-owned enterprises and communal manufacture and commerce. For example, the Mormons formed their own bank, the Kirtland Safety Society. Like the majority of settlers of the western lands, these largely Jacksonian Democrats were debtors, not creditors. When the state of Ohio refused to grant a charter to the Kirtland Safety Society, the Mormons issued their own notes. A period of intense innovation and activity, the Kirtland years lasted only until 1838. Inaugurating what was to become standard practice, non-Mormons who feared the latter’s growing economic power and who were angry over the Mormons’ tribal inclination to conduct economic and legal transactions within their own community, forced the Mormons to relocate to Missouri—the first of several steps toward the frontier.

The subtitle of the Missouri period might be “out of the frying pan and into the fire,” for it was in Missouri that the Mormons would face their most ferocious opposition to date. In addition to their insular habits and communally oriented industry, the Mormons were overwhelmingly from New England and the British Isles, and almost all opposed slavery. (This particular demographic would later change, after the Missouri period, as Mormon missionaries began going into the southern states). Missouri was divided between those favoring and opposing the expansion of slavery. The early Mormon practice of seeking proselytes among Native Americans and black slaves resulted in such opposition within Missouri that the Mormon prophet, Joseph Smith, who had permitted the baptism and ordination of blacks, soon stopped this in an effort to preserve his community within the state. This temporary act of acquiescence was to become reified after the murder of Joseph Smith. While the baptism of blacks continued, the church withheld its priesthood from them until 1978. The divisive and hurtful exclusion of blacks from the Mormon priesthood, ironically, is one of the many legacies of the persecution of Mormons—exile and abuse begetting other forms of the same.

The Mormons came to see Missouri, and particularly Jackson County, as the gathering place for the Mormon people. Indeed, Joseph Smith claimed to have received revelation to the effect that the New Jerusalem would be built in Independence, which it also transpired, was the site of the Garden of Eden. Early Mormon settlement in Independence, Missouri, had begun already in 1831, in parallel with the development of Kirtland. But, as in Kirtland, the Mormons' theocratic socialism brought them into conflict with their neighbors. In 1833, the leaders of Independence, Missouri, formally asked the Mormons to leave the state. The Mormons refused, and violence soon followed. As Mormon farms were attacked, livestock killed, and barns burned, the Mormons asked Governor Daniel Dunklin for military protection of their farms and communities. He told them simply to rely upon the courts and sue for relief. Local judges refused to help the Mormons and Mormon businesses, homes, and farms continued to be burned and destroyed. The Mormons were finally forced to flee Jackson County and settle across the Missouri River in November 1833.

The Mormons then petitioned President Andrew Jackson for relief, requesting that federal troops be sent to restore them to their homes and farms and to protect them until an adequate state response could maintain the peace. Jackson refused, stating that he possessed no power to call out federal troops to enforce state laws. Many Mormons then settled in Caldwell County, Missouri. But there too, the rapid growth of the Mormon population soon caused conflict with neighbors, who early on had welcomed the Mormons. This time, the Mormons began arming themselves and fighting back. As word reached Missouri Governor Lilburn Boggs that the Mormons were arming themselves and that violence was increasing, he issued an extermination order against the Mormon people, unless they would leave the state. Late in October 1838, somewhere between eighteen and twenty-six Mormons were massacred at Haun's Mill in Caldwell County. The following day a mob, led by the state militia, surrounded the Mormons in far west in Caldwell County and arrested most of the Mormon leaders. With their leaders in jail, the Mormons emigrated from Missouri to Quincy, Illinois.

In Illinois, the Mormons concluded that seeking a redress of grievances and restoration of their property in Missouri, whether through state or local courts or the state legislature, was futile. They initiated a novel legal proceeding to impeach the state of Missouri and petitioned the governors of the other states for support. The action of impeachment was to be accomplished by the federal government in Congress and the presidency. A Mormon delegation left Illinois for Washington in October 1839 with a petition demanding redress by the national government. This was the United States before the Civil War and the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments before the civil rights legislation that followed and before the incorporation doctrine had begun a process by which the civil rights of the people would become nationalized with the United States as the guarantor.

The answers they received from the president and the Congress were foredoomed. What President Martin Van Buren told the Mormon delegation, whom he received a day after they arrived in Washington, was reflective of the constitutional law of the time, though probably motivated by political concerns more than national jurisprudence. His answer also explains why there are so few Van Buren streets within Mormon settlements to this day. He told the Mormons that "your cause is just, but I can do nothing for you." The Mormon efforts towards Congress culminated in three days' debate within the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. Legitimate concerns about Senate jurisdiction and less legitimate concerns about the politics of siding with the Mormons led to a rejection of the Mormon petition.

Failure to find protection or redress of grievances at local, state, and national levels of government led the Mormons to turn ever more inward. They decided to found a new community of their own in southern Illinois. That community, Nauvoo, came to be one of the largest cities in the state, comparable to Chicago in population. The Nauvoo City Charter had more of the elements of a modern state constitution than of a municipal charter. In it, the Mormons formally sought the power to govern themselves with Mormon institutions. At one point, facing increasing pressure from mobs and law enforcement agencies, the Nauvoo City Council passed ordinances granting itself power to declare void any writ executed by any court in the state.

The charter was an interesting experiment in the use of legal fictions in their own defense (usually Mormons were on the receiving end of such fictions), but proved to be of little value as the seemingly inescapable opposition to their presence began to rise in Illinois as well. But this time, the Mormons faced opposition from dissident Mormons as well. Some of these established a newspaper, the Nauvoo Expositor, which published an edition loaded with allegations against Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders, accusing them of a number of offenses, including the practice of polygamy. (Though the Mormons denied the allegation as to the practice of polygamy and continued to do so for a few years after they had reached the Great Basin, in fact this accusation was true.) In response, Joseph Smith directed the council to authorize Nauvoo's law enforcement officials to destroy the type of the Expositor. This led to such an outcry from around Nauvoo that Joseph Smith, his brother, Hyrum, and other Mormon leaders were imprisoned. Shortly after their arrest, Joseph and Hyrum were murdered by elements of the state militia and other residents of surrounding communities.

Once again, the Mormons fled. In 1846, under the direction of Smith's successor, Brigham Young, they began their trek of thirteen hundred miles into the Great Basin and the valley of the Great Salt Lake, when they left, a part of Mexico. It was their intent to put problems with unruly America behind them by leaving the country altogether. But by the time they arrived in the desert that was to be Salt Lake City, the war with Mexico had occurred, and the territory of Utah had been incorporated into the Union. In what seems like a macabre joke, the Mormons, well along the journey that would see hundreds die of disease, accident, malnutrition, weather, and other hardships of travel on foot, were asked to contribute a contingent of men to fight in the war. Brigham Young agreed. The Mormon Battalion, as this group came to be known, did not see hostile action, but did perform the longest march in American military history, from the American Midwest to California, and played an important role in securing California in particular for the Union. Among other things, they helped put an end to John C. Fremont's abortive attempt to make California into a separate nation.

Free at last, as they supposed, to build a true Zion society, the Mormons launched a program of settlement and development across much of the West, reclaiming marginal steppe land for farms, founding cities and towns, damming streams, digging canals, and building homes, temples, and meeting houses of astonishing beauty. The impact of this effort remains today. While most of the farms of the later homesteaders and the towns of the miners have returned to the desert, the Mormon communities have almost all survived. The reason is the communality that caused the Mormons such trouble east of the Mississippi. The Mormons came as group, acted as a group, and survived. The others came and acted as individuals and by and large failed in the harsh environment of the West.

If theocratic socialism was the flash point for conflict with non-Mormons prior to 1847, polygamy was to be the issue for the remainder of the century. While Mormons officially acknowledged the doctrine and practice of polygamy in 1852, the Morrill Act, the first of several federal laws passed by Congress to eliminate polygamy, was still a decade away. Brigham Young's Utah territory was still too remote to be high on anyone's list of priorities. When the Morrill Act finally made its appearance, the Civil War was in full swing. The Mormons thus had two decades in which to build their utopia without serious opposition. The end of the Civil War, however, brought renewed national attention to the West. The long-awaited transnational railway was completed in 1869. The Union Pacific and Southern Pacific sections came together in, of all places, Promontory, Utah, right under Brigham Young's nose.

A mixed blessing, the railway brought wealth to Utah but also put Brigham Young's hitherto isolated kingdom within easy reach of the national government. Losing no time, President Andrew Johnson inaugurated the postwar effort to bring Mormons under control by dispatching an army to Utah. Mormons fought back by sabotaging army supplies and preparing to destroy their cities, including Salt Lake City. The parties ultimately reached a mediated settlement. The army was saved from starvation only by the kindness of the Mormons whom they had been sent to whip into conformity.

The federal government then brought an action against Brigham Young's secretary, George Reynolds, for violating the Morrill Act, a piece of legislation designed to eliminate polygamy. While this was one of only two cases successfully prosecuted under this flawed law, the conviction of Reynolds, hitting so close to Brigham Young, caused repercussions throughout the Mormon empire.

In reviewing this case, the Supreme Court upheld Reynolds's conviction and the Morrill Act, dismissing Mormon arguments that polygamy was protected as religious expression under the free exercise clause of the First Amendment. Most American law schools today begin their discussion of the free exercise clause with an examination of this famous case. The Morrill Act, though upheld by the Supreme Court in Reynolds, was too ineffective to be the instrument through which the government could destroy Mormon polygamy. In 1887, Congress passed the Edmunds Act, which created the federal offense of unlawful cohabitation, thus relieving law enforcement officials from proving an unlawful marriage, as had to be done under the Morrill Act.

While Edmunds-Tucker provided that only wives willing to testify against their husbands be allowed to give evidence, Utah judges, appointed by non-Mormons, held Mormon women in contempt of court and jailed them until they would agree to testify against their husbands. Most refused. Many went to jail, and some bore children there. By 1893, after the Mormons had officially renounced polygamy and prosecutions had nearly ceased, there had been 1,004 convictions for unlawful cohabitation and 31 for polygamy. In its effort to eradicate the Mormon theocracy and polygamy, the government had imprisoned most Mormon leaders and had denied Mormons in general many of their rights as U.S. citizens. The antipolygamy acts, for example, contained provisions that disallowed practicing Mormons from serving on juries, thus not only violating a fundamental constitutional right but also making it easier to convict other Mormons of polygamy. The acts denied active Mormons the right to hold elective or public office or to vote. They denied children of Mormon polygamous parents rights of inheritance. They prohibited (but did not stop) the immigration of Mormons to the United States and barred foreign-born Mormons from obtaining citizenship.

The federal government acted not only against individual Mormon leaders and members but also against the church. In an effort to preserve the Mormon Church from legal attack, the assembly of the state of Deseret (which included not only prestatehood Utah but also surrounding areas) had passed an ordinance in 1851 incorporating the Mormon Church. This allowed the church to hold and manage many of the industries and properties of the Utah territory. Under various acts of Congress directed against the Mormons thereafter, much of Mormon property became vulnerable to federal seizure. The Morrill Act, for instance, revoked the charter incorporating the Mormon Church. The Edmunds-Tucker Act directed the Mormon Church to abandon polygamy or face seizure of its property, including communal farms and businesses, houses of worship, and even Mormon temples.

Facing complete destruction, the church decided that it would have to abandon polygamy, and, in 1889, issued the "Manifesto" that, at least officially, ended Mormon polygamy and with it federal persecution. Utah's admission to the Union in 1896 recognized the new peace. Though not forced to do so, the Mormons also began abandoning institutions of distinction in favor of integration into the American Republic. These disappeared not at the point of a gun but at the cash register. Protecting unique Mormon economic institutions from outside competition proved impossible. Gone, for example, are the communal businesses and farms, as well as church-based forms of dispute resolution by mediation and conciliation.

The costs of the savage suppression of the Mormons will never be known. One can tally the numbers killed or lost in the westward trek, the numbers of fathers and mothers imprisoned, and the numbers of those who chose instead to flee to Mexico or Canada. One can gain some feeling for the general suffering through surviving diaries and journals. But the unique, indigenous American religious culture that fascinated Leo Tolstoy, Richard Burton, and other world-wise visitors died in its infancy. What the industrious Mormon blending of communitarian theocratic and democratic governmental influences might have achieved—as an alternative to a capitalistic system that creates great wealth for a few, some wealth for many, and great poverty for many more—will never be demonstrated, at least by the Mormons.

Years ago, Daniel Boorstin (p. 3) noted, "The American Puritans' City Upon a Hill prospered because it was a City on the Sea. How different the story of New England, or of America, might have been if they had built their Zion in a sequestered inland place, some American Switzerland, some mountain-encircled valley!" Brigham's Zion, the Mormon City of God, was exactly that interior city. No indication of what the Mormons might have accomplished can be had from their descendents today. The Mormons of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries are profoundly conservative and ally themselves with hardcore capitalists and neofundamentalists. Nothing in their theology dictates this—quite the contrary. Contemporary Mormon conservatism is rather the result of the politics of isolation.

If anything was central to early Mormonism, it was the idea of Zion. The faith of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young was not in a hereafter only but in the imperfect but perfectable present. In this regard, Mormonism might well be considered the American religion. Sir Henry Maine, the first great modern legal historian of the English language, once described the movement from a more static feudal society to modernity as the movement from status to contract. Modern history is built upon the notion that individuals can act so as to determine their destiny. Young agreed. He said, "I have Zion in my view constantly.

We are not going to wait for angels, or for Enoch and his company to come and build Zion, but we are going to build it!" Jedediah Grant, a counselor to Brigham Young, said the same, "If you want a heaven, go to and make it!" Mormons came from a sturdy, self-reliant class of laborers and artisans, empowered by their capacity to build a home and a community. They rejected the idea of mediation by an educated, professional clergy. If heaven was achievable at all, they could get there through their own dedicated industry. It is not the least of the losses of America's penchant for enforced conformity that the early Mormons did not have a chance to build their City of God.

EDWIN B. FIRMAGE

References and Further Reading

- "Allegiance and Stewardship: Holy War, Just War, and the Mormon Tradition in the Nuclear Age." Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought 16 (1983): 47.
- Allen and Leonard. The Story of the Latter-day Saints. Salt Lake City: Deseret Book Company, 1976.
- Arrington, Leonard. Great Basin Kingdom: An Economic History of the Latter-day Saints. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1958.
- . Brigham Young: American Moses. New York: Alfred Knopf, 1985.
- Arrington, Leonard, Fox, and May. Building the City of God: Community and Cooperation Among the Mormons. Salt Lake City: Deseret Book Company, 1976.
- Bankcroft, Hubert Howe. History of Utah. Salt Lake City: Deseret Book Company, 1964.
- Boorstin, Daniel. The Americans: The National Experience. New York, Vintage Books, 1965, p. 3.
- Brown, Hugh B. The Memoirs of Hugh B. Brown: An Abundant Life. Salt Lake City: Signature Books, 1999.
- "Discipleship in the Nuclear Era, Sunstone, January, 1987; Violence and the Gospel: the Teachings of the Old and New Testaments." Brigham Young University Studies 25 (1986): 31.
- Firmage, E.B. "MX and the Destruction of Society's Values." In That Awesome Space: Human Interaction With the Intermountain Landscape. Chicago: Westwater Press, 1981.
- . "The Judicial Campaign Against Polygamy and the Enduring Legal Questions." Brigham Young University Studies 27 (1987): 91.
- . Free Exercise of Religion in Nineteenth Century America: The Mormon Cases, Journal of Law and Religion 7 (1989): 281.
- , ed. "Reconciliation, the Monsignor McDougall Lecture, Delivered at the Cathedral of the Madeleine, Salt Lake City, Utah, 7 March 1989." Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought 22 (1989): 130.
- . Religion and the Law: The Mormon Experience in the Nineteenth Century, Cardozo Law Review 12 (1991): 765.
- . "God: CEO or Master of the Dance?" Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought 28 (1995): 59.
- . "Seeing the Stranger as Enemy." Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought 30 (1997): 27.
- . "Reflections on Mormon History: Zion and the Anti-Legal Tradition." Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought 31 (1998): 53.
- . "Why Didn't the Watchdogs Bark?" In God and Country, Politics in Utah, Jeffery E. Sells, ed. Salt Lake City: Signature Books, 2004, chapter 12.
- . MX: Democracy, Religion and the Rule of Law: My Journey, Utah Law Review 1 (2004).
- . "MX: A Personal Essay, Beehive History." Utah State Historical Society 28: 25–31.
- Firmage, E.B., and Mangrum. Zion in the Courts: A Legal History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1830–1900. Carbondale: University of Illinois Press, 2001.
- Quinn, Michael. The Mormon Hierarchy: Origins of Power. Salt Lake City: Signature Books, 1994.
- "Violence and the Gospel: the Teachings of the Old Testament, the New Testament, and the Book of Mormon." Brigham Young University Studies 25 (1985): 31.
- Young, Brigham. Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, p. 284; vol. 3, p. 6.

MOTES v. UNITED STATES, 178 U.S. 458 (1900)

In Motes v. United States, the U.S. Supreme Court held that an accused has been deprived of his Sixth Amendment right to confront his accuser when the witness who had testified against the accused disappeared prior to allowing the accuser an opportunity to cross-examine the witness.

After a preliminary trial before the U.S. commissioner in which Jasper Taylor testified to the guilt of Walter Motes and him, and for which testimony Motes had the opportunity to cross-examine Taylor, Motes and Taylor were formally accused of murder and conspiracy to murder. At the actual trial, Taylor was called to testify against Motes, but disappeared an hour before his testimony due to the negligence of the officer guarding him. The prosecution submitted Taylor's previous testimony from the preliminary trial to the jury over the objection of Motes's counsel. Motes was convicted and appealed unsuccessfully to the court of appeals and to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court held that Motes had not procured the absence of the witness and had been denied the opportunity to cross-examine the witness before the jury. However, the Court affirmed the conviction due to Motes's voluntary confession as to his guilt. In addition, the Court found that in criminal cases a question of interpretation of a constitutional right cannot depend upon the rules of evidence prevailing in the courts of the state in which the crime was committed, but is controlled by the Constitution and the Court's interpretations of the Constitution.

DAVID M. CARR

References and Further Reading

Nance, Dale A., Rethinking Confrontation After Crawford, International Commentary on Evidence 2(1) Article 2., <http://www.bepress.com/ice/vol2/iss1/art2> (2004).

Cases and Statutes Cited

American Construction Co. v. Jacksonville Railway Co., 158 U.S. 372
Ex parte Yarborough, 110 U.S. 651
Logan v. United States, 144 U.S. 263
Lowe v. State, 86 Ala. 47
Pruitt v. State, 92 Ala. 41
Regina v. Scaife, 2 Den. Cr. C. 281
Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145
United States v. Rider, 163 U.S. 132
United States v. Waddell, 112 U.S. 76
 Revised Statutes of the United States, §§ 5508-9

See also Confrontation Clause

MOVIE RATINGS AND CENSORSHIP

It is not uncommon to hear parents express concerns about the content of movies that their minor children can view on television, personal computers, and at the local mall's cineplex. Due to the belief that minors are more impressionable than adults, parents often worry that their children are at risk of mimicking the vulgar language and coarse attitudes expressed in many modern films. In addition, parents express concern about the substantial number of films containing significant amounts of graphically violent and sexually explicit material, as well as themes glorifying drug use, alcohol consumption, criminal activity, and other forms of destructive behavior. Parents also worry that movies are often demeaning toward women; racial, ethnic, and religious groups; gays and lesbians; and other marginalized groups. In fact, some people believe that the widespread consumption of modern films by adolescents and teenagers—who are in their prime socialization years—constitutes a significant threat to the psychological health and well-being of the next generation.

These fears and concerns are not, though, unique to the twenty-first century. In fact, since the first nickelodeons began playing films more than 100 years ago, parents and social reformers have worried about the substance of the material on display and the impact it would have on minors (Grieverson, 2004; Heins, 2003). Not surprisingly, almost immediately after the introduction of motion pictures in the early twentieth century, local and state governments began to develop regulations and licensing schemes to govern the content and public dissemination of films (Grieverson, 2004; Heins, 2003). These regulations typically required those who wanted to distribute and/or exhibit a film to first secure a license from a government board that had reviewed and approved the film. In its first opportunity to assess the constitutionality of these forms of regulation, the U.S. Supreme Court concluded that they did not violate any free-speech rights protected by federal and state constitutions.

In Mutual Film Corp. v. Industrial Commission of Ohio, 236 U.S. 230 (1915), the Court argued that motion pictures could be subjected to substantial government regulation because they are typically exhibited in theaters with a mixed-gender audience of adults and children. Justice McKenna, in his opinion for the Court, explained that state lawmakers had legitimate reasons to be concerned about these exhibitions because “there are some things which should not have pictorial representation in public places and to all audiences.” He added that “[w]e would have to shut our eyes to the facts of the world to regard the precaution unreasonable.” The Court concluded its analysis by asserting that movies were a novel and unique form of communication that warranted regulation by the state. Justice McKenna wrote:

It cannot be put out of view that the exhibition of moving pictures is a business, pure and simple, originated and conducted for profit, like other spectacles, not to be regarded, nor intended to be regarded by the Ohio Constitution, we think, as part of the press of the country, or as organs of public opinion. They are mere representations of events, of ideas and sentiments published and known; vivid, useful, and entertaining, no doubt, but, as we have said, capable of evil, having power for it, the greater because of their attractiveness and manner of exhibition. It was this capability and power . . . that induced the state of Ohio . . . to require censorship before exhibition . . . We cannot regard this as beyond the power of government.

The Court's decision in Mutual Film gave state and local governments the green light to expand their regulatory control over films and film exhibitors. For the next thirty-five years, films in the United States were closely scrutinized, although the eyes performing the scrutiny were not limited to government agents. For example, the Catholic church became actively involved in monitoring the content of movies, and its Legion of Decency (Catholic adherents who pledged not to attend movies that priests and bishops had deemed immoral) arguably had a significant effect on the content of movies (Heins, 2003). In addition, the film industry's major studios developed the Production Code in the early 1930s as a way to monitor the content of films. Stephen Vaughn (1988, 1990) argues that the movie studio's efforts at “self-censorship” resulted substantially from pressure exerted by the financiers of Hollywood studios—who in turn were strongly influenced by members of the clergy.

The effort to control the content of films was dealt a substantial blow, however, when the Supreme Court announced its decision in Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952). This was the first Supreme Court decision to address film licensing regulations since the First Amendment was held applicable to the states in Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925). In Burstyn, the Court considered whether a New York license that had previously been issued to the distributors of the film The Miracle could be revoked by state authorities who subsequently concluded that the film was “sacrilegious.” Overriding the wishes of the New York State Catholic Welfare Committee (which had filed an amicus curiae brief in the case), the Court unanimously overruled its earlier decision in Mutual Film and directed state authorities not to revoke the film’s license. The Court concluded that films are entitled to significant protection from prior restraint and other forms of government regulation. As Justice Clark explained in Burstyn:

It cannot be doubted that motion pictures are a significant medium for the communication of ideas. They may affect public attitudes and behavior in a variety of ways, ranging from direct espousal of a political or social doctrine to the subtle shaping of thought which characterizes all artistic expression. The importance of motion pictures as an organ of public opinion is not lessened by the fact that they are designed to entertain as well as to inform.

In particular, the Court was troubled by the vague and ambiguous nature of New York’s movie licensing statute. The cryptic nature of the word “sacrilegious” failed to provide government agents with the requisite guidance to channel their discretion when deciding whether to issue licenses to distributors of films. It would be too easy for government agents to approve licenses for films containing religious themes that they favored and deny licenses to films they disfavored. Justice Clark explained in Burstyn that “the censor is set adrift upon a boundless sea amid a myriad of conflicting currents of religious views, with no charts but those provided by the most vocal and powerful orthodoxies.”

Over the next fifteen years, compliance with the Production Codes declined and fewer and fewer state and local authorities vigilantly enforced film regulations. Foreign films, which did not need to be submitted for approval under the codes, became increasingly prevalent in the U.S. market. Moreover, the Supreme Court decided several cases that made it increasingly difficult for government authorities to regulate film distribution and exhibition. For example, in Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U.S. 684 (1959), the Court held that New York authorities could not refuse to issue a license to a film simply because, in their opinion, it contained views that condoned adultery.

More importantly, in Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965), the Court held that film regulations must require the government to shoulder the burden of proving that a film is not protected expression—and in most instances this meant that the government would need to demonstrate that the film was obscene (see Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 1968) or constituted child pornography (New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 1982). The Court also held in Freedman that film regulations must provide prompt court review of any agency decision denying a license. Thus, although the Court concluded in Time Film Corp. v. Chicago, 365 U.S. 43 (1961), that the First Amendment does not entirely prohibit government authorities from reviewing the content of films prior to their exhibition, the collective weight of its decisions by the mid-1960s did impose heavy procedural burdens on government authorities.

As a result of these and other court decisions, government censorship boards largely faded away by the end of the 1960s. This process was accelerated when, on November 1, 1968, the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA), the National Association of Theatre Owners (NATO), and the International Film Importers & Distributors of America (IFIDA) began implementing a voluntary movie rating system (Valenti, n.d.). The MPAA’s rating process is quite rudimentary. A group of eight to thirteen parents from Encino, California, view films and then rate them according to their suitability for individuals under the age of seventeen. Jack Valenti, the chair and CEO of the MPAA, explains the work of the ratings board in the following manner:

There are no special qualifications for Board membership, except the members must have a shared parenthood experience, must be possessed of an intelligent maturity, and most of all, have the capacity to put themselves in the role of most American parents so they can view a film and apply a rating that most parents would find suitable and helpful in aiding their decisions about their children’s movie going.

The decisions of the rating board can be appealed by movie producers to the Rating Appeals Board (a body comprising individuals from the movie industry), and the board’s decisions are final. Today, the MPAA has five rating categories: G (all ages admitted); PG (all ages admitted, although parental guidance is suggested); PG-13 (all ages admitted, although parents are strongly cautioned that these films may be unsuitable for children, especially those under age thirteen); R (restricted to patrons above age sixteen or those accompanied by a parent/guardian); and NC-17 (no one seventeen and under admitted). Of course, it is highly unlikely that a small group of parents from the suburbs of southern California can accurately gauge what the “average American parent” considers appropriate for his or her children. Nevertheless, the MPAA ratings provide rough approximations about the content of films, and parents can use this information to monitor what their children watch.

From a civil liberties perspective, however, one can raise serious questions about the MPAA ratings—particularly whether the ratings are truly voluntary. After all, it appears that one of the primary reasons for their initial development was that of warding off more intrusive and rigorous government regulation (Valenti, n.d.) This implies that, in the absence of government pressure, the film industry might never have developed its movie rating program. If this is true, then the MPAA ratings are not an example of purely private censorship. Rather, they seemingly constitute an indirect form of government censorship, which one could argue presents a serious First Amendment problem.

Of course, one might question whether the MPAA movie rating system (even if created out of fear of government regulation) should qualify as government “censorship”—with all of the negative bag and baggage that that word conveys. After all, the ratings are just that, ratings. They do not force screenplay writers, directors, or producers to alter or compromise the content that they wish to include in films. In fact, studios are not required to subject their films to the MPAA rating process. Instead, they are free to release their products to the general public without any rating—or with a rating of their own making (although they cannot attach one of the MPAA’s copyrighted rating labels).

Nevertheless, one should not forget that the film industry is one whose revenue is largely determined by the box office success of its products. To maximize revenues, most film industry personnel recognize that movies need to be viewable by the widest possible audience. Consequently, movie studio executives will sometimes exert pressure on screenwriters and directors to avoid including content that will trigger one of the more severe ratings. Compounding this problem is the fact that many cinemas will not run films with an NC-17 rating, and such films are not sold by some of the larger DVD retailers such as Wal-Mart and Blockbuster. In short, there is a strong financial incentive in the movie industry to produce films that will not be tagged with ratings beyond PG or PG-13.

Since movie ratings do not appear to be in the artistic or financial interest of the film industry, perhaps the MPAA should disband and walk away from its nearly four-decade effort of rating films. Indeed, and somewhat paradoxically, the film industry might be subject to fewer constraints if it stepped aside and let the government take over the ratings game. After all, any ratings scheme that the government developed would have to be consistent with the First Amendment. Despite Time Film Corp. v. Chicago and Ginsberg v. New York, there is good reason to believe that the Supreme Court’s extant free-speech doctrine would prevent the government from rating films in any substantial manner (and probably much less than they are regulated today under the MPAA’s standards).

Obviously, though, this would not prevent private individuals and organizations from developing their own rating systems and disseminating their results to the broader public. This already happens on a widespread basis today, and some of these rating schemes are much more detailed than are the MPAA’s. The First Amendment protects these private rating activities, just as it protects the rights of film critics to review movies in newspapers and on television. In many respects, the MPAA’s rating scheme crowds out these lesser known rating sources—and that may be a reason the MPAA does not want to exit the ratings business any time soon.

MARK KEMPER

References and Further Reading

- Grieverson, Lee. Policing Cinema: Movies and Censorship in Early-Twentieth-Century America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.
- Heins, Marjorie. “The Miracle: Film Censorship and the Entanglement of Church and State.” The Free Expression Policy Project (<http://www.fepproject.org/>), 2003.
- MPAA. n.d. The Motion Picture Association of America. (<http://www.mpa.org/home.htm>).
- Valenti, Jack. n.d. “How It All Began.” (<http://www.film-ratings.com/>).
- Vaughn, Stephen. “Financiers, Movie Producers, and the Church: Economic Origins of the Production Code.” In Current Research in Film: Audiences, Economics, and Law, vol. 4. Bruce Austin, ed. Norwood, NJ: Ablex Publishing Corp, 1988.
- . “Morality and Entertainment: The Origins of the Motion Picture Code.” Journal of American History 77 (1990): 44.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ginsberg v. New York*, 390 U.S. 629 (1968)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson*, 343 U.S. 495 (1952)
- Kingsley International Pictures Corp. v. Regents*, 360 U.S. 684 (1959)

Mutual Film Corp. v. Industrial Commission of Ohio, 236 U.S. 230 (1915)
New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)
Time Film Corp. v. Chicago, 365 U.S. 43 (1961)

MOZERT v. HAWKINS COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION,
827 F. 2D 1058 (1987)

This case arose under the free exercise clause of the First Amendment. The plaintiffs consisted of a group of parents of public school children who objected to various religious materials contained in their children's reading curriculum that offended their religious beliefs. The parents claimed that by forcing their children to be exposed to these materials in the curriculum, the school system had violated their rights to the free exercise of religion, as guaranteed by the First Amendment. The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Tennessee entered an injunction that required the schools to excuse objecting students from participating in reading classes where the textbooks were used and awarded the parents monetary damages.

The U.S. Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the judgment of the district court, finding that mere exposure of materials found to be objectionable to the religious beliefs of students and their parents did not amount to a violation of the free exercise clause by placing a burden on the students' and parents' rights of free exercise of religion. In reaching its conclusion, the court of appeals relied primarily on three cases.

The Sixth Circuit distinguished Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963), on the basis that in Sherbert the objecting party's rights to free exercise were burdened when the government required an employee to work on the party's Sabbath day or forfeit benefits. The Sixth Circuit observed that the government had denied the employee a benefit, whereas in Hawkins, the only burden was a threat of exposure to offensive materials.

The Sixth Circuit also distinguished Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961), where the state of Maryland had denied a public office to a person because of the person's refusal to declare a belief in God. The Court stated that in this case, the students had not been required or compelled to profess or deny any religious belief. The Court found that the students had not been coerced into doing an act forbidden by their religion or to affirm or disavow a belief prohibited by their religion.

In Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972), a group of Amish students objected to being compelled to attend school in violation of their religious beliefs.

The Supreme Court found that the requirement to attend school presented a real threat of undermining the Amish community and religious practices. The Court found that the students would abandon their belief or be forced to migrate to some other, more tolerant region. The Sixth Circuit distinguished Yoder by noting the narrowness of the decision and the particular set of facts presented. Additionally, the Sixth Circuit found that in Yoder, the students had no other options, but the students in this case were provided two options to accommodate their beliefs.

The Sixth Circuit concluded that when students are not required to affirm or deny a belief or engage or refrain from engaging in a practice forbidden by their religion, no unconstitutional burden on the right to free exercise can be established. This holding has been interpreted and extended to various settings to allow public schools almost unlimited authority to decide subjects taught there and to limit parental intrusion on that authority. Furthermore, Hawkins has been the basis for numerous court decisions upholding legislation affecting religious institutions as not violating the establishment clause.

DAVID M. CARR

References and Further Reading

Mawdsley, Ralph D. Education and the Law, vol. 14, Numbers 1-2. New York: Routledge, 2002, pp. 77-82.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

MT. HEALTHY CITY SCHOOL DISTRICT BOARD OF EDUCATION v.
DOYLE, 429 U.S. 274 (1977)

In Mt. Healthy v. Doyle, the U.S. Supreme Court overturned a federal appeals court ruling that reinstated a teacher's position with back pay when the teacher had been dismissed by the board of education based, in part, on constitutionally protected speech.

In the case at hand, a teacher had made a phone call to the media complaining of actions taken by the board of education. The board then sought to dismiss the teacher based on the phone call and other actions brought to the attention of the board by school administrators.

Before making its finding on the protected speech issue, the Supreme Court addressed issues of jurisdiction and immunity. First, the Court held that in order to meet the damages requirements of 28 U.S.C. Section 1331, at the time the suit was filed it was far from a “legal certainty” that the teacher would not have been entitled to an amount in satisfaction of Section 1331. Second, the Court found that a board of education is not immune from suit because it is “more like a county or city than it is an arm of the state.”

Finally, the Court held that although the teacher had engaged in protected speech, the other complaints brought up by the board of education could have been sufficient to sustain the dismissal; because the board did not need a reason to dismiss the untenured teacher, the district court should not have put the teacher in a better position than he would have been in if he had not engaged in protected speech.

DAVID M. CARR

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bell v. Hood, 327 U.S. 678 (1946)
Bivens v. Six Unknown Fed. Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971)
Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564
Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651 (1974)
Ford Motor Co. v. Dept. of Treasury, 323 U.S. 459 (1945)
Kenosha v. Bruno, 412 U.S. 507 (1973)
Liberty Mutual Ins. Co. v. Wetzel, 424 U.S. 737 (1976)
Lincoln County v. Luning, 133 U.S. 529 (1890)
Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149 (1908)
Lyons v. Oklahoma, 322 U.S. 596 (1944)
Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961)
Montana–Dakota Utilities Co. v. Northwestern Pub. Serv. Co., 341 U.S. 246 (1951)
Moore v. County of Alameda, 411 U.S. 693 (1973)
Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 33 (1939)
Parker v. North Carolina, 397 U.S. 790 (1970)
Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593 (1972)
Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
St. Paul Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co., 303 U.S. 283 (1938)
Weathers v. West Yuma County School Dist., 387 F.Supp. 552 (Colo. 1974)
Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636 (1975)
Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963)
 28 U.S.C. § 1331
 28 U.S.C. § 1343
 42 U.S.C. § 1983
 Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2743.01
 Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 3317
 Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 133.27
 Ohio Rev. Code Ann. §§ 5705.02, 5705.03, 5705.192, 5705.194

MUELLER v. ALLEN, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)

Prior to the 1980s, the Supreme Court had frequently struck down laws that had the effect of providing aid to religious institutions. Exceptions to this general pattern existed. For example, in Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947), the Court upheld the reimbursement of transportation expenses for parents of school children, including the reimbursement of the costs of transporting children to religious schools. Moreover, in Board of Education v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236 (1968), the Court affirmed the loan of secular textbooks to all school children in a state, including those attending religious schools. But generally, the Court wielded the three-part test of Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), requiring that laws have a secular purpose and effect as well as no excessive entanglement between religion and government, to invalidate aid to religious schools.

Mueller inaugurated a new trend in the Court’s jurisprudence. At issue in Mueller v. Allen was a state law that permitted taxpayers to deduct from their gross income certain educational expenses relating to tuition, textbooks, and transportation necessary to send the taxpayer’s children to school. In practice, the principle beneficiaries of the deduction were parents of children in private, religious schools. A majority of the Court, in an opinion by then Associate Justice William Rehnquist, upheld the law from a challenge under the establishment clause. Applying the Lemon test, the Court concluded that the law had a secular purpose and effect and did not excessively entangle government and religion.

Justice Rehnquist’s opinion highlighted two factors that would become prominent in the decisions of the Court over the next two decades. First, he emphasized that the challenged income tax deduction was only one of many deductions available to taxpayers and that it was a deduction available to all parents of school-aged children, whether their children attended public or private schools, including private religious schools. Second, he noted that the deduction funneled state assistance, in the first instance, to the parents rather than to the private, religious schools. These schools received money as a result of the independent choices of parents. In light of these two considerations, Rehnquist’s opinion found it of no constitutional consequence that most of those taking advantage of the educational deduction were parents of children in religious schools.

Mueller’s focus on the choices of individual recipients of aid in funneling the aid to religious institutions became a prominent part of the Court’s jurisprudence over the next twenty years. In particular, Mueller’s reasoning anchored the opinion of the Court’s majority, also written by now Chief Justice Rehnquist, in Zelman v. Simmons–Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002). In Zelman, which involved the constitutionality of a school voucher program that allowed students to use expense vouchers to attend a school of their choice, the Court upheld the program largely because the aid received by religious schools under the program came to them by virtue of the independent choices of individual parents. Also, the Court reiterated Mueller's conclusion that the constitutionality of the voucher program was not threatened by the mere fact that the majority of parents using the vouchers had sent their children to religious schools.

TIMOTHY L. HALL

References and Further Reading

- Choper, Jesse H. Securing Religious Liberty: Principles for Judicial Interpretation of the Religion Clauses. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995, pp. 169–188.
- Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda. Constitutional Law, 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson–West, 2004, pp. 1429–1458.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education v. Allen*, 392 U.S. 236 (1968)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Zellman v. Simmons–Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

See also Accommodation of Religion; Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947); Lemon Test; Secular Purpose; State Aid to Religious Schools; Zellman v. Simmons–Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

MULLANEY v. WILBUR, 421 U.S. 684 (1975)

Mullaney v. Wilbur is one of a series of cases decided in the 1970s, including In re Winship (397 U.S. 358, 1970) and Sandstrom (442 U.S. 510, 1979), that strengthened protection to defendants by strictly construing the due-process requirement that the government bear the burden of proof in criminal cases. In Mullaney the Supreme Court reviewed a Maine statute that created a conclusive presumption that a defendant had acted with malice aforethought if the government proved the killing was unlawful and intentional. That conclusive presumption could be rebutted, but only if the defendant proved by a preponderance of the evidence that he acted in the heat of passion on sudden provocation.

In Mullaney the defendant claimed he killed Claude Hebert in the latter's hotel room because Hebert made a homosexual advance toward him. He argued this constituted a sudden provocation. However, he offered no evidence for the defense other than what was contained in the police report offered by the prosecution. He was convicted. The Court unanimously held that Maine's conclusive presumption was unconstitutional because it transferred the burden of proof from the state to the defendant on an essential element of the crime—state of mind. The significance of Mullaney was diminished by a later decision in Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977), in which the Court declined to apply Mullaney to a statute providing an affirmative defense of extreme emotional distress. Nevertheless, Mullaney continues to stand for the proposition that the government has the burden of proof on all elements of the crime charged.

TAMARA R. PIETY

References and Further Reading

- Bibas, Stephanos, Judicial Fact-Finding and Sentence Enhancements in a World of Guilty Pleas, Yale Law Journal 110 (2001): 1097–1185.
- Leahy, William J., and M. Speer Brownlow, An End to Burden-Shifting Presumptions: The Signal Criminal Law Achievement of the Post-Warren Court, Boston Bar Journal 35 (Nov./Dec. 1991): 10–14.
- Mueller, Christopher B., and Laird C. Kirkpatrick. Evidence, 3rd ed. New York: Aspen Publishers, 2003, pp. 130–149.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- In re Winship*, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)
- Patterson v. New York*, 432 U.S. 197 (1977)
- Sandstrom v. Montana*, 442 U.S. 510 (1979)

See also Due Process; In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970); Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977); Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt; Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510 (1979); *Self-Defense

MURPHY, FRANK (1890–1949)

Frank Murphy, a renowned civil libertarian who served as an associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court during the Roosevelt and Truman presidencies, was born and raised in Harbor Beach, Michigan, located on Lake Huron in rural northern Michigan. His father, John, was a lawyer, as well as the town Democrat and populist who, even in a heavily Republican community, was elected twice to serve as the county's prosecuting attorney. His mother, Mary, was a deeply religious Catholic woman who instilled in Frank a sense of social justice, personal integrity, and abstinence from alcohol and tobacco. He had two brothers and a sister, with whom he remained very close throughout his public life. In short, Murphy came from “small town, middle class, and politically alert America” (Howard, p. 3).

After attending public schools where he played football and other sports, Murphy enrolled at the University of Michigan in 1908. Three years later, he graduated and entered the University of Michigan Law School. Murphy was, by all accounts, an average student, but he was also an outstanding orator with a wide breadth of interests in college life. During what biographer Sidney Fine called his “years of the purest gold” (1975, p. 18), Murphy forged many friendships with men and women at Michigan, who would later become his political associates, advisers, and appointees to government posts.

Murphy served a brief stint in World War I, mostly in Germany after combat operations had ceased. In 1919, he was appointed first assistant U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Michigan, based largely upon his experiences as a military prosecutor. He ran unsuccessfully as a Democrat for Congress in 1920 when national and state Republicans swept Michigan, but he used the race to build a political base. Meanwhile, he began a private law practice of criminal and civil cases with law school classmate Edward Kemp. By 1923, he drew upon his legal reputation and growing political connections to win a seat on Recorder’s Court, Detroit’s criminal court.

Frank Murphy as Judge, Politician, and New Deal Reformer

Murphy’s seven years as a criminal court judge were generally uneventful, with one notable exception. In 1925, shortly after becoming presiding judge, he assigned to himself the trial of Dr. Ossian Sweet, his wife, and eight other African-American relatives and friends who were charged with murder, resulting from a white mob’s attack of Dr. Sweet’s house in an all-white Detroit neighborhood. Murphy’s rulings from the bench and charges to the jury were scrupulously fair, and the Sweets were eventually acquitted. The national attention drawn to this case, including close monitoring by the NAACP and the ACLU, brought Murphy increased visibility and new political networks that would prove invaluable in later elections.

Reeling from the effects of the Great Depression and local corruption, Detroit was a city in turmoil when Murphy was elected mayor in 1930 by piecing together a progressive coalition; a year later, the popular Murphy was easily re-elected. As mayor, Murphy was a champion of public relief for the unemployed and fiscal integrity. He implemented local work projects and food and clothing distribution centers, while also leading a national urban lobby for federal relief. He was an early and enthusiastic supporter of FDR, helping Roosevelt to become the first Democratic presidential candidate to win the state of Michigan. By 1933, the reward of a big government job was waiting. Murphy wanted to be FDR’s attorney general but settled instead for the high-paying and prestigious position of governor-general of the Philippines.

Although criticized for his lack of relevant experience and knowledge of Asian affairs, Murphy became a charismatic and highly popular leader in the Philippines. He was a natural champion of the underdog who served as an anti-imperialist colonial governor. During his tenure, Congress passed a law granting independence to the Philippines by 1946, and Murphy played a key role in securing presidential approval of a new Filipino constitution and in improving relations with Washington.

By 1936, FDR asked Murphy to run for governor of Michigan. A reluctant candidate, Murphy campaigned as a New Deal reformer and was elected by a narrow margin. Shortly thereafter, sit-down labor strikes were called by the United Auto Workers at plants in Flint, Michigan, and elsewhere. Murphy was eventually able to negotiate some measure of industrial peace, but his prolabor sympathies cost him many votes in industrial areas and led to his defeat for re-election in 1938. A few weeks later, FDR selected Murphy to be his attorney general.

Murphy’s ambitious agenda for the Justice Department included improvement in the administration of justice nationwide, morality in government, and a firm commitment to civil liberties. Indeed, he created a new civil liberties unit within the Justice Department. But he also formed an unexpected alliance with FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover to fight crime and public corruption. By most accounts, Murphy was a better political evangelist than executive manager of the Justice Department. Rumored to be a possible presidential candidate in 1940 (if FDR chose not to seek a third term) and a Supreme Court nominee on several occasions, Murphy was nominated by FDR to the Court in January 1940. He was confirmed by voice vote of the Senate eleven days later. Eager to finish his work as attorney general, he continued on the job for another month, exasperating FDR and political associates. Murphy finally took the oath of office at a White House ceremony where his political rival, Robert Jackson, was installed as attorney general.

Justice Frank Murphy

As the fifth of FDR’s nine appointees, Murphy became part of the “Roosevelt Court,” which upheld the government's power to regulate virtually all aspects of the economy, established ground rules for industrial disputes, and aggressively protected the rights of unpopular religious, racial, and political minorities. His early years on the Court were marked by a degree of tentativeness and uncertainty, unusual for the decisive Murphy but customary for new justices. He did assemble a majority and write the opinion in Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940), in which the Court invalidated an Alabama statute that prohibited peaceful picketing by labor. Justice Murphy's opinion temporarily brought picketing under the constitutional protection of the First Amendment. But subsequent Supreme Court decisions whittled away at these protections, and the issues eventually passed to the supervision of Congress.

In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942), a cautious Justice Murphy wrote for a unanimous Court that there are, indeed, limits to the First Amendment, including "... the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or 'fighting' words." The Court upheld Chaplinsky's conviction for calling police "fascists" in public when he was arrested while distributing religious pamphlets for Jehovah's Witnesses. Ironically, this opinion authored by the civil libertarian Murphy is still cited today by the Supreme Court and legal scholars for the "fighting words" exception to free speech.

A more seasoned Justice Murphy found his voice for the protection of civil rights and liberties in cases involving the government's conduct during World War II. Here, even while serving as an informal adviser to FDR on labor and Philippines policy until Roosevelt's death in 1945, he demonstrated the kind of independence from the president who appointed him that has aggravated so many presidents.

Justice Murphy is perhaps best known for his dissent in Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944). In Korematsu, a six-person majority of the Court led by Justice Hugo Black upheld FDR's Executive Order 9066, which provided for the exclusion and relocation of more than one hundred thousand Americans of Japanese ancestry living on the West Coast. Murphy argued that in the absence of martial law this policy should not be approved, declaring—in now famous words—that the exclusion "goes over 'the very brink of constitutional power,' and falls into the ugly abyss of racism." Justice Murphy was particularly troubled by the racist stereotypes, prejudices, and assumptions about Japanese Americans that guided the military judgments.

In cases involving the military draft and conscientious objection during World War II, Justice Murphy regularly dissented from the Court's decisions. In Falbo v. United States, 320 U.S. 549 (1944), his eight Court colleagues upheld a conviction and prison sentence for a Jehovah's Witness minister who was classified by his local draft board as a conscientious objector rather than as a minister (and therefore required to report for civilian service camp duty). The justice warned that "in time of war individual liberties cannot always be entrusted to uncontrolled administrative discretion." His dissent in Falbo is particularly poignant because Justice Murphy served in World War I and underwent military training in the infantry reserve during his 1942 summer recess from the Court.

Justice Murphy was not always a dissenter. More often than not, he joined the Court's majority, either in unanimous cases or as part of a fluid bloc of liberal justices who dominated the Court during the Roosevelt years. He also wrote concurring opinions (twenty-one in all), in which he joined the Court's holdings but not its reasoning, often urging that the cases be decided on broader constitutional grounds. Indeed, he acknowledged using concurring opinions as an educational device to lecture about the evils of racism. For example, in Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946), Justice Murphy happily concurred in the Court's ruling that a statute authorizing martial law in Hawaii did not include the power to replace civilian courts with military tribunals. But he denounced arguments in favor of military tribunals that rested upon assumptions about the loyalties of Japanese Americans, who could not, by law, be excluded from serving on juries in civilian courts. "Especially deplorable," the justice wrote, "is this use of the iniquitous doctrine of racism to justify the imposition of military trials. Racism has no place whatever in our civilization."

Justice Murphy had a complex set of relationships with the other justices on the Roosevelt Court. He was not well regarded intellectually by Chief Justice Stone, who was reluctant to assign him leading opinions, and he did not get along with Justice Owen Roberts, a holdover from Hoover. Justice Robert Jackson had been his political adversary in the Roosevelt cabinet, and Justice Murphy was constantly at odds—in his opinions and views of the role of the Court—with Justice Felix Frankfurter, an intellectual giant and political iconoclast who believed strongly in judicial restraint. Eventually, he gravitated toward the more liberal justices Hugo Black and William O. Douglas, but both men had intellects and persona that overshadowed the more humble Justice Murphy. It was not until Wiley Rutledge arrived on the Court in 1943 that the justice found a good friend, warm colleague, and natural political ally.

Justice Murphy's tenure on the Court is not without critics and controversies. His most severe critics charged that he was a result-oriented jurist: a politician in a black robe who had little knowledge of, or interest in, jurisprudence and little regard for legal precedent. Other critics point to his work habits on the bench, where he relied more heavily than most justices on his law clerks to draft opinions, while also taking on outside speeches and presidential advising. The justice was in poor health during his last year on the bench. He suffered several lengthy hospitalizations and probably became addicted to pain-killing prescription drugs, during which time he used his clerks and Justice Rutledge to help complete his opinions. More recently, some observers have suggested that Justice Murphy was probably the first gay Supreme Court justice. Based largely upon his being single and rooming at times with friend and adviser Edward Kemp, who also never married, this assertion is not supported by the biographies of Murphy that link him repeatedly with women throughout his life; indeed, he was engaged to be married at the time of his death.

What is not in dispute is Frank Murphy's lifelong commitment, as a municipal judge, mayor, governor, U.S. attorney general, and Supreme Court justice, to civil rights and civil liberties. In each position, he became increasingly supportive of rights for the laborer, racial equality, and social justice. As biographer Howard observes of Justice Murphy's tenure on the Supreme Court, "His vote and impassioned pen were key elements in a revolutionary development of civil liberties" (p. 490).

JOHN PAUL RYAN

References and Further Reading

- Boyle, Kevin. Arc of Justice. New York: Henry Holt, 2004.
 Fine, Sidney. Frank Murphy: The Detroit Years. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, 1975.
 ———. Frank Murphy: The New Deal Years. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1979.
 Potts, Margaret H. "Justice Frank Murphy: A Reexamination." Supreme Court Historical Society Yearbook (1982): 1–12.
 Woodford, Howard, J., Jr. Mr. Justice Murphy: A Political Biography. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1968.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)
Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U.S. 304 (1946)
Falbo v. United States, 320 U.S. 549 (1944)
Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)
Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940)

MURRAY, JOHN COURTNEY (1904–1967)

Murray, a Roman Catholic priest, was the lead author of Dignitatis Humanae (DH), the Declaration on Religious Freedom. DH was promulgated by an overwhelming majority of the world's Roman Catholic bishops at the close of the Second Vatican Council in Rome in December 1965. In contrast to the church's preconiliar teaching that only Catholics should possess the right to public worship, DH recognized every human person's right to religious freedom. Murray provided the argument that persuaded the bishops to abandon the traditional claim that only true religion (that is, Catholicism) had rights. The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution profoundly influenced Murray and the content of the declaration.

Murray was born in New York City on September 12, 1904. He entered the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits) in 1920 and was ordained a Roman Catholic priest in 1933. He was professor of theology at Woodstock College in Maryland from 1937 until his death in 1967. He died of a heart attack in a taxicab in New York City on August 16, 1967.

Intercredal Cooperation and Indifferentism

During the 1940s, Murray's writings addressed the difficult problems associated with intercredal cooperation, the collaboration of Catholics and non-Catholics in the work of social justice. Some Catholics feared that such cooperation encouraged religious indifferentism—that is, the belief that religions are equally true. Indifferentism was unacceptable because the church taught that Catholicism was the one true religion. Murray caused some controversy within the church with his argument that individuals of different faiths can cooperate for justice while agreeing to disagree about theology.

Separation of Church and State

This early analysis of religious pluralism and cooperation led Murray to study church–state questions. The separation of church and state posed special problems for American Catholics. The church taught that the one true religion should be the established religion. Moreover, the Roman pontiffs had vigorously condemned the separation of church and state in Europe. Before Vatican II, Catholics were taught to tolerate the nonestablishment of Catholicism but to aspire to establishment. In other words, they could accept the First Amendment's separation as a matter of expediency but should prefer an established Catholic Church (like Spain's) as a matter of principle.

Murray creatively challenged the ban on separation in a series of scholarly articles published in the 1940s and 1950s. He set the church–state debate in historical context by arguing that the popes' condemnation of European liberalism should not extend to the American setting. In Europe, separation of church and state had restricted the freedom of the church. In contrast, in the United States, separation of church and state protected religious liberty. Hence, Murray argued, American Catholics should not merely tolerate the First Amendment, but instead accept it enthusiastically, as good law that promoted freedom.

Murray's conclusions were too controversial for the church. In 1955, Vatican officials ordered him to cease writing about church and state, and a major article on that subject was withdrawn from publication.

In the United States, however, Murray's views were celebrated. In 1960, his book, We Hold These Truths: Catholic Reflections on the American Proposition, received significant attention. John F. Kennedy's aides consulted with Murray before the presidential candidate gave his famous speech espousing separation of church and state to Baptist ministers in Houston. Murray appeared on the cover of Time magazine after Kennedy's election; the priest and the president had demonstrated in different ways that Catholicism was compatible with the U.S. Constitution. The president, however, who opposed federal aid to religious schools, was a stricter separationist than the priest, who supported it.

Religious Freedom

Within the church, Murray's ideas faced continued opposition. When Pope John XXIII convened the church's bishops to the Second Vatican Council in October 1962, Murray was absent, disinvited by his opponents. Eventually, the American bishops secured Murray's presence as an expert at the Council's Second Session in 1963. He then collaborated with Father Pietro Pavan, of the Lateran University in Rome, to draft the Declaration on Religious Freedom.

After the Council ended, Murray explained that the "development of doctrine" had been the "sticking point" for many Catholic bishops and theologians. They believed that the church could not change its teaching, that only the true religion had the right to religious freedom, and that erroneous religions had no right to public worship. Murray ingeniously developed an argument that protected the church's claims to truth while allowing it to recognize the religious freedom of non-Catholics.

Murray's solution was legal and political, not theological. He explained that the human right to religious freedom is rooted in human dignity, not in truth. Because every person possesses human dignity, everyone has the right to religious freedom. Moreover, that legal right must be recognized and defended by the government.

Murray described the individual's right to religious freedom as a double immunity from coercion and from restraint. First, the government may not coerce the individual conscience into belief. Second, it may not restrain the individual from the practice of religion. Although the Catholic Church had accepted that first immunity from coercion before Vatican II, the second immunity, from restraint, was the new concept that Murray persuaded the bishops to adopt at the Council. Murray attributed the second immunity to the First Amendment. Hence, the American experience of religious freedom persuaded the international gathering of bishops to change the teaching of the Roman Church.

Selective Conscientious Objection and Contraception

Murray devoted his last years to numerous topics of social concern. He was one of only two participants on an advisory commission to President Lyndon Johnson to endorse the right of selective conscientious objection. Murray also voiced support for the Papal Birth Control Commission members who recommended a change in the church's ban on artificial contraception. He supported the decriminalization of contraception and, drawing parallels to his work at the Council, argued that contraception was a matter of religious liberty in a pluralistic society.

Murray's lucid analyses of social questions remain influential among many American Catholics, who continue to assert his relevance to current debates about religious pluralism.

LESLIE C. GRIFFIN

References and Further Reading

Love, Thomas T. John Courtney Murray: Contemporary Church-State Theory. New York: Doubleday, 1965.

- Murray, John Courtney. We Hold These Truths: Catholic Reflections on the American Proposition. New York: Sheed & Ward, 1960.
- , ed. Religious Liberty: An End and a Beginning. New York: Macmillan Co., 1966.
- , trans. “Dignitatis Humanae (The Declaration on Religious Freedom).” In The Documents of Vatican II. Walter M. Abbott and Joseph Gallagher, eds. New York: America Press, 1966, pp. 674–698.
- . Religious Liberty: Catholic Struggles With Pluralism. J. Leon Hooper, ed. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1993.
- . Bridging the Sacred and the Secular. J. Leon Hooper, ed. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University Press, 1994.
- Pelotte, Donald E. John Courtney Murray: Theologian in Conflict. New York: Paulist Press, 1975.

See also Catholics and Religious Liberty; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; First Amendment and PACs; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing

MUSEUMS AND EXPRESSION

The intersection among civil rights, museums, and expression usually focuses on the right of artists to make controversial works and museums to offer them to the public. The First Amendment protects all speech, with narrow exceptions. However, since aesthetic appreciation is often considered a luxury, the right to aesthetic expression is often given less First Amendment protection than the right to speak a political opinion. Outright censorship, though rare, has been practiced in America. While the prohibition against “obscenity” is very narrowly construed and almost never used, there are famous examples of artistic works being banned under the obscenity rules in America. Henry Miller’s books were banned in America for their strong sexual content, and William S. Burroughs’s book Naked Lunch was also prosecuted for obscenity. The issue of controversial books in public libraries is another recurrent theme in American politics.

The arts can also serve as a surrogate battlefield for broader political struggles. For example, during the French Terror, when expressing sympathy for the ancien regime was dangerous, the conservative critic Boutard did so obliquely by praising rococo art (associated with the old aristocracy) and condemning the neoclassical (associated with the revolutionaries). Even when not intentionally encoded, artistic and critical practice necessarily reflects and confronts the political issues of its time. For example, during the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) crisis of the late 1980s, the work of homosexual artists became the focal point of a broader crisis over the visibility of homosexuality in society. Earlier in the century, the critic Clement Greenberg’s history of modern painting bespoke a Marxist belief in historical dialectic, while Lionel Trilling’s belief that good literature could exist only in untroubled times was anti-Marxist. The critic Hilton Kramer’s insistence on objective standards in art reflects an exasperation with the egalitarianism of sixties counterculture.

Ironically, the low value placed on artistic expression can also insulate it from political threats. During the censorious political climate of the Terror, when artistic news was considered too frivolous for journalistic coverage and relegated to the margins of the journals, art critics were freer to speak their minds than other commentators. In America during the first half of the twentieth century, public anxiety about immigration and Communism led to an expansion of the “imminent threat” doctrine, which allowed prohibition of political speech that advocated the violent overthrow of the government. However, during the same period, artistic expression was relatively free.

The biggest threat to a robust public debate about matters of aesthetic experience is often not the government, but the vicissitudes of the marketplace. For example, radio stations around the country are controlled by a handful of operators with tested profit models, and therefore it is difficult for more sophisticated programmers to enter or survive in the market. Similarly, museums increasingly face the same problem, where more and more institutions subscribe to traveling “blockbuster” exhibitions that are curatorially unsophisticated. Therefore, when artists compete for a finite opportunity to be heard, the less complex and challenging will often prevail. While this is not necessarily a civil liberties issue, it is intrinsically tied up with the civil liberty of free enterprise. If one considers artistic quality to be a valuable public resource, then its lack of support would seem to constitute a market failure.

There has long been a power struggle between the art establishment and emerging artists and forms. This struggle goes all the way back to the first secular art institutions that arose in the sixteenth century, such as Cosimo de Medici’s Accademia delle Arte del Disegno in Florence (which opened in 1563) and Accademie Royale Le Peintre in Paris (which opened in 1648). The Accademie, with its public salons, had grown extremely powerful in French culture by the eighteenth century. Success at the salon was crucial for an artist’s career; however, the Accademie was stylistically conservative and unreceptive to new trends. Artists who felt they had been unjustly excluded from the salon created alternative exhibits. It was at these alternative exhibits that the most important new styles of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries were incubated, including neoclassicism, impressionism, and postimpressionism.

Meanwhile, the most successful “academics” of the same period, such as William Bouguereau, have been mostly forgotten. This power struggle between the art “establishment” and emerging artists and art institutions continues to this day. Venerable institutions such as the Museum of Modern Art soak up most of the resources and smaller venues, which take more risks on emerging forms and young artists, fight to stay alive.

The issue of public subsidies for art is a recurrent crisis in American society. It is a complex civil liberties issue. While the public cannot constitutionally prohibit an artist from expressing himself in a certain way, it is under no constitutional obligation to subsidize his expression. The question is whether, by discriminating based on viewpoint in giving out subsidies, the government is really “abridging” speech it does not like, in violation of the First Amendment, or simply encouraging speech it likes. This issue comes up whenever a community tries to exclude controversial books from the public library or controversial curricula from public universities or schools. It also comes up in the perennial debate over the NEA.

Similarly, when the government licenses broadcasting rights, it is free to regulate content without running afoul of the First Amendment. Through the FCC, the government prohibits nudity, sexual content and language in television and radio and has enforced “equal time” rules for political broadcasting.

The rights of free expression and private property often come into conflict. Mall owners consider it a taking when the government forces them to allow protesters inside their property; protestors argue that because American life increasingly takes place within privately owned structures, it is impossible for them to speak anywhere else. Shopkeepers and subway operators consider it a defacement of private property when graffiti artists use their walls as a canvas; the artists argue they have a right to express themselves artistically.

First Amendment issues also arise with regard to the ownership of speech. Creative expression is a form of property that can be bought and sold, and the owner of speech can prevent others from using it by copyright or trademark. Power struggles often occur over who has the right to certain speech. Artists and writers claim that they are forced into unfair contracts with dealers and publishers, who make much more money from their creative works than the artists do. Some artists also advocate for “moral rights”: the right not to have their work altered or defaced in a way that changes its political or stylistic meaning.

While the doctrine of moral rights is widely accepted in Europe, it has never been accepted in America.

CHRISTOPHER D. KING

References and Further Reading

- Bazin, Germain. The Museum Age. New York: Universe Books, 1967.
- Bolton, Richard. Culture Wars: Documents From the Recent Controversies in the Arts. New York: New University Press, 1992.
- Brenson, Michael. Visionaries and Outcasts: The NEA, Congress, and the Place of the Visual Artist in America. New York: New Press, 2001.
- Lorente, Jesus Pedro. Cathedrals of Urban Modernity. Brookfield, VT: Ashgate, 1998.
- Sherman, Daniel J., and Irit Rogot, eds. Museum Culture: History, Discourses, and Spectacle. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1984.

See also Broadcast Regulation; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History (1791–1917); Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Government Funding of Speech; Intellectual Property and First Amendment; Low Value Speech; National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 118 S. Ct 2168 (1998); Obscenity; Public Vulgarly and Free Speech

MUSLIMS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTIES

A commonly held belief in the United States is that serious violations of Muslim civil rights started after September 11, 2001. In fact, Muslims in this country have endured a long history of civil rights violations, especially with respect to their first freedom, the freedom of religion. The first wave lasted several hundred years and was perpetrated against African Muslims who were forcefully removed from their countries to America and enslaved. Many of them became subject to a policy of forced conversion, and some were able to generate support to regain their freedom in part by promising to go back and preach the Gospel in Africa. Those who returned tended to revert to their faith upon arrival. Those who remained behind often practiced their faith secretly.

The second wave of civil rights violations began in the 1990s, culminating in the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, which was passed after the bombing of a federal building in Oklahoma by Timothy McVeigh, who was associated with the Christian identity movement. The act, which applies to citizens and noncitizens, reintroduces guilt by association by making it a crime to provide any material support (except for medicine and religious material) to humanitarian and political activities of any group designated by the secretary of state as “terrorist”—a concept broadly defined to include virtually any use of force. Since the designation by the government is based on national security considerations (another broadly defined concept), the courts are reluctant to review it. To date, almost all of the entities designated as “terrorist” under this act are Muslim.

According to Robert Allison, author of The Crescent Obscured, Islam was viewed in the eighteenth century as a wicked religion which had fostered bad government and indolent people. Plays featured fictional Muslim spies or oppressed Muslim women. Today, Islam is viewed by prominent religious leaders, such as Revs. Pat Robertson, Jerry Falwell, and Franklin Graham, as promoting violence, not indolence. In one ingenious stroke, this shift effectively removes First Amendment protections from American Muslims. Muslims are now portrayed by various commentators as untrustworthy spies or members of “sleeper cells” of terror. Bearded men and veiled women are challenged daily in the workplace, in schools, and on the street. Employment discrimination is rising, so are hate crimes. Islamic centers and mosques are being vandalized and sometimes burned. Racial profiling has taken root, and some Muslims have been removed from airplanes due to suspicion based on their appearance. Modest women have been invasively searched at airports or forced to remove their head cover. Less fortunate Muslims have been physically assaulted, raped, or killed. Those who look like them, such as the Sikh, have gravely suffered the consequences of mistaken identification.

The events of September 11 ushered in a policy that has effectively induced reverse immigration by Muslims to their countries of origin through detentions, interrogations, and deportations. Around one thousand persons were detained soon after September 11, but their names and their exact number were not released. When some were ultimately charged, most of the charges turned out to be minor criminal and immigration charges. Fear spread in the Muslim community. In 2002, the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEER) was instituted, requiring males within a specific age bracket from predominantly Muslim countries to report to immigration services for registration. When they did, there were further mass arrests and deportations, again on minor immigration charges. Those detained were often treated poorly and, in at least one case, fed pork, a religiously prohibited food. Other Muslims began leaving this country instead of reporting.

The interaction between the act and immigration laws and practices has also contributed to an erosion of free speech and the free flow of information by denying visas to attend conferences and meetings to persons associated with groups designated as terrorist, even if these persons are not involved in violence. The denial of due process to the noncitizen alien remains the most salient feature of the act. The act gave the Department of Justice the power to use secret evidence in the deportation of noncitizens, even if unconstitutionally obtained, but required the government to provide the noncitizen a summary of that evidence. The summary arrangement has many shortcomings, not the least of which is the problem of cross-examination.

The act also has a provision requiring banks to freeze assets of designated organizations and their agents. It was used repeatedly prior to September 11. But the freezing of the assets of Islamic charities subsequent to September 11 cast a deep chill over charitable giving among Muslims, even to their families abroad. In light of the fact that charitable giving (zakat) is one of the five pillars of Islam, the present situation has placed undue burden on Muslims in the free exercise of their religion. Guidelines issued by the government to alleviate this problem are ineffective because of the broad disclaimer at their conclusion. Today, a Muslim who wants to give zakat safely to a Muslim child for humanitarian aid is advised to do so through an American non-Muslim charitable organization.

After September 11, 2001, the USA PATRIOT Act was hastily passed in Congress. Its enhanced surveillance provisions have caused great concern. It permits significant delay in the notice of execution of search and seizure, severely limits habeas corpus petitions, and does not require agents to demonstrate “probable cause” to believe that a person is engaged in terrorist activity. After its passage, law enforcement in northern Virginia raided many homes, a school, and places of business owned by Muslims. Those present were interrogated and restricted in their movement for hours. Computers and other items were confiscated, but no charges have been made so far. Many women subjected to these searches have received trauma counseling.

Under the USA PATRIOT Act, law enforcement has also acquired authority to search library and bookstore records relating to citizens as well as non-citizens, as well as to issue a gag order on the owner not to reveal these searches. Most recently, the Clear Law Enforcement for Criminal Alien Removal (CLEAR) Act has been proposed; this gives local police the authority to enforce civil immigration laws or risk losing federal funding. If passed, this act would have an adverse impact on Muslim women in particular, who would then refrain from reporting domestic violence for fear of deportation. More importantly, two events that took place in December 2004 raise the concern of American Muslims about their civil liberties to a new level. They are the Intelligence Reform Bill, signed into law by President Bush in December 2004 and the results of a Cornell University poll indicating that 44 percent of all Americans are in favor of curtailing the civil rights of American Muslims.

AZIZAH Y. AL-HIBRI

References and Further Reading

- Akram, Susan M., and Kevin R. Johnson, Migration Regulation Goes Local: The Role of States in U.S. Immigration Policy: Race, Rights and Immigration Law After September 11, 2001: The Targeting of Arabs and Muslims, N.Y.U. Annual Survey of American Law 58 (2002): 295.
- Alexander, Scott, Inalienable Rights? Muslims in the U.S. Since September 11th, Journal of Islamic Law and Culture 7 (Spring/Summer 2002): 103.
- Al-Hibri, Azizah Y., Islamic and American Constitutional Law: Borrowing Possibilities or a History of Borrowing? University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law 1 (1999): 492 (describes a hostile climate towards Islam in eighteenth-century America).
- Allison, Robert. The Crescent Obscured. 1995.
- Austin, Allan D. African Muslims in Antebellum America. 1997.
- Chang, Nancy et al. Silencing Political Dissent: How Post-September 11 Anti-Terrorism Measures Threaten Our Civil Liberties. 2002.
- Cole, David. Enemy Aliens. 2003.
- , The New McCarthyism: Repeating History in the War on Terrorism, Harvard C.R.-C.L.L.Review 38 (2003): 1.
- , et al. Terrorism and the Constitution: Sacrificing Civil Liberties in the Name of National Security. 2002.
- Council for American-Islamic Relations, www.cair-net.org (detailed up-to-date information on discrimination against Muslims).
- Diouf, Sylvia A. Servants of Allah: American Muslims Enslaved in the Americas. 1998.
- District of Columbia, Maryland, and Virginia Advisory Committees to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, "Civil Rights Concerns in the Metropolitan Washington, D.C., Area in the Aftermath of the September 11, 2001, Tragedies." <http://www.usccr.gov/pubs/sac/dc0603/main.htm>.
- KARAMAH: Muslim Women Lawyers for Human Rights, "Liberty, Security, and the Constitution: A Town Hall Meeting for the Muslim Community," www.karamah.org/news_town_hall_meeting.htm (discusses the raids in Northern Virginia).
- Muslim Public Affair Council, A Review of U.S. Counterterrorism Policy: American Muslim Critique and Recommendations, http://mpac.org/home_article_display.aspx?ITEM=600.
- Shaheen, Jack G. Reel Bad Arabs: How Hollywood Vilifies a People. 2000.
- Weikel, Dan. "INS Judge Frees Iraqi Dissident Held for 4 Years." Los Angeles Times, August 19, 2000, B1, B5.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Al-Najjar v. Ashcroft*, 273 F.3d 1330 (11th Cir 2001)
- American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Comm v. Reno*, 70 F. 3d 1045 (9th Cir. 1995), 119 F. 3d 1367 (9th Cir. 1997)
- Kiareldeen v. Reno*, 71 F. Supp.2d 402 (D.N.J. 1999)
- Matter of Ahmed*, No. A90-674-228, slip op. At 20 (U.S. Immigration Ctr. May 5, 1997)
- Rafeddie v. INS*, 880 F.2d 506 (D.C. Cir. 1989)

MUTUAL FILM CORPORATION v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF OHIO, 236 U.S. 230 (1915)

In 1913, Ohio established a board of censors for motion pictures under the auspices of the state's Industrial Commission. Mutual Film Corporation, after a state court refused its request for an interlocutory injunction to stop the law's implementation, appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. A unanimous Court affirmed the lower court's decision.

Mutual Film Corporation operated a motion picture exchange, leasing or selling annually roughly five thousand prints of films to exhibitors in Ohio and Michigan. The prints could not be exhibited in Ohio without the censor board's approval and all the films were reviewed at the corporation's expense. The Supreme Court dismissed Mutual Film's contentions that Ohio's law impeded interstate commerce, violated freedom of speech and publication under Ohio's constitution, and delegated legislative power to the board of censors.

In this decision the Supreme Court upheld the authority of an administrative body to develop rules and standards to implement general laws intended to deter the public distribution or exhibition of indecent or immoral motion pictures. This posture was consistent with the Comstock Act and the power it gave U.S. postal officials to declare material obscene and thus unmailable. Of more importance, the Court ruled the censorship statute did not violate Ohio's Constitution; motion pictures did not warrant the same protections of free speech and publication guaranteed by the Constitution.

The "power of amusement," the Court concluded, could make motion pictures "more insidious in corruption by a pretense of worthy purpose . . . a prurient interest may be excited and appealed to. Besides, there are some things which should not have pictorial representation in public places and to all audiences." The Court thus dismissed the notion that freedom of speech, writing, or publication under Ohio's Constitution included motion pictures. Motion pictures

“may be mediums of thought,” the Court conceded, but then “so are many things.” To accept the appellant’s argument would mean “the theater, the circus, and all other shows and spectacles” would be brought “by like reasoning under the same immunity from repression of supervision of the public press.”

Justice McKenna, the opinion author, concluded:

The exhibition of moving pictures is a business, pure and simple, originated and conducted for profit, like other spectacles, not to be regarded, nor intended to be regarded by the Ohio Constitution, we think, as part of the press of the country, or as organs of public opinion. They are mere representations of events, of ideas and sentiments published and known; vivid, useful, and entertaining, no doubt, but, as we have said, capable of evil, having power for it, the greater because of their attractiveness and manner of exhibition.

In Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952), which involved the licensing authority of the state of New York to suppress motion pictures deemed obscene or immoral, the Supreme Court declared that motion pictures were protected by the guaranty of the First Amendment, stating “To the extent that language in Mutual Film Corp v. Industrial Comm[ission] . . . is out of harmony with the views here set forth, we no longer adhere to it.”

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.

Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook With Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952)

Mutual Film Corp. v. Industrial Commission of Ohio, 236 U.S. 230 (1915)

N

NAACP v. ALABAMA EX REL. PATTERSON, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)

Although the text of the First Amendment makes no mention of association or affiliation, the Supreme Court's recognition of freedom of association as an implicitly protected expressive interest was hardly surprising. The only surprises were the unanimity of such recognition, and the fact that it did not occur until 1958. The opportunity arose from Alabama's insistence that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), as a condition of doing business in the state, submit a list of the names and addresses of its Alabama members. Association officials readily complied with all other conditions imposed on an out-of-state entity, but refused to provide such a roster because such a disclosure would abridge important interests of its members. The Alabama courts rejected that argument, and the Supreme Court agreed to review the case.

Standing to raise such a constitutional claim was a potentially serious impediment. The NAACP has sought standing both in its own right and as representative of the interests of its members. The Supreme Court strongly favored the latter rationale, ruling that the Association "argues more properly the rights of its members." Turning quickly to the merits, Justice Harlan seemed untroubled by the novelty of the constitutional claim, noting that "effective advocacy of both public and private points of view, particularly controversial ones, is undeniably enhanced by group association," citing much earlier cases based on the explicit First Amendment guarantee of freedom to assemble. Such a nexus between free speech and the right to associate existed "whether the beliefs sought to be advanced ... pertain to political, economic, religious or cultural matters." This newly defined liberty clearly applied here, since "compelled disclosure of affiliation with groups engaged in advocacy may constitute as effective a restraint on freedom of association" as the blunter sanctions invalidated elsewhere.

Three critical issues remained. Alabama insisted that its demand for membership lists was not aimed at expression, and that if any chilling resulted, the cause was "private community pressure" and not governmental action. The Court rejected both claims, noting that government acts may abridge speech, "even though unintended" or even when the challenged action "may appear to be totally unrelated to protected liberties." Moreover, even though the reprisals that Alabama NAACP members most feared were indeed mainly private, "the interplay of governmental and private action" warranted intervention here. Finally, none of the asserted state interests justified such an intrusive demand, especially of an organization that had fully complied with every other request.

Such easy and unequivocal recognition that the First Amendment included a freedom of association has contributed in at least two distinct ways to later constitutional development. For one, the NAACP case legitimized the process of implication, of finding expressive interests that were not specifically enumerated in the Bill of Rights. So, a decade later, the Supreme Court would confer protection on symbolic or nonverbal communication, finding no need to apologize for extending First Amendment guarantees well beyond the printed and spoken word. And when the justices were ready, another decade hence, to grant partial protection to commercial speech—despite an earlier categorical insistence that mere advertising had no place in the First Amendment—the recognition of freedom of association must again have lent comfort to the expansive process.

The more immediate impact of the NAACP ruling has also been profound, especially in the political realm. Barely two years had passed before the Court—now sharply divided—built on NAACP as the basis for recognizing anonymity as a protected expressive interest, a position the Court would reaffirm periodically thereafter. And while sustaining in the mid-1970s the post-Watergate campaign reform measures in Buckley v. Valeo (1976), the Court cautioned that the generally valid reporting and disclosure requirements could pose freedom-of-association problems for minor political parties.

The justices have also drawn from NAACP an expressive right not to be compelled to associate, in contexts such as holiday parades and social organizations—although importantly qualified by compelling governmental interests in equality of access. Most recently, the Court ruled that states may not mandate a single “open” or “blanket” primary in which all candidates and voters must participate. Relying directly on the NAACP decision, some forty-two years later, the Court declared that “representative democracy is unimaginable without the ability of citizens to band together in promoting ... the candidates who espouse their political views.” Any lingering doubts about the durability and vitality of freedom of association should thus have been allayed.

ROBERT M. O'NEIL

References and Further Reading

- Boy Scouts of America v. Dale*, 530 U.S. 640 (2000).
California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567 (2000).
 Emerson, Thomas I., Freedom of Association and Freedom of Expression, Yale Law Journal 74 (1964): 1.
Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557 (1995).
 Issacharoff, Samuel, Private Parties with Public Purposes: Political Parties, Associational Freedoms, and Partisan Competition, Columbia Law Review 101 (2001): 274.
Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60 (1960).
Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969).
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748 (1976).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Buckley v. Valeo*, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)

NAACP v. BUTTON, 371 U.S. 415 (1963)

For many years the Virginia branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) had supported litigation designed to end racial segregation in the public schools. In 1956, the General Assembly tightened a longstanding ban against the solicitation of legal business, by expressly forbidding any organization to retain a lawyer in connection with litigation to which it was not a party and in which it had no pecuniary interest. The Virginia courts sustained this amendment as applied to the NAACP, despite the organization's plea that its litigation program was not covered by the law and, if it were covered, any sanctions would abridge freedoms of expression. The Supreme Court, by a six-to-three vote, struck down the law on First Amendment grounds.

The core of Justice Brennan's opinion in the NAACP's favor was recognition that in this context, “litigation is not a technique of resolving private differences [but] is a means for [achieving] equality of treatment [for] the members of the Negro [community]” and deserves recognition as “a form of political expression.” Building on the Court's recent recognition of freedom of association as a right implicit in the First Amendment, Justice Brennan now declared that association “for litigation may be the most effective form of political association” and thus claimed a full measure of constitutional protection, especially in the context of the NAACP's school desegregation program in Virginia.

Recognizing that a compelling interest might justify such a constraint, the Commonwealth argued that the need to sustain high standards in the legal profession validated regulating all forms of “solicitation” of legal business. The Supreme Court majority rejected that claim, conceding the importance of ethical norms for lawyers, but finding the NAACP practices targeted by the new law a far cry from such clearly regulable transgressions as fomenting litigation or deception of prospective clients. Where only public interest litigation was involved, such concerns vanished.

Justices Harlan, Clark, and Stewart dissented, insisting that freedom of association had been stretched too far if it prevented a state from imposing high ethical standards on its attorneys. In their view, the amended Virginia law did “no more than prohibit [the NAACP from] soliciting legal business for its staff attorneys”—and that was an activity which they believed could be regulated consistent with the First Amendment.

The applications of NAACP v. Button have been legion and important. Recognition of litigation as a protected form of expression was to have profound consequences. Its reach would extend well beyond the uniquely appealing civil rights context that had spawned the doctrine, and to which some observers believed it would be confined. The very next term, the Court struck down Virginia's attempt to forbid a railroad workers' union from informing injured workers, or the survivors of workers killed on the job, of the availability of legal representation by an attorney recommended by the union. As in Button, such a program could not constitutionally be banned as "solicitation" without abridging the union members' First Amendment rights. While the public interest element may have been less immediate in the union program than it had been with the NAACP, the two cases seemed to the majority indistinguishable. Two dissenters insisted that the programs were quite different, and the majority's analogy therefore flawed.

Fifteen years later, the Court would invalidate South Carolina's reprimand of an American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) lawyer who had written to a recently sterilized woman advising her of the ACLU's willingness to represent her in a suit challenging a program to sterilize pregnant mothers as a condition of Medicare eligibility. Applying Button, the Court ruled that the state failed to show that compelling interests in regulating attorney conduct and ensuring integrity justified such a sanction in the public interest setting.

On the same day, however, the justices drew an important distinction by sustaining Ohio's ban on "ambulance chasing" by lawyers—the practice of giving unsolicited advice regarding legal options to a potential client, and then accepting that client's business on the basis of such advice. Nothing in Button, said the Court, immunized such practices from high ethical standards imposed on the legal profession. And in the mid-1980s, the Court extended that exception by sustaining a $10 limit on the fee that could be charged by an attorney or agent representing a veteran who sought Veterans Administration benefits for a service-related disability. Distinguishing the railway union case, the majority noted that in the earlier case, "the First Amendment interest [was] primarily the right to associate collectively for the common good."

ROBERT M. O'NEIL

References and Further Reading

- Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia State Bar*, 377 U.S. 1 (1964).
 Camisa, V., The Constitutional Right to Solicit Potential Class Members in a Class Action, Gonzaga Law Review 25 (1990): 95.
 Epstein, L., Interest Group Litigation During the Rehnquist Court Era, Journal of Law & Politics 9 (1993): 639.

In re Primus, 436 U.S. 412 (1978).

Kalven, Harry, Jr. The Negro and the First Amendment. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1965.

Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Association, 436 U.S. 447 (1978).

Simon, Roy D., Jr., Fee Sharing Between Lawyers and Public Interest Groups, Yale Law Journal 98 (1989): 1069.

Stoffregen, E., Client Solicitation and the First Amendment, Journal of the Legal Profession 19 (1994): 351.

Stone, Roger A., The Mass Plaintiff: Public Interest Law, Direct Mail Fundraising and the Donor/Client, Columbia Journal of Law & Social Problems 25 (1992): 197.

Walters v. National Association of Radiation Survivors, 473 U.S. 305 (1985).

NAIM v. NAIM, 875 E. 2ND 749 (VA. 1955); 350 U.S. 891 (1955); 350 U.S. 985 (1956)

"Miscegenation" or "antimiscegenation" laws prohibit marriages between persons of different races. More than a decade before the U.S. Supreme Court held them unconstitutional in Loving v. Virginia (1967), the Court confronted a challenge to Virginia's antimiscegenation law in Naim v. Naim (Va. 1955), vacated and remanded (1955), affirmed (Va. 1956) (per curiam), and appeal dismissed (1956) (per curiam).

Naim arose because the laws of the Commonwealth of Virginia made it unlawful for white persons to marry nonwhite persons. Therefore, to get married, Ruby Elaine, a woman described as white, and Han Say, a man described as Chinese, traveled from Virginia to North Carolina, which had no such law. Some time after the Naims returned to Norfolk, Virginia to live as husband and wife, Ruby Naim decided she wanted out of her marriage to Han Naim. Rather than file for divorce, Ruby sued in Virginia state court to have her marriage to Han annulled on the grounds that their races rendered them ineligible to marry in the first place.

Han defended on the ground that Virginia's miscegenation law violated the due process clause and equal protection clause of the U.S. Constitution and so could not be relied upon in the annulment suit. The Virginia courts rejected his argument, instead concluding that the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution reserves to the states the authority to regulate marriage. In its first judgment in Naim, the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals relied on an almost unbroken string of lower court cases upholding antimiscegenation laws, including the 1883 U.S. Supreme Court decision in Pace v. Alabama, which rejected an equal protection challenge to a state law punishing interracial fornication and adultery more harshly than intraracial fornication and adultery; and dicta in Supreme Court cases on racial segregation such as denies the power of the State to regulate the marriage relation so that it shall not have a mongrel breed of citizens. We find there no requirement that the State shall not legislate to prevent the obliteration of racial pride, but must permit the corruption of blood even though it weaken or destroy the quality of its citizenship.

Plessy v. Ferguson (1896). Noting that more than half the states prohibited interracial marriage, the Virginia Court concluded that nothing in the Constitution

Han then appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which had mandatory jurisdiction over the suit. (Later in the twentieth century, Congress provided that the Supreme Court had discretion to choose whether to hear almost all appeals.) The case came before the Court in November 1955, less than a year and a half after the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954). Unless the Court were to dismiss the appeal as not presenting a substantial federal question, it would have to decide the highly volatile issue of the constitutionality of antisegregation laws. This was at a time when its desegregation decisions were still subject to "massive resistance" throughout the South, and many segregationists were rallying opposition to school integration on the ground that it would lead to interracial relationships and "race mixing" or "amalgamation."

Several justices were inclined to hear the Naim case on the merits. Yet when they met in private to discuss it, Justice Frankfurter exhorted the Court not to take the case. Recognizing the straightforward legal argument supporting the assertion of jurisdiction, his prepared statement argued that it was outweighed by "moral considerations . . . , those raised by the bearing of adjudicating this question to the Court's responsibility in not thwarting or seriously handicapping the enforcement of its decision in the segregation cases." Frankfurter believed that the Court's rendering a decision on the merits would "very seriously embarrass the carrying-out of the Court's decree" in Brown and its companion cases. Justice Clark was persuaded and, with Frankfurter's input, drafted an opinion asserting that a supposed lack of clarity of the record about the Naims' citizenship precluded the Court from addressing the issue "'in clean-cut and concrete form.'" The opinion, ultimately issued per curiam without dissent after Chief Justice Earl Warren abandoned his planned dissent, went on to vacate the judgment of the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals and remanded the case so that court could send it back to the trial court "for action not inconsistent with this opinion."

The Supreme Court's legal extemporizing was arcane but unsatisfactory, both to academic critics and to the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals. The latter insisted that the record was indeed adequate for resolving the constitutional issues presented, noted there was nothing in state law authorizing reexamination by the trial court, and reaffirmed its judgment. When Naim then returned to Supreme Court, requesting either modification of its earlier mandate or scheduling of his case for full argument, the Court dismissed the appeal. Its short per curiam order claimed fairly disingenuously that the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals' second decision left the case without "a properly presented federal question."

Naim v. Naim thus deferred Supreme Court consideration of the constitutionality of antisegregation laws until Loving v. Virginia. In the intervening twelve years, the number of states with such laws dropped from twenty-nine to sixteen, signaling to the Court that it would not be thwarting a national majority if it invalidated antisegregation laws. The president and Congress had weighed in against racial segregation in a variety of contexts, signaling that the Court would not stand alone among the branches of the federal government. The Court did not feel as under threat in 1967 as it did the year after Brown. Even world opinion in the form of a U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) report had strongly condemned racism, and the Court noted this at oral argument in Loving. Naim thus stands today only as a testament to the power of prudential concerns in Supreme Court decision making and to the rather limited extent to which the Court has historically led the country rather than followed it in the face of true majoritarian opposition.

DAVID B. CRUZ

References and Further Reading

- Bickel, Alexander. The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1962.
- Hutchinson, Dennis J., Unanimity and Desegregation: Decisionmaking in the Supreme Court, 1948-1958, Georgetown Law Journal 68(1979): 1:62-6, 95-6.
- Schwartz, Bernard. Super Chief: Earl Warren and His Supreme Court—A Judicial Biography. New York: New York University Press, 1983.
- Spindelman, Marc S., Reorienting Bowers v. Hardwick, North Carolina Law Review 79 (2001): 359.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Board of Education*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Loving v. Virginia*, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)
- Pace v. Alabama*, 106 U.S. 583 (1883)
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)

See also Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954); Due Process; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)

NAPUE v. ILLINOIS, 360 U.S. 264 (1959)

In Napue, the Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause bars prosecutors from knowingly presenting false testimony and obligates them to correct such testimony when it occurs.

The prosecution alleged that Napue participated in a robbery that resulted in the death of a police officer. At Napue's murder trial, the prosecution's star witness was Hamer, one of the other robbers, who had already been convicted and sentenced to 199 years in prison. The prosecutor recommended a reduction in Hamer's sentence in exchange for his testimony against Napue, but Hamer falsely testified at Napue's trial that the prosecutor had made no such promises. After Napue was convicted, he discovered that the prosecutor had promised to help Hamer, but the state courts refused to grant Napue a new trial.

Napue appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which unanimously and emphatically reversed. The Court stressed that a defendant's due process rights are violated both when a prosecutor knowingly presents false testimony and when he knowingly fails to correct such perjury. The Court also held that the same rule applies even when the false testimony concerns only the witness's credibility, since "a lie is a lie, no matter what its subject." The emphasis in Napue, and in Alcorta v. Texas (1957), on the prosecutor's duty to present the truth paved the way for the Court's later cases, such as Brady v. Maryland (1963) and Kyles v. Whitley (1995), requiring the prosecution to disclose evidence favorable to the defendant.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Imwinkelried, Edwin, and Norman Garland. Exculpatory Evidence. 2nd ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie, 1996.
Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Alcorta v. Texas, 355 U.S. 28 (1957)
Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963)
Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 49 (1995)

See also Alcorta v. Texas, 355 U.S. 28 (1957); Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment; Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995)

NARDONE v. UNITED STATES, 308 U.S. 338 (1939)

In a previous decision in the same case, the U.S. Supreme Court decided that evidence taken in violation of Section 605 of the Communications Act of 1934 could not be used as a "vital part of the prosecution's proof" to help secure a conviction for frauds on revenue. After a new trial, the accused attempted to discover to what extent the illegal evidence had been used. The Court looked broadly at the question at hand: whether or not evidence improperly taken under Section 605 of the Communications Act of 1934 precludes any use of the evidence by the prosecution.

In resolving the question, the Court sought to balance the apparent disharmonious goals of the stern enforcement of criminal law, and the protection of privacy guaranteed by the Constitution and other laws. The Court explained that in order to properly balance these goals, meaning must be given to statutory language, even if not explicitly stated, so as to effectuate the policy behind the law. The Court held that where evidence is taken in violation of the law, any use by the prosecution should be forbidden; otherwise, the Court would "invite the very methods deemed inconsistent with ethical standards and destructive of personal liberty." The Court found that the accused carries the initial burden of proving that the evidence was unlawfully employed and that the use provided a substantial portion of the case against the accused. The government would then have the opportunity to show that its use had an independent origin.

DAVID M. CARR

References and Further Reading

Charles, D.M. "Informing FDR: FBI Political Surveillance and the Isolationist-Interventionist Foreign Policy Debate, 1939-1945." Diplomatic History 24, no. 2 (2000): 211-32.
Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298 (1921).
Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920).

See also Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; Exclusionary Rule

NATIONAL ABORTION RIGHTS ACTION LEAGUE (NARAL)

This is the longest-running formal organization in the United States framed specifically with reference to abortion policy. It was originally formed in 1969 as the National Association for Repeal of Abortion Laws by Illinois physician Caroline Rulon "Lonny" Myers, head of the first U.S. organization for repeal of the national abortion laws, the Illinois Citizens for the Medical Control of Abortion (ICMCA), and New York Democratic activist Lawrence (Larry) Lader. They had become acquainted through the Association for the Study of Abortion (ASA). NARAL was born at a national conference sponsored by the ASA in 1969 to consider the question of abortion law repeal. The conference itself responded to recent events, including the Supreme Court decision of Griswold vs. Connecticut (1965), which enshrined a “right to privacy” for married couples in contraceptive decision making, the constitutional basis of which appealed to some lawyers as a basis for abortion law repeal. Similarly, certain states, including New York, were then considering model legislation to repeal the state-by-state abortion prohibitions. NARAL’s first steering committee included physicians such as Bernard Nathanson and Lonny Myers; political and pro-choice activists Larry Lader, Ruth Proskauer Smith, and Ruth Cusack; New York politician Percy Sutton; philanthropist Stewart Mott; and the first president of the National Organization for Women, Betty Friedan. From 1968 to 1973, NARAL focused both on getting repeal legislation passed through numerous legislatures but also in setting up the conditions for test cases challenging existing abortion prohibitions. These actions included working with Dr. Alan Guttmacher and Roy Lucas, chair of NARAL’s Legal Committee, to get legal abortion clinics set up in New York and other states. In these litigation efforts, it worked mainly with the American Civil Liberties Union. Ultimately, NARAL became the central national umbrella lobby group for abortion rights.

Some have noted that NARAL in its first iteration worked frame its existence based on women’s rights and their need to have control over their reproductive lives. This contrasts with the early “population control” ethos of other parts of the contraception/abortion rights movement such as Planned Parenthood. On the other hand, at a certain point even the women’s rights frame did not go far enough for some activists such as Lucinda Cisler who wished to see NARAL also advocate for taking control of abortion out of physicians’ hands.

While NARAL was active in creating the conditions for and ensuring litigation of state abortion prohibitions, it was not active in the Texas case that ultimately brought about the Supreme Court’s Roe v. Wade (1973) ruling. It was thus in a somewhat reactive mode when the sweeping decision was announced. The association kept the same acronym but changed its name to the National Abortion Rights Action League, reflecting an emphasis on keeping abortion legal. One of NARAL’s early strategic foci from 1973 onward, working with Planned Parenthood, was to work to make and keep abortion procedures accessible to all, including ensuring that trained physicians performed the surgery at reasonable fees. It also worked with Planned Parenthood to teach interested clinic operators how to set up safe, efficient clinics such as those in New York that had been legalized in 1971. In 1973, NARAL set up a lobbying office in Washington to convey its presence and be able to respond instantly to congressional actions.

By the mid-1970s, it was clear that anti-abortion forces were going to use both state and national staging grounds to try to change the effects of Roe. In 1975, NARAL moved its head office from New York to Washington, D.C., and in 1977 created a political action committee to contribute to campaigns. NARAL became involved in working to get Congress to defeat the Hyde Amendment of 1976 (prior to which one-third of all abortions in the United States were under Medicaid, that is, publicly funded). The strategy was to try to retain pro-choice support in Congress by showing how a “divide and conquer” strategy would lead to the situation where abortion was a constitutional right, but in practical terms not equally available to all. By the mid-1970s, NARAL was working to institutionalize itself as a leader in the pro-choice movement. In addition to establishing a political action committee (PAC), it began a highly successful direct-mail strategy to increase its membership and to strengthen its base in the states.

NARAL kept much of the same thematic emphasis throughout the 1980s, working to keep abortion rights in the public eye as an urgent issue that could be severely curtailed by one congressional vote or Court decision. To this end, it became involved in trying to retain congressional pro-choice support and to “wake up” the U.S. public as to the potential harm to be wrought to Roe when the Supreme Court announced it would hear a challenge to the Missouri statutes. In advance of the Webster decision of 1989 (Webster v. Reproductive Health Services), NARAL had a press conference on the day that the Supreme Court announced its intent to grant review to the Missouri case and announced “a campaign to get one million Americans to sign a pledge to work to support Roe.” By this point, indeed by the mid-1980s, NARAL was able to play a central role in coordinating the national pro-choice coalition. At the same time, outside of the highly publicized national events, NARAL was also working in carefully targeted areas to undo anti-abortion lobbying successes, primarily at state and city levels.

Most recently, reflecting a desire to broaden its presence in various areas of reproductive policy, NARAL changed its name in 2003 to “NARAL Pro-Choice America.” It recently hired a new president after the long tenure of activist Kate Michelman. The new president, Nancy Keenan, was a former Montana state legislator and superintendent of Education. As she said on the NARAL website, “I am excited to build the strength of our powerful grassroots presence across the country.” It was clear that the new president brought a strong knowledge of state political processes to her appointment. Similarly, according to its website, as of this writing, NARAL counted “nearly 400,000 members and supporters nationwide,” making it both the largest pro-choice organization in the United States but also one of the largest feminist organizations as well.

MELISSA HAUSSMAN

References and Further Reading

- Garrow, David. Liberty and Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade. New York: Macmillan, 1994.
- Gerber Fried, Marlene, ed. From Abortion to Reproductive Freedom: Transforming a Movement. Boston: South End Press, 1990.
- Hausman, Melissa. Abortion Politics in North America. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2005.
- Staggenborg, Suzanne. The Pro-Choice Movement: Organization and Activism in the Abortion Conflict. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Tribe, Laurence H. Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes. New York: W.W. Norton & Co., 1992.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Webster v. Reproductive Health Services*, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE (NAACP)

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)—originally named the National Negro Committee—was founded in 1909 by a multiracial and multicultural group of civil and political activists as an effort of the so-called Niagara Movement. The NAACP was principally founded by Ida Wells-Barnett, W.E.B. DuBois, Henry Moscowitz, Mary White Ovington, Oswald Garrison Villiard, and William English Walling in response to bigotry and racial hatred in the United States epitomized by the significant number of lynchings during that era, particularly in the southern states. The NAACP’s mission statement seeks to “ensure political, educational, social and economic equality of rights of all persons and to eliminate racial hatred and racial discrimination.” Accordingly, its vision involves “a society in which all individuals have equal rights and there is no racial hatred or racial discrimination.” To popularize and publicize its actions, the NAACP publishes The Crisis, a national magazine, and the NAACP’s official organ. As found in the NAACP’s constitution, the principal objectives of the Association are:

- To ensure the political, educational, social and economic equality of all citizens
- To achieve equality of rights and eliminate race prejudice among the citizens of the United States
- To remove all barriers of racial discrimination through democratic processes
- To seek enactment and enforcement of federal, state and local laws securing civil rights
- To inform the public of the adverse effects of racial discrimination and to seek its elimination
- To educate persons as to their constitutional rights and to take all lawful action to secure the exercise thereof, and to take any other lawful action in furtherance of these objectives, consistent with the NAACP’s Articles of Incorporation and this Constitution

For nearly a hundred years, the NAACP—through its leaders and supporters alike—has been a leader in civil rights advocacy. The NAACP is the nation’s oldest civil rights organization.

After thirty years of sustained effort fighting for equality, the NAACP established the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, Inc. (LDF) in 1939 to carry out the organization’s tax-exempt activities, particularly high-profile and high-impact legal cases. Its focus ranged from school desegregation (for example, in South Carolina in 1930, the state spent ten times more on white children than on black children), pay and employment inequity (federal, state, and private), housing disparity; state and federal public works spending inequalities, and inadequate and segregated transportation and public accommodations, to voting disenfranchisement. Thurgood Marshall served as the director-counsel of the LDF from 1939 to 1961 when he was appointed to serve as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit by President John F. Kennedy. Of course, the LDF’s legacy in the courtroom culminated in the victory before the U.S. Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education (Brown I) (1954) (ruling that segregation in public schools was unconstitutional). While the NAACP itself used the public at large (through sit-ins, marches, and economic boycotts), the streets, and the ballot box to gain civil rights, the LDF used the courts to reach its goals of equality. The LDF was completely divorced from the NAACP in the mid-1960s.

Throughout its history, NAACP leaders have held the attention and support of U.S. presidents and first ladies—for example, when World War II began in 1941, Eleanor Roosevelt assisted in convincing President Franklin D. Roosevelt to end discrimination in war-related industries and federal employment (after leaving the White House, Eleanor Roosevelt joined the NAACP's board of directors, and later chaired its life membership campaign and served as vice president of the LDF).

After Brown II (1955), a number of southern states began a deliberate campaign against the NAACP by attempting to curb its ability to operate within their borders. For example, the Alabama state legislature ordered NAACP leaders to disclose membership lists. The U.S. Supreme Court unanimously held that a lower court's order finding the NAACP in contempt for failure to disclose its membership would have a deterrent effect on the right of association under the First Amendment (NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson [1958]). From 1959 through the mid-1960s, the NAACP had to wage courtroom battles (most of which were ultimately decided by the U.S. Supreme Court) against legislation passed in several states for similar invidious purposes (including inciting lawsuits under the principle of barratry)—perhaps most notably in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, Texas, and Virginia.

In addition, during the post-Brown era as a direct testament to the NAACP's fight for equality, between 1954 and 1962 state legislatures responded positively: thirteen states adopted enforceable fair employment practices acts, ten states adopted public accommodation statutes, and five states adopted fair housing laws that applied to private housing. Notably, in 1955, NAACP member Rosa Parks was arrested and fined for refusing to give up her seat on a segregated bus in Montgomery, Alabama—this event is often noted as the catalyst for the largest grassroots civil rights movement in the United States.

The NAACP's legacy of voting rights extended through the 1980s (in 1982 alone, NAACP workers registered 850,000 new voters), through the 1990s (in opposition to David Duke, an avowed racist seeking election to the U.S. Senate, 76 percent of all registered African Americans in Louisiana voted), and into the new millennium (in January 2000, the largest civil rights demonstration ever held in the South occurred in South Carolina in opposition to the official flying of "Old Glory"—the Confederate Battle Flag; and for the 2000 presidential election, the NAACP facilitated the largest turnout of African American voters in over twenty years).

In keeping with its history of advocacy and opposition to U.S. Supreme Court nominees who do not promote the NAACP's vision of equality and justice for all (which the organization began in 1930 against nominee John Parker), in 1991, the NAACP opposed President George H.W. Bush's nomination of Judge Clarence Thomas to the U.S. Supreme Court to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Justice Thurgood Marshall.

By 2004, the NAACP had more than 500,000 members, and operated through more than 2,200 branches, including youth and college divisions.

CYNTHIA G. HAWKINS-LEÓN

References and Further Reading

- Countryman, Vern. Discrimination and the Law. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963.
- Davis, Abraham L., and Barbara Luck Graham. The Supreme Court, Race and Civil Rights. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 1995.
- Delaney, David. Race, Place, and the Law, 1836–1948. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1998.
- Gillette, Michael L. "National Association for the Advancement of Colored People." In Handbook of Texas Online, 2001. <http://www.tsha.utexas.edu/handbook/online/articles/view/NN/ven1.html>.
- McCord, John H., ed. With All Deliberate Speed: Civil Rights Theory and Reality. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1969.
- McKay, Robert. Nine for Equality Under Law: Civil Rights Litigation. New York: Ford Foundation, 1977.
- National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Website, 2005. <http://www.naacp.org>.
- Roosevelt, Eleanor. "National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)." The Eleanor Roosevelt Papers. In Teaching Eleanor Roosevelt, edited by Allida Black, June Hopkins, et al. Hyde Park, NY: Eleanor Roosevelt National Historic Site, 2003. <http://www.nps.gov/elro/glossary/naacp.htm>.
- Ward, Etta. National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), 2005. <http://www.learningto-give.org/papers/index.asp?bpid=183>.
- Watson, Denton L. Lion in the Lobby: Clarence Mitchell, Jr.'s Struggle for the Passage of Civil Rights Laws. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2002.
- Williams, Juan. Eyes on the Prize: America's Civil Rights Years, 1954–1965. New York: Viking Penguin, 1987.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Board of Education (Brown I)*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Brown v. Board of Education (Brown II)*, 349 U.S. 294 (1955)
- NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson*, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
- See also Freedom of Association; NAACP v. Alabama Ex Rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958); NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963)

NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE ARTS v. FINLEY, 118 S.CT 2168 (1998)

This case brought into focus the constitutional problem of government funding for private speech. The National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) was created in 1965 to disburse government grants in support of a climate of freedom of thought, artistic excellence, and public appreciation for the arts. In 1989, two exhibitions that were indirectly supported by NEA grants led to public outcry: Andres Serrano's photograph "Piss Christ," which depicted a crucifix immersed in urine, and Robert Mapplethorpe's exhibition "The Perfect Moment," which included many homoerotic photographs. Congress reacted with U.S.C. Section 954(d)(1), requiring the chair of the NEA to "take into consideration general standards of decency and respect for the diverse beliefs and values of the American people." Finley was one of four artists who had been judged worthy of a grant by the NEA's initial review panels, but who were later rejected during the political controversy over objectionable art but prior to the enactment of Section 954(d)(1). The artists objected to Section 954(d)(1) on its face, alleging (1) that it introduced viewpoint-based discrimination into the grant-making process, in violation of the First Amendment, and (2) that it was void for vagueness. The Supreme Court held that Section 954(d)(1) was constitutional.

Writing for the majority, Justice O'Connor found the artists' argument inadequate to overturn the statute on its face. She noted that the facial challenge was traditionally "strong medicine," reserved for extreme cases of congressional misstep. Ordinarily, the Court refrains from overturning a statute without an objection to the statute as applied to a specific case. She found that part of the NEA's mission is to educate the public, and that questions of "educational suitability" are a legitimate reason to consider decency in making government grants (citing Board of Education, Island Trees Union Free School District No. 26 v. Pico [1982]). Furthermore, she found that Section 954(d)(1), by itself, was unlikely to introduce viewpoint-based discrimination to the grant-making process because such discrimination could just as easily be veiled under the guise of "artistic excellence." Furthermore, she noted that Section 954(d)(1) did not require the NEA to deny grants based on standards of decency, only exhorted the chair to take decency into consideration.

The artists cited Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of University of Virginia (1995), where the Court held that by creating a Student Activities Fund, a university had created a "limited public forum," from which it could not exclude students based on viewpoint.

Thus, it was impermissible for the university to deny students access to the Student Activities Fund to aid them in creating a Christian student newspaper. The artists argued that the government had created a limited public forum by establishing the NEA and could not exclude based on viewpoint. However, O'Connor distinguished this case from Rosenberger by noting the competitive nature of NEA grants.

Justice O'Connor concluded by noting that if the NEA actually used Section 954(d)(1), in practice, to engage in viewpoint-based discrimination, that the outcome might well have been different. She noted that the First Amendment does have an effect on the government as a patron of speech, but its force was considerably less than when the government acted as a regulator of speech.

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, concurred with the result but faulted the majority for wishy-washiness on the issue of whether 954(d)(1) was constitutional. In Scalia's view, the government can discriminate all it wants in disbursing funds, because by patronizing one view over another the government is not "abridging" speech.

In dissent, Justice Ginsburg found that the constitutional question was whether "the government has adopted a regulation of speech because of disagreement with the message it conveys" (citing Ward v. Rock Against Racism [1989]). In this case, he found that government was motivated to discourage speech that was not respectful of common standards of decency, which was a perfect example of viewpoint-based discrimination. Ginsburg believed that the fact that "standards of decency" is just a consideration is not redemptive. If the statute said, "taking into account whether the artist is a communist," she believed the Court would have ruled differently.

It is interesting that both Scalia and Ginsburg agreed that the purpose of the statute was to disfavor art like Serrano's and Mapplethorpe's, but that Scalia thought that was perfectly fine while Ginsburg did not.

CHRISTOPHER D. KING

References and Further Reading

Bolton, Richard. Culture Wars: Documents from the Recent Controversies in the Arts. New York: New Press, 1992.
Brenson, Michael. Visionaries and Outcasts: The NEA, Congress, and the Place of the Visual Artist in America. New York: New Press, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Board of Education, Island Trees Union Free School District No. 26 v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982)

Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)

Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781, 790 (1989)

See also Book Banning and Book Removals; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Dworkin, Andrea; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Government Funding of Speech; Museums and Expression; Obscenity; Symbolic Speech; Traditional Public Forums

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) is a federal administrative agency created by the National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act) on July 5, 1935. The purpose of its creation was to govern the relations between labor unions and employers in the private sector involved in interstate commerce. Specifically, the act was created to protect the existence of labor unions, to promote collective bargaining, and to ensure employees could decide whether they want to participate. Critics claimed that the act was unconstitutional because it violated the right to contract, injured the property of employers, and denied employers due process of law. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the act and the board itself on April 12, 1937 in National Labor Relations Board v. Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation. The act and the NLRB protected the civil liberties rights of workers by protecting their free speech rights to picket and strike, and their rights of freedom of association to join unions.

The NLRB is made up of three members who are appointed by the president with the advice and consent of the Senate for five-year terms. Separate from the board is the general counsel, who is also appointed by the president with the advice and consent of the Senate, but only for four years. Primarily, the general counsel is responsible for the investigation and prosecution of violations of the National Labor Relations Act, such as unfair labor practices cases.

The NLRB has two primary functions. First, the “honest ballot association” allows an employee to decide by secret ballot vote whether they want to be represented by a union, and if so, by which union. Second, the NLRB acts as a public law enforcer. Only the board, not employees, employers, or unions can enforce the laws established by the National Labor Relations Act. The board investigates actions or allegations of unfair business practices entered by any of the three parties, employers, employees, and unions. Remedies can be imposed by the NLRB to cease the unfair labor practice. If the actions continue, further civil or criminal penalties may be invoked.

CAROL WALKER

References and Further Reading

Boyce, Timothy, and Ronald Turner. Fair Representation, the NLRB, and the Courts. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1984.

Johnson, Julia. The National Labor Relations Act. New York: H.W. Wilson Company, 1940.

Miller, Edward. An Administrative Appraisal of the NLRB. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1981.

Tomlins, Christopher L. The State and the Unions: Labor Relations, Law, and the Organized Labor Movement in America, 1880–1960. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Cases and Statutes Cited

National Labor Relations Board v. Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation, 301 U.S. 1 (1937)

NATIONAL MOTTO “IN GOD WE TRUST”

The phrase “In God We Trust” has enjoyed a long usage in American history, eventually becoming the national motto. Legal challenges arguing that the government’s use of the phrase violates the establishment clause have consistently failed.

In 1814, Francis Scott Key wrote “The Star Spangled Banner” (which Congress would designate as the national anthem in 1931) while watching the bombardment of Fort McHenry in Baltimore during the War of 1812. The final stanza of Key’s work provides in part: “And this be our motto—‘In God is our trust.’” With the onset of the Civil War, many people urged the federal government to stamp the nation’s coins with a motto stating America’s trust in God. In response, Secretary of the Treasury Salmon Chase wrote the director of the mint: “No nation can be strong except in the strength of God, or safe except in His defense. The trust of our people in God should be declared on our national coins.” In 1864, the phrase “In God We Trust” first appeared on an American coin, the two-cent piece, and the following year, Congress enacted legislation that made it lawful, but not mandatory, for the director of the mint to use “In God We Trust” on all coins.

In 1907, the administration of Theodore Roosevelt did not use “In God We Trust” on some newly minted coins. Roosevelt explained his opposition to the use of the phrase as follows: "[T]o put such a motto on coins, or to use it in any kindred matter, not only does no good but does positive harm, and is in effect irreverence which comes dangerously close to sacrilege." Roosevelt approved of the use of "In God We Trust" on "our great national monuments, in our temples of justice, in our legislative halls," but thought its use on coins tended "to cheapen" the phrase. But Congress responded in 1908 by making it mandatory that "In God We Trust" appear on all gold and silver coins minted in the United States.

In 1955, at the height of the cold war, Congress went further and required that "In God We Trust" appear on all paper currency as well as coins. The legislation's sponsor explained his rationale:"

In these days when imperialistic and materialistic communism seeks to attack and to destroy freedom, it is proper for us to seek continuously for ways to strengthen the foundation of our freedom.... As long as this country trusts in God, it will prevail. To remind all of us of this self-evident truth, it is proper that our currency should carry these inspiring words..."

The following year, Congress officially established "In God We Trust" as the national motto. The House Report accompanying the legislation noted that "the phrase 'E pluribus unum' has also received wide usage in the United States," but concluded that "'In God We Trust' [is] a superior and more acceptable motto for the United States." The House Report noted that "In God We Trust" had been widely used not just on coins, but also on postage stamps, including the 1928 two-cent Valley Forge stamp that contained a vignette of George Washington kneeling in prayer.

On at least three occasions, lawsuits have been filed arguing that the use of the phrase "In God We Trust" on coins and currency or as the nation's national motto offends the establishment clause. On each occasion, a federal appeals court has rejected the constitutional claim (Gaylor v. United States [1996], O'Hair v. Murray [1979], Aronow v. United States [1970]).

Although the U.S. Supreme Court has never squarely considered the constitutionality of the use of "In God We Trust" as the national motto or on American coins and currency, several justices of the Supreme Court have suggested in dicta that the phrase does not violate the establishment clause. In 1963, Justice William Brennan noted in dicta in Abington School District v. Schempp (1963), that" the use of the motto "In God We Trust" on currency, on documents and public buildings and the like may not offend the [establishment] clause.... The truth is that we have simply interwoven the motto so deeply into the fabric of our civil polity that its present use may well not present that type of involvement which the First Amendment prohibits.

In Wooley v. Maynard (1977), Chief Justice Warren Burger, writing for six justices, suggested in dicta that the display of "In God We Trust" on the currency did not violate the establishment clause because the "bearer of currency is ... not required to publicly advertise the national motto." Justice William Rehnquist, in a dissenting opinion, agreed: "The fact that an atheist carries and uses United States currency does not, in any meaningful sense, convey any affirmation of belief on his part in the motto 'In God We Trust.'" In Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), Justice Sandra Day O'Connor noted in dicta that use of the phrase "In God We Trust" served "the legitimate secular purposes of ... expressing confidence in the future, and encouraging the recognition of what is worthy of appreciation in society" and did not convey "government approval of particular religious beliefs," while Justice William Brennan in the same case observed that use of the phrase "In God We Trust" can "best be understood ... as a form of 'ceremonial deism,' protected from establishment clause scrutiny chiefly because [it has] lost through rote repetition any significant religious content." In 1989, Justice Harry Blackmun noted in County of Allegheny v. Greater Pittsburgh ACLU (1989), that "[o]ur previous opinions have considered in dicta the [national] motto ... characterizing [it] as consistent with the proposition that government may not communicate an endorsement of religious belief."

In recent years—particularly after September 11, 2001—some state legislatures have considered legislation requiring or permitting the display the words "In God We Trust" in public schools, while Georgia has put the words on its state flag. At least one state supreme court—that of New Hampshire—has concluded that the display of "In God We Trust" in public schools does not offend the establishment clause (Opinion of the Justices [1967]), as has a federal district court in Virginia (Myers v. Loudoun County School Board [2003]). Similarly, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit has upheld the use of "In God We Trust" on the facade of a county government center (Lambeth v. Board of Commissioners [2005]). Other legal challenges will undoubtedly follow.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Epstein, Steven B., Rethinking the Constitutionality of Ceremonial Deism, Columbia Law Review 96 (1996): 2083–2174.
- Stokes, Anson Phelps, and Leo Pfeffer. Church and State in the United States. New York: Harper and Row, 1964.

NATIONAL MOTTO “IN GOD WE TRUST”

Warren, Charles Gregory, No Need to Stand on Ceremony: The Corruptive Influence of Ceremonial Deism and the Need for a Separationist Reconfiguration of the Supreme Court's Establishment Clause Jurisprudence, Mercer Law Review 54 (2003): 1669–718.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
Aronow v. United States, 432 F.2d 242 (9th Cir. 1970)
County of Allegheny v. Greater Pittsburgh ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
Gaylor v. United States, 74 F.3d 214 (10th Cir. 1996)
Lambeth v. Board of Commissioners, 407 F.3d 266 (4th Cir. 2005)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
O'Hair v. Murray, 588 F.2d 1144 (5th Cir. 1979)
Opinion of the Justices, 108 N.H. 97 (1967)
Myers v. Loudoun County School Board, 251 F. Supp. 2d 1262 (E.D. Va. 2003)
Wooley v. Maynard, 430 U.S. 705 (1977)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing

NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN

The National Organization for Women (NOW) was officially established on June 30, 1966, in Washington, D.C., by a group of twenty-eight attendees at the Third National Conference of the Commission on the Status of Women. Its startup budget, collected from these founding members, was $140. By the end of its first year, its membership had increased to approximately 1,200. Nearing its fortieth year, in 2005 it claimed more than 500,000 dues-paying members and 550 chapters in 50 states. It remains the largest and most well-established American feminist organization.

The organization arose out of frustration at the slow pace with which women's inequality was being addressed through established channels. The issue of discrimination against women was already widely recognized when NOW was formed: by the mid-1960s, most states had established women's commissions, and women's workplace rights had been addressed at the federal level in Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, barring sex discrimination in employment. However, many felt that these measures were little more than window dressing, and that no real change would occur unless a new organization, dedicated to women's equality, ensured that women's issues were given higher priority.

Among NOW's founders was its first president, Betty Friedan, a journalist and author of the bestselling book, The Feminine Mystique. Other founders had strong ties to the labor and civil rights movements, and to networks of lawyers, teachers, government workers, and other professional groups. While white middle-class women were overrepresented, particularly in its early years, the group included women and men from a range of backgrounds. For example, Aileen Hernandez, an African-American woman with experience in the labor movement, was an early NOW leader who served as organization's second president. Rev. Pauli Murray, the first African-American woman Episcopal priest, was also a founding member. She co-authored NOW's original statement of purpose which begins as follow:

The purpose of NOW is to take action to bring women into full participation in the mainstream of American society now, exercising all privileges and responsibilities thereof in truly equal partnership with men.

As a national organization, NOW operates through a chapter structure. Local and state chapters organize their members around a range of issues, and send representatives to participate and vote in national NOW gatherings. Binding these chapters together is a set of official NOW priorities and issue-oriented task forces. These priorities include pressing for a constitutional equal rights amendment; achieving economic equality for women; championing abortion rights, reproductive freedom, and other women's health issues; and ending violence against women. In the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, NOW has provided particular leadership in defending abortion providers against attacks from anti-choice radicals such as Operation Rescue and in leading efforts to secure federal legislation to address violence against women. NOW's grassroots structure facilitates these efforts. In the case of clinic defense work, individual NOW chapters provide escorts and local on-the-ground assistance while the national organization presses for more effective federal enforcement. In successfully lobbying for enactment and subsequent reauthorization of the federal Violence Against Women Act, NOW similarly enlisted its extensive grassroots network to mobilize support for the legislation.

NOW's issue priorities have at times provoked some internal strife. For example, in 1967, some members who disagreed with NOW's emphasis on protecting women's right to abortion left the organization and formed the Women's Equity Action League, a now-defunct organization focused on women's economic rights. Another faction protested when, in the late 1960s, NOW first articulated its support for lesbians' rights. The priority given to the constitutional equal rights amendment has also proven controversial among members who believe that the current federal constitution is adequate and that organizational energy could be better spent on other issues.

NOW's emphasis on action, including grassroots action and civil disobedience, distinguishes it from many other women's organizations. In addition to electoral and lobbying work on the federal, state, and local levels, NOW also participates in litigation and organizes mass marches, rallies, and pickets. NOW's record of mounting mass actions is particularly notable. A decade after Martin Luther King Jr.'s assassination and the ill-fated Poor Peoples' March on Washington of 1968, the NOW-organized 1978 march in support of the equal rights amendment drew more than 100,000 people to Washington, D.C. National Marches for Women's Lives, which was co-organized by NOW, drew 500,000 reproductive rights supporters in 1989, 750,000 in 1992, and more than one million in 2004.

Philosophically, NOW generally ascribes to the "equal treatment" branch of feminist thought, rejecting public policies that give women special treatment because of perceived differences from men. For example, in the Supreme Court case of California Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Guerra (1987), NOW argued that a state law granting women extra work leaves on account of pregnancy constituted sex discrimination. Instead, argued NOW, the law should give women and men the same benefits. Similarly, NOW has been a leader in efforts to eliminate gender-based insurance rates, disputing actuarial tables that justify such sex-based rate making, and which, in some instances, inure to women's financial benefit. According to NOW, use of sex as a rate-making tool masks the utility of lifestyle factors that would be even more accurate, such as smoking and exercise habits, and that would avoid status-based discrimination. Finally, NOW has opposed a return to the pre-Title IX days of single-sex public education, arguing that girls do not need special treatment and special classes to thrive, but that they should be given equal treatment in stereotype-free coeducational settings.

Despite its focus on formal equality, however, NOW acknowledges the special issues that face women. Its support of legislation to address domestic violence is based on the understanding that such violence is overwhelmingly directed at women. Likewise, NOW has championed efforts to expand government support for childcare in recognition of the fact that women generally bear the burden of caregiving within a family.

In the twenty-first century, NOW has increased its efforts to diversify its ranks, hosting a series of conferences focused on issues of concern to young women, women of color, and other allies whose views were not well represented in earlier iterations of the organization. Although participation in activist organizations is on the wane nationally, and NOW must struggle to maintain its vitality in the face of the growing power of conservative women's organizations, NOW remains a force for women's equality in the political and popular arena and at every level of government.

MARTHA F. DAVIS

References and Further Reading

- Barakso, Maryann. Governing NOW: Grassroots Activism in the National Organization for Women. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2004.
- Barker-Plummer, Bernadette. "News as a Feminist Resource? A Case Study of the Media Strategies and Media Representation of the National Organization for Women, 1966–1980." In Gender, Politics and Communication, edited by Anabelle Sreberny and Liesbet van Zoonen, 121–60. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press, 2000.
- Berkeley, Kathleen C. The Women's Liberation Movement in America. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1999.
- National Organization for Women. Website. <http://www.now.org>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- California Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Guerra*, 479 U.S. 272 (1987)
- Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. Section 2000e, et seq.
- Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, 20 U.S.C. Sections 1681–1688

See also Abortion; Abortion Protest Cases; Antidiscrimination Laws; Domestic Violence; Reproductive Freedom

NATIONAL ORIGINS QUOTA SYSTEM

With the passage of the Immigration Act of 1924 (Johnson-Reed Act), immigration restrictionists achieved their long-sought goal of establishing a permanent nationality-based system of quotas to limit the number of immigrants admitted to the United States. Reflecting the ideology of "scientific" racism prevalent during the Progressive Era, which viewed ethnicity in hierarchical terms, the quotas strongly favored northern Europeans over those from eastern and southern Europe, and excluded most Asians.

The implementation of the quotas proceeded in steps beginning in 1921. The permanent system, which took effect in 1929, capped immigration at approximately 150,000 people annually. It allotted these spaces based on the supposed national origins (ethnicity) of the American population in 1920 as determined by a study of dubious validity that analyzed surnames. Immigration of members of Asian races was severely limited or prohibited entirely.

NATIONAL ORIGINS QUOTA SYSTEM

Throughout its history, critics denounced the quota system as un-American and discriminatory due to its unequal treatment of individuals based on, in President Kennedy's words, "accident of birth." By the late 1950s, the racist ideologies that served as the system's intellectual basis had lost favor, and its system of national preferences had proven a diplomatic liability in the context of the cold war. The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965 revamped the nation's immigration laws by eliminating race and race-based national quotas as a consideration for admission.

JASON A. COLE

References and Further Reading

- Daniels, Roger. Guarding the Golden Door: American Immigration Policy and Immigrants Since 1882. New York: Hill and Wang, 2004.
- Kennedy, John F. A Nation of Immigrants, revised and enlarged edition. New York: Harpers, 1964.
- Ngai, Mae M. Impossible Subjects: Illegal Aliens and the Making of Modern America. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.

See also Immigration and Nationality Act Amendments of 1965; Race and Immigration

NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION (NRA)

The National Rifle Association (NRA) was founded in 1871 by two Civil War-era generals who, critical of their own troops' marksmanship, wished to start a group whose goal would be to "promote and encourage rifle shooting on a scientific basis." The NRA built its first practice ground on Long Island, with a grant of $25,000 from the State of New York. From these humble beginnings, the NRA has transformed into a powerful organization boasting a membership of nearly four million and which proclaims itself "America's foremost defender of Second Amendment rights."

Before mid-century, the NRA was largely a hunters' and sportsmen's club. The NRA organized shooting clubs around the country (including at colleges, universities, and military academies), built shooting ranges, conducted hunter education programs, published member magazines, and organized large-scale shooting matches at its facilities. In the mid-1950s, the group also conducted firearms training for law enforcement officers, although the collaborative relationship between the two came undone when national police organization supported restricting armor-piercing bullets and assault weapons. Nevertheless, the NRA claims to have trained over 1.5 million police officers as well as 17 million hunters. The group still conducts civilian gun training program and initiated the "Eddie Eagle® Gun Safety Program" to teach gun safety to children.

The NRA is perhaps most visible in its legislative action and lobbying capacity, which has expanded considerably beginning in the 1950s. The passage of the Gun Control Act of 1968 in the wake of the assassinations of President John F. Kennedy and Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. precipitated a split in the NRA that set it on a course for more vigorous legislative advocacy of gun rights. The NRA leadership at the time supported handgun ownership for self-defense, but viewed the organization's primary role as being to support recreational use of guns for sporting purposes. A reaction to increasing federal assertiveness in pushing for gun control legislation, a new group of leaders took control of the NRA in 1977 in what became known as the "Cincinnati revolt." Since this time, the NRA has actively propounded its absolutist view of gun rights.

The Institute for Legislative Affairs, created in 1975, is the main instrument of the NRA's lobbying campaign to oppose any national or local statutes limiting the Second Amendment rights of American citizens. And its story over the past thirty years has largely been one of success, although it has seen some setbacks. The group has enjoyed the membership of Dwight Eisenhower, and George H.W. Bush, while Ronald Reagan, also a member, was the first sitting president to address an NRA annual meeting. Through aggressive fund raising, marketing, and outreach efforts, the NRA nearly tripled in size, from 940,000 members in 1977 to its current size. As a single-issue organization, it can levy the entire weight of its political machine to great effect against politicians seen as being unfriendly to gun rights. Throughout the 1970s and much of the 1980s, the NRA managed to defeat every major attempt at federal gun control. The NRA lost ground in the late 1980s and 1990s, as Congress passed restrictions on handguns, while the Brady Bill of 1994 mandated background checks and waiting periods for the purchase of certain firearms and placed restrictions on automatic and semiautomatic weapons. The NRA has enjoyed some success on the state level in encouraging state governments to pass "concealed-carry laws" that permit individuals to obtain licenses to carry concealed weapons.

Although the NRA does not oppose reasonable gun licensing or existing limitations on gun ownership by minors, for example, it understands the Second Amendment to confer upon law-abiding Americans a right to bear arms for the purpose of self-defense. They decisively reject the "collective rights" arguments of gun control advocates who posit that the provision must be read as providing a right only in connection with organized military units. The NRA's view is rooted in the belief that the framers of the Constitution intended the right to bear arms to accrue to individuals as a means of defending themselves against other citizens, as well as their own government. The provision was meant as a check against the tyranny of the state, and to provide for an armed citizenry from which a militia may be drawn. Under this construction, the "well-regulated militia" language is incidental to rather than a qualifier of the individual right. The NRA points to Court decisions such as United States v. Miller (1939) and United States v. Emerson (5th Cir. 2001), both of which appear to support the individual rights approach, as evidence of the correctness of their position. The NRA received a further boost recently when Attorney General John Ashcroft issued a memorandum in December 2004 favoring the individual rights interpretation of the Second Amendment.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Crooker, Constance Emerson. Gun Control and Gun Rights. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2003.
 Reynolds, Glen Harlan, A Critical Guide to the Second Amendment, Tennessee Law Review 62 (1994–1995): 461.
 Sugarmann, Josh. National Rifle Association. Washington, D.C.: National Press Books, 1992.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- United States v. Emerson*, 270 F.3d 203 (5th Cir. 2001)
United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174 (1939)

NATIONAL SECURITY

The inevitable tension between national security and civil liberties plays out in many constitutional provisions. Beginning with the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798, and particularly in times of war or crisis, federal and state governments have used their criminal powers to suppress speech critical of government, but it was not till 1919 that this became a First Amendment issue (Schenck v. United States [1919]). Constitutional protections of such speech have waxed and waned with the seriousness of the perceived threat, as the Court moved from the bad tendency test to the clear and present danger test to the more speech-protective incitement test (Brandenburg v. Ohio [1969]).

More recently, First Amendment claims typically resist government efforts to block publication of purportedly sensitive information, such as the Pentagon Papers, already in the hands of the press (New York Times Co. v. United States [1971]), prevent leaks from within the government (Snepp v. United States [1980]), or seek access to information that the government regards as sensitive. As to the last, the Constitution does not expressly declare a "right to know," and the Supreme Court has never found an implied one, so public access to national security information is governed by a hodgepodge of common law cases, federal statutes such as the Freedom of Information Act and the Privacy Act, and executive orders governing national security information.

Fourth Amendment issues are raised by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which lowered the standards for authorizing searches in security investigations, but restricted the uses to which the evidence obtained may be put, and more recently by the USA PATRIOT Act, which removed some of those restrictions and made it easier to conduct certain wiretaps and physical searches. The Fifth Amendment's indictment clause and the habeas corpus guarantee (Article I, Section 9) became an issue when prisoners were detained without trial at Guantanamo Bay. The due process clause was implicated in Department of the Navy v. Egan [1988], which affirmed a congressional scheme authorizing summary dismissal of federal employees—no hearing, no appeal—in the interests of national security. The Sixth Amendment right to a speedy and public trial has been raised in cases stemming from the Guantanamo detentions. Federalism issues arise occasionally when states enact laws that duplicate, complement, or conflict with federal security law (Hines v. Davidowitz [1941]).

WILLIAM V. DUNLAP

References and Further Reading

- Dycus, Stephen, Arthur L. Berney, William C. Banks, and Peter Raven-Hansen. National Security Law. 3rd ed. New York: Aspen, 2002 (and annual supplements).
 Moore, John Norton, and Robert F. Turner, eds. National Security Law. 2nd ed. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518 (1988)
Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52 (1941)
New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980)

See also National Security and Freedom of Speech; National Security Prior Restraints; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism

NATIONAL SECURITY AND FREEDOM OF SPEECH

The constant tension between the protection of the state and the rights of the individual is particularly acute in the realm of free expression as governments from time immemorial have attempted to silence or punish, in the name of national security, speech perceived as harmful to, or merely critical of, the state. Philosophers and judges have spent many words trying to define the line that separates protected speech from seditious libel or punishable conduct.

Free speech issues relating to national security fall primarily into two broad categories: post-publication punishment and prior restraint. The former is, as the phrase suggests, punishing with criminal sanctions, after the fact of publication, expression—whether speech or writing—regarded as a threat to national security. Prior restraint, on the other hand, attempts to prevent specific information or opinion from being published in the first place. There is no clean line between the two: the ultimate goal of post-publication punishment is to deter other allegedly harmful speech from being uttered or disseminated in the future, and prior restraint typically entails post-publication punishment for having violated the restraining order. Nevertheless, the concepts are sufficiently discrete to permit them to be discussed and analyzed separately. National security prior restraints are discussed as a separate topic in this encyclopedia, so this entry deals primarily with constitutional limitations on the post-publication punishment of expression. It concludes with a brief discussion of a third intersection between free speech and national security—where laws not directly regulating speech are said to chill or discourage the exercise of First Amendment rights.

Post-Publication Punishment

The protection of free speech and the right to criticize the government began, on these shores, in 1734 with the trial of John Peter Zenger. Charged with seditious libel for having published, in his New-York Weekly Journal, “divers scandalous, virulent, false and seditious reflections” against New York’s colonial governor, William Cosby, Zenger was acquitted after Andrew Hamilton persuaded the jury that the criticisms were true (a fact that was legally irrelevant, as the only question put to the jury was whether Zenger had printed the statements, which he obviously had done). Often described as a precedent establishing freedom of the press in America, the case is, more accurately, a prime example of jury nullification, of no precedential value whatever, but it demonstrated the colonists’ interest in free expression and became a symbol of the right to criticize government officials.

The first major free speech controversy under the new Constitution arose when the Federalist-controlled Congress enacted the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. The Sedition Act, in particular, was widely regarded, at least by Republicans, as unconstitutional, but it was much less harsh than the seditious libel laws of England and other European countries, in that only false statements were actionable, knowledge of a statement’s falsity and an intent to defame were elements of the offense, and the defendant was expressly permitted to introduce evidence of the statement’s truth.

The Sedition Act proved very unpopular and probably contributed to the Federalists’ defeat in 1800, when the Republicans gained the White House and both houses of Congress. Only ten persons were convicted under it, and President Jefferson promptly pardoned every one. The Republican Congress refunded all the fines levied under it and allowed it to expire under its own terms in 1801. The Supreme Court said in 1964 in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, a landmark libel case, “Although the Sedition Act was never tested in this Court, the attack upon its validity has carried the day in the court of history.”

It is often said that nothing significant happened by way of free expression between the Sedition Act of 1798 and the World War I Espionage Act of 1917, but in fact there were numerous attempts to suppress speech, especially during the Civil War and then during the half-century that followed it. The most famous post-Civil War prosecution was of William McCordle (Ex parte McCordle [1869]), a newspaper editor in Mississippi whose editorials regularly criticized the military government and the Reconstruction Act that had established it. He was arrested and charged with disturbing the peace, inciting rebellion, libel, and impeding reconstruction, and he defended on the ground that the Reconstruction Act, under which he was arrested, was unconstitutional. What might have been an interesting free speech case instead played out as a question of congressional authority over Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction when Congress, fearful that the Court would strike down the act, stripped the Court of jurisdiction to hear McCordle’s appeal in his habeas corpus proceeding. The Court acknowledged Congress’s authority to do so and dismissed the case; the Army released McCordle, and the case went away.

During the half-century that followed McCordle, socialism was on the rise in Europe, and the federal and state governments reacted by routinely prosecuting syndicalists, anarchists, trade unionists, and other radicals for their speeches and publications, even in the absence of incitement to criminality or violent acts. The federal government used the 1903 Alien Immigration Act, passed after President McKinley's assassination, to deport labor activists, among others, and local police routinely interrupted speeches and rallies in public parks and squares, often before the speech had begun, and arrested the speakers.

These prosecutions do not appear to have raised any serious constitutional issues, and state and federal courts routinely affirmed convictions with little or no discussion. Even a U.S. senator, Thomas Patterson, was convicted of criminal contempt for a series of editorials in his Rocky Mountain News criticizing a decision of the Colorado Supreme Court. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the conviction, deferring to state law and finding no federal issue. The case is interesting in that Justice Holmes, later very influential in the development of the freedom of speech, found the First Amendment inapplicable, not only because it might not apply to the states (a question he did not decide) but because it prohibited only prior restraints, not subsequent punishments. This reflected a view of freedom of speech that goes back at least as far as the eighteenth century and Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England: "The liberty of the press is essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraint upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published." (The subsequent punishment may extend as well to the true as to the false, Holmes added, making truth irrelevant as a defense.)

In Schenck v. United States (1919), the Court upheld a conviction under the Espionage Act of 1917 for circulating a pamphlet opposing the draft. Holmes for the first time acknowledged a broader function for the First Amendment: "It well may be that the prohibition of laws abridging the freedom of speech is not confined to previous restraints, although to prevent them may have been the main purpose...." Nevertheless, he continued, in one of the most (mis) quoted lines in constitutional law:

The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic. It does not even protect a man from an injunction against uttering words that may have all the effect of force. The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree.

Although the phrase "clear and present danger" has allowed some to argue that Holmes was trying to create a rule more protective of speech, Schenck was probably no more than a restatement of the bad tendency test that was in wide use at the time.

In Gitlow v. New York (1925), the court assumed, for the first time, that the First Amendment's protections of speech and press applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment ("No State will make or enforce any law which will abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor will any States deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law...."), but nevertheless granted the state legislature "every presumption" in determining the validity of the criminal anarchy act. Holmes and Justice Brandeis dissented, preferring the clear and present danger test. In Whitney v. California (1927), Brandeis, concurring in sustaining a conviction under California's criminal syndicalism act, formulated a test somewhat more protective of speech: "There must be reasonable ground to believe the danger apprehended is imminent. There must be the probability of serious danger to the State." He would not allow a conviction "where the advocacy falls short of incitement and there is nothing to indicate that the advocacy would be acted on. The Court purported to adopt Brandeis's Whitney formulation twenty-four years later, in Dennis v. United States (1951), testing the antiradical, anticommunist Smith Act, but adapted Brandeis's language to Judge Learned Hand's famous balancing test that appears in so many contexts: "In each case, [the court] must ask whether the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." A few years later, in another Smith Act case, Yates v. United States (1957), Justice Harlan interpreted the act's prohibition of advocacy of the violent overthrow of government to mean only "advocacy of action," not "advocacy of abstract doctrine or ideas." This was somewhat more protective of speech but was merely an exercise in statutory interpretation, which Congress is always free to overturn, rather than a matter of First Amendment law.

Relying on Dennis and Yates, the court in Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969) overturned convictions under Ohio's criminal syndicalism statute for advocating violence in industrial disputes: A state may not "forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such actions." Brandenburg is currently the leading case on First Amendment protection of speech that the government may want to suppress or punish on national security grounds. Its meaning is not clear, though. Some see it purely as an incitement test: pure speech is protected, but the government may punish incitement to violence, which crosses the line from pure speech to action or “speech-plus.” Others see in Brandenburg a blending of an incitement test with the clear and present danger test: Not only must the speaker be inciting to lawless action, but the context must establish imminence and a probability of the serious evil the law seeks to prevent. Critical reaction, too, has been mixed. Civil libertarians have criticized Brandenburg as too vague and not protective of speech. Others have argued that it requires courts to make judgments about imminence or danger that are best left to elected or law-enforcement officials.

Punishing Symbolic Speech

The issues discussed so far, whether relating to post-publication punishment or prior restraints, deal with laws aimed directly at speech. Sometimes a law punishing conduct will be challenged as infringing freedom of speech. United States v. O'Brien, for example, sustained a conviction for burning a draft card, rejecting the defendant’s argument that the act was protected “symbolic speech.” (O’Brien argues that by burning the card he expressed his opposition to the Vietnam War.) Without deciding whether such acts are protected speech, the Court held that when a proscribed activity includes both speech and conduct, the government may regulate the conduct if the regulation is within the government’s constitutional powers and furthers an important or substantial governmental interest, if that interest is unrelated to the suppression of speech, and if the regulation is no greater than necessary to further that interest. The Court found that the Selective Service Act’s ban on destroying draft cards served a legitimate and substantial interest unrelated to speech, was not overly broad, and was therefore constitutional.

Chilling Effects

Some laws not directly related to speech have been challenged on the ground that they “chill” First Amendment rights or other interests by discouraging people from engaging in speech or research on controversial issues. Section 215 of the USA PATRIOT Act, for example, made it considerably easier for federal investigators to gain access to “tangible things” in the course of an investigation concerning international terrorism and prohibited the person providing the information from disclosing the request. Librarians quickly realized that this would include library patron records, and the American Library Association launched a highly visible public campaign to call attention to the access and secrecy provisions. Other professional organizations, representing academics, journalists, and scientists, among others, have objected to the impact that national security laws can have on academic freedom, freedom of the press, and scientific research.

WILLIAM V. DUNLAP

References and Further Reading

- American Association of University Professors. “Academic Freedom and National Security in a Time of Crisis.” Reprinted in Academe 89, no. 6 (2003), <http://www.aaup.org>.
- Dycus, Stephen, Arthur L. Berney, William C. Banks, and Peter Raven-Hansen. National Security Law. 3rd ed. New York: Aspen, 2002 (and annual supplements).
- Moore, John Norton, and Robert F. Turner, eds. National Security Law, 2nd ed. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2005.
- Near v. Minnesota*, 283 U.S. 697 (1931).
- New York Times Co. v. United States*, 403 U.S. 713 (1971).
- Patterson v. Colorado*, 205 U.S. 454 (1907).
- Rabban, David M. Free Speech in Its Forgotten Years. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Snepp v. United States*, 444 U.S. 507 (1980).
- Stone, Geoffrey R. Perilous Times, Free Speech in Wartime from the Sedition Act of 1798 to the War on Terrorism. New York: Norton, 2004.
- United States v. Marchetti*, 466 F.2d 1309 (1972).
- United States v. The Progressive, Inc.*, 467 F.Supp. 990, 486 F.Supp. 5 (1979).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
- Ex parte McCordle*, 74 U.S. 506 (1869)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- Schenck v. United States*, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
- United States v. O'Brien*, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
- Whitney v. California*, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)
- Yates v. United States*, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)

See also National Security Prior Restraints; Ripeness in Free Speech Cases

NATIONAL SECURITY PRIOR RESTRAINTS

A prior restraint in constitutional law is, loosely speaking, a prohibition or restriction on publication before the material is published (as opposed to punishment after publication). It typically takes one of two forms—an administrative licensing requirement or a judicial injunction. Many regard prior restraint as the more pernicious, as it prevents the words in question from ever being uttered; if subsequent punishment chills speech, prior restraint freezes it. Furthermore, post-publication defendants are free to challenge the constitutionality of the law and escape the sanction if they are right, but, under the collateral bar rule, violating a judicial order brings its own punishment, even if the order is eventually determined to be illegal or unconstitutional. Post-publication punishment is discussed in more detail in a separate entry, National Security and Freedom of Speech.

As early as 1769, Blackstone, in his Commentaries on the Laws of England, had written that “liberty of the press ... consists in laying no previous restraints upon publication” In the United States, it was generally accepted that the First Amendment went at least that far. Even the Sedition Act of 1798 made no effort to establish a licensing system alongside its severe post-publication penalties for seditious libel. The White House version of the Espionage Act of 1917 contained a “press censorship” clause that would have made it an offense to publish information that the president had determined “is or might be useful to the enemy.” After bitter criticism from the press and civil libertarians, who objected to the unfettered discretion granted to the president, Congress removed the provision, although it retained others that raised serious concerns among civil libertarians and that became the basis of controversial prosecutions during and after World War I.

It was not clear until 1939 that the First Amendment strongly disfavored injunctions as well as licensing. Near v. Minnesota (1931), which overturned a state’s attempt to prevent a scandal sheet from publishing scurrilous, anti-Semitic material, had no direct relevance to national security, but, in a famous dictum, Chief Justice Hughes made clear that, like most constitutional rules, the prohibition on prior restraints was not absolute and that an injunction might legitimately prevent, for example, the publication in wartime of sailing dates or the location of troops.

For four decades after Near, prior restraints were litigated in a number of other contexts: obscenity (which is not protected speech under the First Amendment) and efforts by state or local government to control public demonstrations and the distribution of literature. To survive judicial scrutiny, a licensing scheme had to be content neutral, have an important governmental purpose, allow administrative officials virtually no discretion, and provide procedural safeguards including a prompt hearing and judicial review. Judicial injunctions were occasionally upheld as well when the state could show that the release of certain information could interfere with a criminal defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to a fair trial.

Then in 1971, U.S. District Judge Murray Gurfein, in his first case since being appointed to the bench, became the first federal judge in U.S. history to prohibit a newspaper from publishing particular information. He issued a temporary restraining order (TRO) against the New York Times, which had begun publishing installments of the Pentagon Papers, a 7,000-page, forty-seven-volume “History of U.S. Decision-Making Process on Vietnam Policy, 1945–1967,” which Daniel Ellsberg, one of the study’s compilers, had copied and passed to the Times. The government persuaded the judge that further publication would undermine national security. After the Times complied with the TRO, the Washington Post began publishing the papers. Judge Gerhard Gesell refused to grant a TRO or an injunction on the ground that the government had not identified any material that would injure the United States and was misusing the Espionage Act of 1917 (discussed above) in an effort to censor the press. The Supreme Court quickly agreed to hear the case, New York Times Co. v. United States (1971). Meanwhile, at least nine other papers began to publish excerpts. The Supreme Court held, six-to-three in a per curiam opinion, that the Times and the Post could resume publication because the government had not satisfied its “heavy burden of showing justification” for a prior restraint on the press. Critics have suggested that this was, in the long run, a defeat for the press in that the opinion substituted a balancing test for Near’s almost absolute disapproval of prior restraints, particularly as it offered no guidance on how the “heavy burden” might be satisfied. Some justices who voted to allow the publication wondered whether the injunction might have been upheld had there been authorizing congressional legislation.

In 1979, an article in The Progressive purporting to show how to build a hydrogen bomb presented a case as close as one might hope to get to Hughes’s troopship dictum in Near. The case had the potential to resolve two open questions from the Pentagon Papers case: how to define the government’s burden, and whether Congress could authorize such injunctions. The government argued in United States v. The Progressive, Inc. (1979) that material in the article was classified, even though it had all been gathered from public sources, and persuaded a federal district judge that its publication would violate the Atomic Energy Act. As The Progressive was preparing an appeal from the preliminary injunction, the article was published by others overseas and the case became moot, so the appeal was dismissed. There has been widespread speculation that the government was relieved to see the case dismissed, as it feared that it would lose and even that portions of the Atomic Energy Act would be declared unconstitutional.

In a fair-trial case tangentially related to national security, a federal court in Florida enjoined CNN from broadcasting conversations between Manuel Noriega, Panama's deposed president, and his attorney taped in a U.S. prison where Noriega was awaiting trial on drug charges (Cable News Network Inc. v. Noriega [1990]; United States v. Noriega [1990]). The Court of Appeals refused to intervene, as did the Supreme Court. Two justices, Thurgood Marshall and Sandra Day O'Connor, dissented, however, because the trial court had issued the TRO "without any finding that suppression of the broadcast was necessary to protect Noriega's right to a fair trial, reasoning that no such determination need be made unless CNN surrendered the tapes for the court's inspection." CNN went ahead and broadcast the tapes anyway, the court lifted the order, and CNN was eventually convicted of criminal contempt.

Yet another technique for keeping national security information from leaking has been upheld by the courts—contract law—but it is effective only against government employees, not the press. Since 1972, the courts have upheld secrecy agreements in which incoming and outgoing employees of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) agree not to divulge classified information or to publish any information whatsoever without first obtaining clearance from the CIA. In United States v. Marchetti (1972), the Court of Appeals upheld an injunction against a former agent, but stressed that it could apply only to classified information not previously disclosed, that the CIA must act promptly to approve or disapprove the submissions, and that the author was entitled to judicial review of the CIA decision. The Supreme Court declined to review the decision, but eight years later, in Snepp v. United States (1980), it not only upheld the validity of the secrecy agreements but authorized the government to establish a constructive trust to impound any royalties from any work published without CIA clearance.

WILLIAM V. DUNLAP

References and Further Reading

- Dycus, Stephen, Arthur L. Berney, William C. Banks, and Peter Raven-Hansen. National Security Law. 3rd ed. New York: Aspen, 2002 (and annual supplements).
- Milton, John. Areopagitica, A Speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, to the Parliament of England. Vol. III, Part 3. The Harvard Classics. New York: P.F. Collier & Son, 1909–14. Bartleby.com, 2001. <http://www.bartleby.com/3/3/>.

Moore, John Norton, and Robert F. Turner, eds. National Security Law. 2nd ed. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2005.

Rabban, David M. Free Speech in Its Forgotten Years. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Stone, Geoffrey R. Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime from the Sedition Act of 1798 to the War on Terrorism. New York: Norton, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Cable News Network Inc. v. Noriega, 498 U.S. 976 (1990);

United States v. Noriega, 752 F. Supp. 1045 (1990)

Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)

New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971)

Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980)

United States v. Marchetti, 466 F.2d 1309 (1972)

United States v. The Progressive, Inc., 467 F.Supp. 990, 486 F.Supp. 5 (1979)

See also National Security and Freedom of Speech

NATIONAL TREASURY EMPLOYEES UNION v. VON RAAB, 489 U.S. 656 (1989)

Employee drug testing is common in the United States, particularly in government agencies. Advocates contend that testing programs increase job safety, reduce costs, and support drug law enforcement, while opponents argue that these schemes intrude on privacy and violate constitutional rights. In National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, the Supreme Court held that a drug testing program for U.S. customs agents was consistent with the Fourth Amendment.

Von Raab addressed urinalysis testing for employees who carried firearms or were directly involved in drug interdiction. Because this search served special needs beyond ordinary law enforcement, the legal analysis was based on a balancing of governmental interests and individual privacy expectations. According to the Court, privacy concerns were diminished by the operational realities of the customs service and the nonintrusive testing procedures. In turn, the government had a compelling interest in preventing employees who use drugs from serving on the front lines of interdiction due to their susceptibility to bribery or blackmail and possible apathy toward drug enforcement goals. The government had a similar interest in those agents who carried firearms and thereby posed risks to innocent citizens from impaired perception and judgment. For these reasons, the Court found the program constitutional in the absence of warrants and individualized suspicion.

Since Von Raab and its companion case, Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association (1989), the Court has considered four additional drug testing regimes, upholding two and striking down two. The resulting jurisprudence has produced a level of uncertainty in the lower courts.

ERIK LUNA

References and Further Reading

Symposium: Drug Testing in the Workplace, William & Mary Law Review 33 (1991): 1–252.
 Welfing, John B., Employer Drug Testing: Disparate Judicial and Legislative Responses, Albany Law Review 63 (2000): 799–832.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989)

See also Administrative Searches and Seizures; Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002) (students); Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305 (1997) (candidates); Drug Testing; Search (General Definition); Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989); Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995); War on Drugs; Warrant Clause (IV); Warrantless Searches

NATIVE AMERICANS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

There is no single Native-American religion. Religions beliefs and practices vary considerably among the hundreds of Indian tribes in the United States. Yet, many Native-American religions share common features that distinguish them from non-Native-American religions. These distinctive features of Native-American religions have not been fully protected by the laws that have provided more complete religious liberty to more mainstream religions. While the religion clauses of the First Amendment apply in theory with full force to government actions affecting Native-American religions, and while some legislation has been enacted specifically to promote Native-American religious practices, the application of these provisions has often resulted in little actual protection for those religions.

The way in which traditional First Amendment and legislative standards have failed adequately to protect some of the distinctive, and yet essential, features of many Native-American religions is illustrated by the manner in which the courts and Congress have dealt with Native-American sacred sites, Native-American peyote use, and the holistic nature of many Native-American religions.

Unlike most mainstream religions in the United States, many Native-American religions view land as a living, sacred thing, and consider specific sites not only as the necessary location for important religious rites and ceremonies, but holy in and of themselves. Such lands can fulfill their full religious functions only if access to, and use of, the lands are carefully controlled. Otherwise, others may use the lands in ways that desecrate them or disturb those who use them for religious purposes. Unfortunately, Native Americans often do not possess the property rights to these lands, most of which are federal lands. Native Americans are, therefore, often unable to control use of the lands through the property law scheme, and they can preserve their religious connection to them only if they either convince federal land managers to control the lands in a manner that protects their sacred nature or persuade courts that the free exercise clause of the First Amendment requires the land managers to do so.

Native Americans' ability to do the latter was severely curtailed by the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association (1988), when the Court rejected a free exercise challenge to a federal government plan to construct a road through an area considered sacred by several northern California tribes. Even though the Court conceded that the construction and use of the road might "virtually destroy the Indians' ability to practice their religion," it concluded that because the plan did not coerce the tribal members into acting contrary to their religious beliefs, the plan did not violate the constitution. Relying on its earlier ruling in Bowen v. Roy (1986), the Court concluded that the Native Americans' religious liberty interests were outweighed by the government's right to structure its own internal affairs and property. Thus, Native Americans' distinctive view of the nature of sacred lands, along with their lack of property rights in those lands, have combined to make it difficult for them to obtain full protection of their religious practices in judicial proceedings.

Native Americans have had more success in convincing federal land managers and those who direct them to adopt land use policies that are sensitive to Native-American religious needs. In 1996, President Clinton issued an executive order directing federal agencies to "accommodate access to and ceremonial use of Indian sacred sites by Indian religious practitioners." Some federal agencies have adopted plans asking visitors to voluntarily refrain from secular activities on certain federal lands considered sacred by local tribes (such as the Bear Lodge or Devil's Tower in Wyoming) in order to facilitate Native-American religious practices at certain times. Moreover, Congress itself has provided protection for Native-American religious activities in some specific locations, at times by placing the lands in trust for the tribe, thereby allowing the tribe considerable control over use and access to the sacred areas (such as the Blue Lake in New Mexico), and in other instances by authorizing federal land managers to close some lands to the general public, from time to time, to allow Native-American religious activities to be carried out in private (such as the El Malpais National Monument in another part of New Mexico). Furthermore, the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) may provide some additional protection for Native-American sacred sites, as it limits the federal government's authority to enforce land use regulations "in a manner that imposes a substantial burden" on religious activities.

However, legislation that would have provided broader protection for all sacred sites on federal lands was rejected in the 1990s, and many of the accommodating actions taken by the political branches have given rise to claims that these actions violate the establishment clause by preferring or promoting Native-American religions. Although these claims have by and large been rejected by lower federal courts, the challenges themselves further evidence the difficulty that Native Americans face when relying on traditional First Amendment tools to protect their distinctive religious views and practices.

A similar pattern—lack of success in the judicial arena, followed by gains in the political arena, which are then challenged in court—is found in the development of the law with respect Native-American religious use of peyote. Although many Native-American religions do not attach any religious significance to peyote, others, particularly those with roots in the Southwest, view peyote as not only an essential sacramental object, but as an object of worship itself. As the California Supreme Court explained in People v. Woody (Ca. 1964), in traditional peyote religions, "prayers are devoted to [peyote] much as prayers are devoted to the Holy Ghost" in Christian religions. Thus, for many Native Americans, the religious use of peyote is the sine qua non of their religion, and lower courts (including the court in Woody) initially indicated that such use was protected from governmental interference by the free exercise clause. However, in Employment Division of Oregon v. Smith (1990), the Supreme Court held that the State of Oregon did not violate the free exercise clause by criminalizing the religious use of peyote by Native Americans, nor by denying unemployment benefits to employees who were dismissed for violating that law. Thus, while there were some early judicial victories, Native Americans using peyote for religious purposes have ultimately received little judicial assistance in their quest for religious liberty.

As has been the case with protection for sacred sites, Native Americans who use peyote for religious purposes have had more success with the political branches of the federal government. However, in like fashion, these accommodations have themselves given rise to judicial challenges. In part as a response to Smith, Congress enacted the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), which reinstated the strict scrutiny test for federal or state actions that "substantially burden" a person's free exercise rights, thereby providing more protection not only for the religious use of peyote by Native Americans, but also for a wide variety of religious practices by all persons. However, in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), the Supreme Court held that Congress's effort to apply this test to state action was itself unconstitutional. How that ruling will apply to RFRA's application to federal actions (which are typically the source of problems for Native American religions) is somewhat unclear, although early lower court decisions have upheld the act in this respect.

Congress also enacted a more specific response to Smith when it enacted a post-Smith amendment to the American Indian Religious Freedom Act (AIRFA), which provided an express exemption from federal and state drug laws for the "use, possession, or transportation of peyote by an Indian for bona fide traditional ceremonial purposes in connection with the practice of a traditional Indian religion." However, once again, the Native Americans' success in obtaining protection from the political branches of government has prompted judicial challenges, in this case by non-Native Americans who claim that the exception violates both the establishment clause of the First Amendment and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because it prefers Native Americans and their unique religious practices over the religious practices of others. Those claims have not yet been definitively resolved.

Another distinctive feature of many Native American religions that has proven to be a problem under traditional First Amendment jurisprudence is the common Native-American view that religion permeates all aspects of life. Unlike many mainstream religions that separate, both geographically and temporally, religious activities from secular pursuits, many Native American religions are more holistic. For many Native Americans, religion informs every aspect of life; there is no such thing as nonreligious activity. Thus, even seemingly day-to-day tasks, such as hunting, fishing, or preparing food, are religious activities infused with sacred meaning. Failing to understand this factor, some lower courts have refused to provide constitutional protection to Native-American religious practices because the courts concluded that the activities were merely manifestations of tribal culture, which like most secular activities can be regulated extensively, rather than religious activities entitled to First Amendment protection. Moreover, in cases involving the possession of eagle feathers and other objects that some Native Americans gather and use for religious purposes, the quest for religious liberty is made even more complicated by society's interest in preserving endangered species, which some (although not all) lower courts have found outweighs the Native Americans' right to exercise their religion free from government constraint.

Even some features of Native American religious beliefs and practices that are not as distinctive as use of sacred sites or peyote use have not fared well under traditional jurisprudence despite initial signs of promise. In 1978, Congress enacted the AIRFA, which committed the United States to the policy of "protect[ing] and preserve[ing] for American Indians their inherent right of freedom to believe, express, and exercise the traditional religions of the American Indians." However, the statute has had little practical impact because the U.S. Supreme Court in Lyng concluded that AIRFA created no judicially enforceable rights. Similarly, following some initial success in lower court decisions by Native-American prisoners who claimed that prison regulations concerning hair length violated their sincerely held religious beliefs, lower courts began to apply a less favorable test (developed by the Supreme Court in Turner v. Safley (1987) in a non-Native-American, non-religious liberty context) and, as a result, began more consistently to deny Native-American prisoners the right to wear long hair or headbands, to possess religious objects (such as pipes or medicine bags), and to have access to sweat lodges and other Native-American religious ceremonies. Native-American hopes that courts would be more accommodating to such claims after the enactment of RFRA proved largely unfounded, and, following the invalidation of that statute's application to state action (including state prisons), Congress enacted RLUIPA, which in addition to changing the rules for land-use planning decisions, revived the strict scrutiny test for government activities that substantially burden the religious activities of persons incarcerated in federal or state prisons. The extent to which this statute will provide meaningful protection to Native-American prisoners, as well as the constitutionality of the statute, has yet to be fully determined.

KEVIN J. WORTHEN

References and Further Reading

Deloria, Vine Jr. God Is Red: A Native View of Religion. 2nd ed., Golden, CO: North American Press, 1992.

- Dussias, Allison M., Ghost Dance and Holy Ghost: The Echoes of Nineteenth-Century Christianization Policy in Twentieth-Century Native American Free Exercise Cases, Stanford Law Review 49 (1997): 4:773–852.
- Epps, Garrett. To an Unknown God: Religious Freedom on Trial. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2001.
- Martin, Joel W. The Land Looks After Us: A History of Native American Religion. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Stewart, Omer C. Peyote Religion: A History. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1987.
- Winslow, Anastasia P., Sacred Standards: Honoring the Establishment Clause in Protecting Native American Sacred Sites, Arizona Law Review 38 (1996): 1291–343.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bowen v. Roy*, 476 U.S. 693 (1986)
- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
- Employment Division of Oregon v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association*, 485 U.S. 439 (1988)
- People v. Woody*, 394 P.2d 813 (Ca. 1964)
- Turner v. Safley*, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)
- See also Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693 (1986); City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997); Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 (1988); Religious Freedom Restoration Act; Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000; Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

NATURAL LAW, EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY UNDERSTANDING

The concept of natural law describes universal laws that exist independent of human-created laws. It is a highly contested idea both in philosophy and legal theory. Natural law as it influenced early American thinking on civil liberties was largely the product of the European Enlightenment as it was received and reinterpreted by the founders.

The study of natural law had been dominated by Catholic scholasticism for centuries. Expressed in the thinking of theologians such as Thomas Aquinas, natural law was analyzed in terms of God-given laws, and what that meant for human institutions. The Enlightenment forced the study of natural law towards secular rationality and individualism, with a new attention to political rights, and no Enlightenment philosopher influenced the American colonists more than John Locke.

Locke created a wealth of new natural rights ideas, imagining a "state of nature" that predated government, and describing the natural rights that arose therein. Locke's theories also envisioned government as a social compact requiring the "consent of the governed." Locke's theory of the "consent of the governed" strongly influenced the intellectual forbears of the nascent republic, who oftentimes deployed Lockean natural rights rhetoric when arguing for the dissolution of ties with Britain. The Declaration of Independence provides a good example of this kind of reasoning, such as where it expresses that the British have deprived the colonists of "the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them."

Natural Law and the Constitution

There is debate, however, among historians of the early American republic about the extent to which natural law influenced the drafters of the Constitution. As mentioned above, the Declaration of Independence certainly included natural law language, but the Constitution eschewed such rhetoric for much more formal legalistic terms, and natural law is not mentioned in any significance in the ratifying debates. One explanation, proffered by John Hart Ely, is that the functions of the documents were fundamentally different. The Declaration was an announcement of grievances, and an argument that those grievances could only be redressed by resort to revolution. By contrast, the Constitution, drafted after long debate and deliberation, was meant to be the written fundamental law of the new nation. We might conclude that while many of the framers of the early republic valued natural law individually, they thought that human-written laws were the only sources of state-enforced obligations.

One important concept for civil liberties that permeates natural law theory is the idea that positive, human-written laws do not exhaust the limits of individual rights against government. This means that there are universal, individual rights that cannot be violated by government. This insight is important to understanding the continuing vitality of natural law theories for protecting civil liberties in the modern United States. Some of these modern theories suppose that if there are preexisting natural rights, then these natural rights form an "unwritten constitution" that underlies the written constitution, but has as much or more force as the document itself.

There is a conflict between this view and the view that whatever natural rights there are, they are adequately protected by a written constitution. This struggle is evident in the debate over the inclusion or exclusion of a bill of rights. Those who would have excluded the Bill of Rights were not foes of individual liberties, but in fact thought those liberties would be best protected without a bill of rights. Alexander Hamilton, in The Federalist 84, gave expression to this very idea when he spoke of the danger of attempting to list all individual rights against government—an effort he thought impossible. Ultimately, those in favor of listing individual rights against government prevailed, and natural law was not significantly invoked by the judiciary in its interpretations of the Bill of Rights.

Natural Rights

However, this debate was not fully resolved by the framers of the Constitution, as evinced by the existence of the Ninth Amendment. That amendment states simply, "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." If we think that the fundamental law of the land is stated by the Constitution, then where would these rights "retained by the people" come from? Furthermore, should the vague provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment give rise to broad judicial protection of rights not listed in the Constitution? To some scholars, natural law answers these questions in the affirmative.

Such a theory has been embraced by some modern constitutional scholars, but in the framing period, appeals to natural law found only rare and fleeting traction in the U.S. Supreme Court, and the Ninth Amendment itself has been very rarely invoked. The 1798 case of Calder v. Bull (1798) is famous for juxtaposing the views of Justices Chase and Iredell, who come to opposite conclusions regarding the merits of using natural law as a source of constitutional law, with Chase in favor and Iredell opposed. That Justice Iredell prevailed in that case is testament to the strong tradition of legal positivism on the Supreme Court, which is marked by the belief that only the written Constitution is enforceable.

This view was dominant until the twentieth century (with a few exceptions), when a quasi-natural law conception of the Constitution was revived, principally by late twentieth-century legal academics. The only justification for enforcing the "unenumerated rights" created by the Warren and Burger Courts seemed to be a revival of natural law. Whether this is a valid source of constitutional law continues to be a lively and intense debate both within and outside of the legal academy. Fundamentally, however, this debate is the culmination of long-unsettled questions about whether the fundamental law of the United States is exhausted by the text of the Constitution, or whether the text and history of its drafting invite judges to protect rights not written in the Constitution, and guaranteed by natural law.

MITCHELL A. MOSVICK

References and Further Reading

- Bailyn, Bernard. The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1967.
- Ely, John Hart. Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980.
- Rossiter, C., ed. The Federalist Papers. New York: Penguin Putnam, 1961.
- Wood, Gordon S. The Creation of the American Republic 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1969.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386 (1798)

See also Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386 (1798); Constitution of 1787; Declaration of Independence; Locke, John; Ninth Amendment; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Substantive Due Process; Warren Court

NEAR v. MINNESOTA, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)

Freedom of the press is not absolute; for example, the possibility of being sued for the tort of defamation makes a newspaper careful not to something that a plaintiff might consider to constitute libel. Whether a plaintiff can prevent something defamatory from being published, in advance of its publication—the notion of prior restraint—is an issue that predates the Constitution.

A Minnesota statute provided that anyone engaged in the publication of a “malicious, scandalous and defamatory newspaper” was guilty of nuisance, and allowed either a county attorney or an aggrieved private citizen to seek an injunction to prevent publication of such material.

Near, the owner of a newspaper in Minneapolis, published a series of articles and editorials in which he claimed that Jewish gangsters were in control of the city. The articles charged that the mayor, chief of police, county attorney, and several other officials were either derelict in their law enforcement duties or were taking bribes from this gangster. The officials sought an injunction to prohibit further publication of material of this type.

The Supreme Court agreed that the material was scandalous and defamatory. However, the prior restraint of publication was the type of censorship that had been prohibited in England long before the American Revolution, and the Framers of the First Amendment certainly intended to preserve that freedom.

The Court said that prior restraint might be allowed in cases of national security, citing Schenck v. United States (1919), or to prevent the publication of obscenity. Here, however, the plaintiffs’ sole remedy was an action for defamation, after the fact.

ELI C. BORTMAN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Mason’s Minnesota Statutes, 1927, 10123-1 to 10123-3
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

See also Blackstone and Common Law Prohibition on Prior Restraints; Defamation and Free Speech; National Security Prior Restraints; Obscenity; Prior Restraints

NEBBIA v. NEW YORK, 291 U.S. 502 (1934)

The New York legislature created the New York Milk Control Board in 1933, which decreed it unlawful for milk to be sold retail at less than nine cents per quart. Leo Nebbia owned and operated a small grocery store in Rochester, New York, where he was convicted of a misdemeanor criminal violation for selling two bottles of milk at a lower price. The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the conviction on appeal from the New York Court of Appeals. The majority held that New York’s price fixing scheme did not abridge Nebbia’s right to due process or equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment, with four justices dissenting.

The case held that a state’s police power permitted it to regulate and fix prices where the state deemed that a public interest in the long-term stability of milk prices outweighed the private rights of consumers and business owners to be free of state interference in trade. The Court rested its holding on the principle that a state is free to adopt whatever economic policy may be reasonably deemed to promote public welfare, and to enforce that policy by legislation adapted to its purpose. The courts are without authority either to declare such policy, or, when it is declared by the legislature, to override it.

Although this principle of judicial restraint was viewed as a significant departure from substantive due process precedent by the dissenting justices, it is now viewed as a precursor of decisions upholding key elements of the New Deal. Nebbia remains the archetype of contemporary constitutional adjudication with respect to economic liberties.

LAWRENCE G. SALZMAN

See also Economic Regulation; Economic Rights in the Constitution; Substantive Due Process

NEBRASKA PRESS ASSOCIATION v. STUART, 427 U.S. 539 (1976)

Although decided over twenty-five years ago, one of the most important cases for resolving the conflict between free press and fair trial remains Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart.

A young man was arrested for the brutal killing of six members of one family in their home in Sutherland, Nebraska, a small town of about 850 people. News of the crime attracted widespread publicity, and the lower court issued an order prohibiting the press from reporting certain information about the defendant and the crime until the jury was impaneled.

In Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, the Supreme Court considered whether it violated the First Amendment for a court to issue an injunction against the press to stop pretrial reporting. The Court unanimously struck down this restraint on the press. The majority noted that prior restraints are presumptively invalid under the First Amendment. To overcome this presumption, those seeking the restraint must prove (1) that the publicity generated in the absence of such an order would be so prejudicial that the defendant could not receive a fair trial, (2) that there are no alternative measures to mitigate the effect of the publicity, and (3) that the prior restraint would be effective in ensuring a fair trial. According to the majority, the restraining order here failed because none of these elements were satisfied.

The Nebraska Press standard has proven virtually impossible to satisfy. Questions remain, moreover, about the application of the test, and whether gag orders on trial participants, rather than the press, are a constitutionally acceptable way of reconciling the conflict between freedom of the press and the right to a fair trial.

MARCY STRAUSS

NEUTRAL REPORTAGE DOCTRINE

Unless a defendant who defamed another came with in a common law privilege, the defendant could not escape liability by claiming that the defamation was newsworthy. Furthermore, the person repeating a defamation originating with another could also be liable for defamation. To protect those who reported governmental activities, the common law created a qualified privilege as long as they provided a fair and accurate report or summary of executive, legislative, or judicial proceedings and were not solely motivated by malice. An absolute privilege already protected these public officials for what they said and wrote in the course of their duties.

With the rise of mass media some advocates sought to expand the privilege beyond the reporting of governmental proceedings to any newsworthy item. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Edwards v. National Audubon Society (1977) adopted this expanded “neutral reportage privilege.” The Second Circuit held that when a responsible organization makes serious charges against a public figure, the First Amendment protects the neutral reporting of those charges even if the reporter has serious doubts about their truth.

The Supreme Court has not adopted neutral reportage and most jurisdictions do not use the doctrine. Those courts rejecting it have noted that it contradicts Supreme Court decisions and that the media are already amply protected against defamation lawsuits. Uncertainty exists as to whether the doctrine extends to the defamation of private persons, how far a reporter can go in acting maliciously, or who decides what is newsworthy.

MICHAEL J. POLELLE

References and Further Reading

- Dobbs, Dan B. The Law of Torts. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000.
- Polelle, Michael J., and Bruce L. Ottley. Illinois Tort Law. 3rd ed. Newark, NJ: LexisNexis Publishing, 2003.
- Sanford, Bruce W. Libel and Privacy. New York: Law & Business/Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1985.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Edwards v. National Audubon Society*, 556 F.2d 113, 120 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1002 (1977)

NEW DEAL AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

Although in power for more than twelve years, the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt had little concern for civil liberties per se, nor did it have much interest in civil rights. Economic recovery constituted the chief item on the agenda of the New Deal from March 1933 until September 1939, and after that preparation for and winning a world war shoved all other issues to the side. While the Roosevelt administration's record does not compare badly to Wilson's heavy-handed assault on dissent, it still left much to be desired. The fact that attorneys general like Francis Biddle, Frank Murphy, and Robert Jackson did care about civil liberties no doubt ensured that at least some attention would be paid to the matter.

During the prewar years, labor appeared to be the chief beneficiary of the New Deal. As late as 1934, the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) noted pessimistically that "alarms are widely expressed over alleged dictatorship by the President, the abrogation of States' rights and the vast economic power of the federal government." By 1936, however, the ACLU recognized that the government had done a complete turnabout; the greatest threat to liberty came not from the government, but from "the resort to force and violence by employers, vigilantes, mobs, troops, private gunmen, and compliant sheriffs and police."

The change in the Roosevelt administration's attitude resulted from its disillusionment with the actions by business owners and managers during the first New Deal. Management had been willing enough to take the benefits offered by the government, but it had not kept its part of the bargain in regard to labor. The second New Deal, with its commitment to labor through the Wagner Act and the National Labor Relations Board, scrutinized far more critically the gross violations of civil liberties that workers suffered at the hands of anti-union management, often aided by state and local authorities.

In early 1936, a Senate subcommittee chaired by Robert M. LaFollette, Jr., of Wisconsin, began to investigate charges that workers' rights, especially free speech and assembly, had been violated. The LaFollette committee detailed the lengths to which management had gone to crush labor, including the use of private armies, spies, intimidation, and agents provocateurs, as well as the involvement of corrupt local officials. Following the violence of the Little Steel strike of 1937, the committee publicized how employers had continuously flouted the Wagner Act, broken the laws, and disregarded civil liberties. These practices, of course, had been employed for nearly a half-century, ever since workers had seriously begun organizing into unions. But now, for the first time, workers could look past hostile bosses and uncaring local officials to the federal government for help; the Wagner Act put the law on their side. Moreover, the Depression had led to a loss of faith in business, so that the public now viewed with suspicion management's claims that radicals and subversives caused labor strife.

Much of the civil liberties agitation in the mid- and late 1930s resulted from efforts by American workers to organize and bargain collectively. Unlike previous periods of labor unrest, however, workers now had potent allies. The national government, especially the Department of Labor and the Labor Relations Board, actively supported organized labor, as did much of the Democratic majority in Congress. The Roosevelt appointees to the Court fully sympathized with labor goals, unlike the anti-union justices of the Taft years. Labor in particular and civil liberties in general also received strong support from academics and from younger lawyers who had imbibed the attitudes of the "realists" or the civil liberties views of such influential law teachers as Ernst Freund, Felix Frankfurter, and especially Zechariah Chafee, Jr.

Civil libertarians, remembering the Wilson administration's attacks on speech and press and the Palmer campaign against aliens, dreaded the prospect of American involvement in another war. The fact that war required some limits on individual rights could hardly be denied, although opinions varied widely on where to draw the line. Many people wanted to shut down the activities of American fascist groups, and the administration did investigate, harass, and suppress the speech of pro-Nazi speakers. As historian Richard Steele noted, "[T]he dozens victimized for their utterances and associations during World War II did not approach the thousands prosecuted for sedition during World War I." But the memory of the excesses of the earlier war remained vivid in the minds of Justice Department officials, and for the most part they refused to prosecute all but the most pro-Nazi groups.

The example of the European dictatorships provided a salutary warning of what should not be allowed to happen here. Despite the Dies Committee's calls to act against dissidents, the president's public promise to sustain free speech and press, the definite civil liberties commitment of Attorney General Francis Biddle, and the absence (except on the West Coast) of the anti-alien hysteria that had swept the country in 1917–1918 all contributed to sustaining a relatively healthy civil liberties climate during the war.

Since many of the worst abuses during World War I had resulted from prosecutions of alleged subversives under state criminal laws, the Roosevelt administration moved quickly to assert sole federal control over internal security, mainly through the Alien Registration Act of 1940. At the 1940 Governors' Conference, the states acceded to the administration's request that all enforcement of internal security essentially be left in the hands of the federal government. A few months later the Supreme Court confirmed federal supremacy in Hines v. Davidowitz (1941). The Court overturned a Pennsylvania alien registration law on the grounds that the federal statute had preempted the field. Attorney General Biddle promoted a policy of cooperation between federal and state law enforcement agencies, but he made it clear that the states should leave alien control, sedition, and other security—related matters to the national government.

The Justice Department did, however, try to control the activities of naturalized citizens of German and Italian origin who had manifested either disloyal or merely dissident behavior. The government sought to revoke their citizenship on the grounds that current disloyal behavior proved they had secured citizenship either illegally or under false pretenses. Within a year of American entry into the war, the Justice Department had initiated over two thousand investigations, and had secured the denaturalization of forty—two people.

As it turned out, the case testing this campaign, Schneiderman v. United States (1943), involved neither a Nazi nor a fascist sympathizer, but a communist; the government based its case on the claim that his Communist Party membership proved that the defendant did not have the “true faith and allegiance to the United States” that citizenship demanded. Wendell Willkie, the 1940 Republican candidate for President, represented Schneiderman and eloquently pleaded with the Court not to establish the principle that a person could be punished for alleged adherence to abstract principles. Writing for a six-to-three majority, Justice Murphy rejected the government’s case. While naturalization constituted a privilege granted by Congress, once a person became a citizen he or she enjoyed all the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, especially freedom of thought and expression. Membership in the Communist Party had not been illegal at the time Schneiderman had taken out his papers, nor had it been established that current membership was “absolutely incompatible” with loyalty to the Constitution. In order to denaturalize a person, the government had to provide “clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence” of illegality or fraud, a burden that it had failed to carry.

The Court also proved cool to prosecutions arising under the old Espionage Act of 1917, with its laundry list of subversive activities apparently aimed as much at punishing deviant behavior as at catching spies or traitors. In Hartzel v. United States (1944), a five-to-four vote overturned the conviction of a man who had distributed racist literature vilifying Jews, Englishmen, and the president, and calling on the United States to form an alliance with Nazi Germany. Although the literature had reached the hands of Army officers, Justice Murphy ruled that the government had failed to prove that the petitioner had intended to subvert the war effort. Murphy insisted on a literal application of the clear and present danger test, and despite the scurrilous nature of the material, he pointed out that Hartzel’s activities had posed no real danger. The Court’s insistence in this and other cases that the government show a clear and present danger, with clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence, for the most part discouraged the Justice Department from prosecuting persons merely for voicing unpopular or even noxious doctrines.

Despite the neutrality legislation, Roosevelt had not been altogether passive, and took steps to protect the internal security of the country. In the summer of 1936, the president met with J. Edgar Hoover, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), who told him that the government had no intelligence data on either communist or fascist activities in the country. Acting on the president’s orders, the FBI, in cooperation with the Department of State, began secretly collecting data on potential subversives. In the next few years, the government secured important information on the identities and activities of foreign agents, and made good use of those files when the nation later went to war.

Congress had similar concerns about subversion, but patriotic zealots there acted with little sense of restraint. In May 1938, the House created a special Committee on Un—American Activities under the chairmanship of Martin Dies of Texas. The highly partisan committee charged that the national government had been riddled with communists, fascists, radicals, and other dangerous persons whom only a thoroughgoing exposure would eliminate. Despite promises from Dies to observe fundamental procedural rights, the committee rode roughshod over civil liberties in its headlong rush to ferret out alleged radicals. It accomplished nothing in terms of identifying subversives, and like other witch hunts, it often smeared innocent people.

Roosevelt, disgusted with the Dies Committee from the start, took much of the wind out of its sails by openly authorizing the FBI to investigate the German—American Bund and other groups under the Foreign Agents Registration Act. Through executive order, he also gave the FBI official supervision of all espionage investigations. As the threat of war increased, congressional concern led to other action, some of it of dubious value. In 1939, Congress tacked on to the Hatch Act a provision prohibiting the employment of communists by the government. In March 1940, Congress updated the 1917 Espionage Act by adding penalties for peacetime violations. In June, an Alien Registration Act aimed primarily at communists included a section allowing the Justice Department to prosecute not only those actually conspiring to overthrow the government, but also anyone who advocated or conspired to advocate its overthrow. Although the government registered and fingerprinted 5 million aliens, it did so courteously and sympathetically. The two attorneys general responsible for alien registration, Robert Jackson and Francis Biddle, tried not to offend the rights and sensibilities of these persons, the large majority of whom proved completely loyal to the nation.

The worst civil liberties violation resulted from the forced relocation of 110,000 men, women, and children of Japanese origin from the West Coast. The relocation program constituted the most serious invasion of individual rights by the federal government in the history of the country. The entire operation proceeded on racist assumptions and brought forth such astounding statements as that of Congressman Leland Ford of California that “a patriotic native-born Japanese, if he wants to make his contribution, will submit himself to a concentration camp.” Despite the absence of even a shred of evidence of disloyalty, the entire Japanese—American population—including native-born citizens—stood condemned, because, as General DeWitt so eloquently put it, “A Jap is a Jap.” In a series of heavily criticized decisions, the Supreme Court approved the program.

In contrast to the treatment of Japanese on the West Coast, it is instructive to see what happened to Italians on the East Coast. After Mussolini’s declaration of war against the United States in December 1941, some 600,000 Italians—more than 10 percent of the entire Italian-American community—remained Italian citizens and were automatically labeled as “enemy aliens.” But the Roosevelt administration had been actively cultivating Italian voters, and the president instructed Attorney General Biddle to cancel that designation. The announcement was made to a cheering 1942 Columbus Day crowd in Carnegie Hall, New York, just weeks before the congressional elections.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Auerbach, Jerold S. Labor and Liberty: The La Follette Committee and the New Deal. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1966.
- Corwin, Edward S. Total War and the Constitution. New York: Knopf, 1947.
- Irons, Peter. Justice at War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Steele, Richard W. Free Speech in the Good War. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1999.
- Tomlins, Christopher L. The State and the Unions: Labor Relations, Law, and the Organized Labor Movement in America, 1880–1960. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Hartzel v. United States*, 322 U.S. 680 (1944)
- Hines v. Davidowitz*, 312 U.S. 52 (1941)
- Schneiderman v. United States*, 320 U.S. 118, 165 (1943) (Rutledge, J., concurring)

NEW HAMPSHIRE CONSTITUTION OF 1784

The history of early constitution making in New Hampshire was marked by popular mistrust of political authority. The interim constitution of January 5, 1776, which established a two-house legislature (without an executive) for the duration of the conflict with Great Britain, was vigorously opposed within the colony. Initially condemned by some in Portsmouth as an unnecessary and impertinent statement of independence, the 1776 constitution was also rejected by the western inhabitants of the New Hampshire Grants, who objected to its eastern-centric apportionment of representation.

In 1778, 1781, and 1782, the New Hampshire Assembly presented drafts of permanent constitutions to the state’s town meetings, each time falling short of popular expectations. It was not until October 31, 1783 that the assembly proposed a plan for government that received the majority assent needed for ratification. Formally accepted in June, the New Hampshire Constitution of 1784 opened with a “bill of rights.”

John Locke, whose philosophy deeply informed early American understandings of government and liberty, had argued people had originally existed in a state of nature and were endowed by Providence with certain natural rights. When, in order to serve the common good and secure their liberties, individuals formed and consented to governments, they necessarily agreed to surrender a portion of their autonomy. Nonetheless, their most basic rights remained inalienable according to Locke. Like many in revolutionary America, New Hampshire freeholders were not satisfied by constitutional recognitions of the people’s sovereignty, which only implicitly assured the protection of personal liberty.

In accordance with the Whig conception of power as ever encroaching upon liberty, it was imperative to the New Hampshire town meetings that their constitution contained an explicit enumeration of “first principles,” provisions that would secure the natural rights of its consenting citizens. Perhaps chief among these were the security of private property and freedom of religion. The prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures and the firewall against an established church that the 1784 New Hampshire bill of rights set up suggest the primacy of these principles. Nonetheless, trial by jury, freedom of the press, freedom of speech (in the legislature), and the right of citizens to assemble and petition their representatives were also expressly safeguarded in the document.

Due to the dissent of its fastidious property-holding populace, New Hampshire did not form a permanent constitution until after the Revolutionary War had been won. The Constitutional Convention would not meet in Philadelphia until 1787, however, and the centrality of the federal Bill of Rights to the ratification of the Constitution of the United States was presaged in the history of constitution making in New Hampshire.

JAMES CORBETT DAVID

References and Further Reading

- Vexler, Robert I., ed. Chronology and Documentary Handbook of the State of New Hampshire. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana Publications, 1978.
- Wood, Gordon S. The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998 [1968].

NEW JERSEY v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985)

In New Jersey v. T.L.O., the Supreme Court held that the assistant vice principal's search of a student's purse in his office did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The Court held that the amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures applies to searches conducted by public school officials, but that school officials need not obtain a warrant before searching a student who is under their authority.

T.L.O. held that the legality of a school official's search of a student depends not on probable cause, but "simply on the reasonableness, under all the circumstances, of the search." Reasonableness, in turn, depends on a two-part inquiry: Was the search "justified at its inception," and was the search as actually conducted "reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place"? Ordinarily a search of a student by a teacher or other school official is justified at its inception when "there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will turn up evidence that the student has violated or is violating either the law or the rules of the school." The search is permissible in scope when "the measures adopted are reasonably related to the objectives of the search and not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction."

T.L.O. determined only students' Fourth Amendment rights. As the Pennsylvania Supreme Court later held in In re F.B. (1999), a search valid under the amendment might violate state constitutional guarantees.

DOUGLAS E. ABRAMS

References and Further Reading

- Abrams, Douglas E., and Sarah H. Ramsey. Children and the Law—Doctrine, Policy and Practice. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2003.
- Davis, Samuel M. Rights of Juveniles: The Juvenile Justice System. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2005.
- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

In re F.B., 726 A.2d 361 (Pa. 1999)

See also In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967); Search (General Definition); Search Warrants

NEW RIGHT

The New Right designates, first, a political grassroots movement that moved to the right of the political spectrum sometime in the 1960s, and culminated in the elections of Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher. The term refers, second, to an intellectual movement that provided support for the policies enacted by new majorities disenchanted with the welfare state.

The New Right has a classic liberal (or libertarian) strand. This is shown by its endorsement of private property rights and freedom of contract against government regulation. The libertarian critique of the welfare state is central to the New Right, and in the realm of constitutional law it is reflected in the New Right's occasional attempts to vindicate Lochner v. New York (1905). (This case is prized by the New Right for its protection of freedom of contract, not necessarily as an example of judicial activism, which the New Right rejects.) However, the New Right has a conservative strand as well. Promoting personal responsibility is the New Right's response to welfare policies, and promoting moral values is the New Right's response to left-leaning social policies that, it thinks, have caused social ills such as family disintegration.

The New Right also tends to endorse originalism, the view that courts should respect the original intent of the framers of the Constitution and not infer rights or powers not expressly recognized in the constitutional text. This view is more conservative than libertarian, because it recommends judicial restraint and discourages judicial innovation.

FERNANDO R. TESÓN

References and Further Reading

- King, Desmond S. The New Right: Politics, Markets, and Citizenship. London: MacMillan, 1987.
- Kymlicka, Will. Contemporary Political Philosophy. 2nd ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Scalia, Antonin. A Matter of Interpretation—Federal Courts and the Law: An Essay. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Schwartz, Bernard. The New Right and the Constitution. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1987.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)

NEW YORK EX REL. BRYANT v. ZIMMERMAN, 278 U.S. 63 (1928)

General principles governing freedom of association in the United States are implied from express guarantees of free speech and assembly, and rights to petition the government for redress of grievances that are found in the First Amendment. Vigorous discussion of the nature and scope of those principles was prompted by Justice Brandeis's rejection of the majority's reasoning in Whitney v. California (1927).

In Bryant, decided one year later, members of the Ku Klux Klan challenged the constitutionality of a New York statute requiring all oath-bound organizations exceeding twenty members to annually register a list of officers and roster of members with the secretary of state. The Klan resisted the mandate to provide a list of its rank-and-file members. The New York Court of Appeals upheld the law as a valid regulation finding that "the legislature may take notice of the potentiality of evil in secret societies and may regulate them reasonably." The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed, finding that there was a "manifest tendency to make the secrecy surrounding its purposes and membership a cloak for acts and conduct inimical to personal rights in public welfare..."

Thirty years later, in NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson (1958), state officials also demanded an organization's membership list. Procedurally, both cases came before the Court upon challenge to a state government's demand for a complete list of the organization's members. In NAACP, the Court affirmed its earlier recognition of a state's interest in remaining generally apprised of group activities within its jurisdiction. However, the Court was careful to distinguish the relevant facts surrounding the two cases. Accordingly, those distinctions produced entirely different outcomes. The line drawn by the Court establishes the government's obligation to maintain public confidence in the unbiased performance of official duties while exercising state police powers, particularly in the areas of public safety and law enforcement.

These landmark cases dealt with membership lists as they related to a state government's attempts at regulation and involvement with Klan activity, respectively. The Court in Bryant noted that the New York legislature had uncontroverted evidence that:

The Klan exacted of its members an oath to shield and preserve white supremacy ... [declaring] any person actively imposing its principles to be a dangerous ingredient in the body politic ... and an enemy to the weal of our national commonwealth; that it was conducting a crusade against Catholics, Jews and Negroes and stimulating hurtful religious and race prejudices, that it was striving for political power and assuming a sort of guardianship over the administration of local, state and national affairs and that at times it was taking into its own hands the punishment, of what some of its members conceived to be crimes.

Justice Harlan, writing for a unanimous Court in NAACP v. Alabama, took judicial notice of the need to protect members of the plaintiffs' civil rights organization. The Court denied Alabama's authority to compel production of the names and address of the NAACP's members, based on a finding that its production order was the result of a government conspiracy with private actors, such as the Klan, to violate the plaintiffs' civil and human rights.

The Bryant Court declared, and the Court in NAACP confirmed, that the right of membership in an association, like most other personal rights must yield to the rightful exertion of police power: "There can be no doubt that under that power, the state may prescribe any reasonable regulation calculated to confine [an organization's] purposes and activities within limits which are consistent with the rights of others and the public welfare."

ROBIN D. BARNES

Cases and Statutes Cited

NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)

Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

NEW YORK TIMES CO. v. SULLIVAN, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)

L.B. Sullivan, a Montgomery, Alabama city commissioner, sued the New York Times, claiming that he had been libeled by statements contained in an advertisement that appeared in the March 29, 1960 issue of the Times. The advertisement, which appealed for funds to support the civil rights movement, said that “thousands of Southern Negro students” were engaged in “non-violent demonstrations in positive affirmation of the right to live in human dignity as guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution” but were encountering a “wave of terror” from “those who would deny ... that document.” Several paragraphs described the “wave of terror”; two of these paragraphs referred to actions taken by the police in Montgomery, Alabama, and they formed the basis of Sullivan’s complaint. He claimed that since he was the city commissioner who supervised the Montgomery Police Department, references to actions taken by the police accused him of contributing to the alleged “wave of terror.”

Sullivan’s case went to trial; the jury found for Sullivan, awarding him $500,000 in damages. The New York Times appealed to the Alabama Supreme Court, which upheld the verdict, and then to the U.S. Supreme Court. The issue before the Court was whether the law applied by the trial court violated the First Amendment. Under Alabama law, a publication was libelous per se if the words used tended to injure someone “in his reputation”; if the person was a public official like Sullivan, this standard was met if the words were such as to injure him “in his public office.” The jury had to find that the words at issue concerned Sullivan, but since he was a public official his position justified their finding that his reputation was damaged by statements reflecting on the agency he directed, that is, the Montgomery Police. Once Sullivan established libel per se, the Times’s only defense was to persuade the jury that the statements in the advertisement were “true in all their particulars,” which was not the case.

The Supreme Court held that Alabama’s law violated the First Amendment:

The constitutional guarantees require ... a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for a defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with “actual malice”—that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.

In arriving at this result, the Court noted the nation’s “profound commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open,” and found that criticism of public officials is an essential part of this commitment, even when the criticism contains factual error. It explained that a rule compelling critics of official conduct to guarantee the truth of all their assertions “on pain of libel judgments virtually unlimited in amount” would lead to “self-censorship” that would inhibit public debate on essential issues.

SUSAN W. BRENNER

References and Further Reading

Rosenberg, Norman L. Protecting the Best Men: An Interpretative History of the Law of Libel. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986.
Rothenberg, Elliot C. The Taming of the Press. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 273 Ala. 656, 144 So.2d 25 (Alabama Supreme Court 1962), reversed by New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History (1791–1917); Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Philosophy and Theory of Freedom of Expression; Self-Fulfillment Theory of Free Speech; State Courts; Theories of Free Speech Protection

NEW YORK TIMES CO. v. UNITED STATES, 403 U.S. 713 (1971)

Factual Background

In June 1967, Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara had Department of Defense staff undertake a study of the history of the American involvement in Vietnam. The study, universally known as “The Pentagon Papers,” was essentially complete by January 1969 and contained 7,000 pages of historical studies and documents spread over forty-seven volumes. It was classified “top secret-sensitive” and only fifteen copies were made; two ended up at the RAND Corporation.

In late 1969, Daniel Ellsberg—a former Marine, Defense Department employee, and RAND employee—and Anthony Russo surreptitiously copied the entire report. In March 1971, Ellsberg provided a copy to New York Times reporter Neil Sheehan. After protracted internal debate, the Times began to print excerpts in the newspaper for Sunday, June 13. By Thursday, Ellsberg had provided some 4,000 pages of the papers to the Washington Post, which started to run excerpts on Friday, June 18, and other newspapers followed suit.

Initially, President Nixon saw the publication as more useful politically, given its unflattering portrait of prior administrations, than harmful to national security. However, nudged by Henry Kissinger and Assistant Attorney General Robert Mardian, Nixon soon decided to seek a judicial injunction against further publication by the Times.

Legal Background

To prohibit publication of truthful, politically salient information raises obvious concerns under the First Amendment, particularly if the prohibition is a prior restraint, preventing communication rather than penalizing it after the fact. In an understanding usually traced back to Blackstone, prior restraints are seen as antithetical to principles of free speech. In Near v. Minnesota (1931), the Supreme Court had held unconstitutional a state court order enjoining publication of articles about corruption and incompetence in law enforcement. But Near observed that the prohibition on prior restraints is “not absolutely unlimited,” and does not apply in “exceptional cases” such as publication of the number and location of troops. The First Amendment question in the Pentagon Papers Case was whether the threat to national security rendered this one of the “exceptional cases.”

Another constitutional issue was also present. No statute authorized the executive to seek or the judiciary to grant the requested injunction. The newspapers’ lawyers argued that under separation of powers principles those branches lacked inherent authority to proceed without legislative authorization.

The Litigation

On Tuesday, June 15, the Justice Department obtained a temporary restraining order (TRO) against further publication by the Times from U.S. District Judge Murray Gurfein in Manhattan. On Saturday, after a one-day trial, Gurfein denied a preliminary injunction because the evidence “did not convince” him that publication of “these historical documents would seriously breach the national security.” A Court of Appeals judge ordered that the TRO remain in place, however, and on June 22 the full Court of Appeals, voting five to three, ruled against the Times, remanding to Judge Gurfein to consider whether disclosure posed “such grave and immediate danger to the security of the United States as to warrant” an injunction.

On Friday, June 18, the government sought a TRO against the Washington Post. District Judge Gerhard Gesell denied the request, but within hours was reversed by a Court of Appeals panel. The following Monday, Gesell heard testimony and denied an injunction. Two days later the full Court of Appeals, voting seven to two, agreed that an injunction was not warranted.

The next day, Thursday, June 24, the Times and the government sought Supreme Court review of the New York and District of Columbia decisions, respectively. The Court granted review on Friday, consolidated the two cases, and heard oral argument on Saturday, a faster schedule than for any other case in its history. The Court released its decision on Wednesday, June 30. The setting, the clash of powerful forces, the intersection of law and politics, and the Court’s stunning speed made this a case rivaled as drama only by Bush v. Gore (2000) two decades later.

The Supreme Court Opinions

The justices were badly splintered. A barebones three-paragraph per curiam opinion merely stated that the government had not met the “heavy burden” required to justify a prior restraint. Each justice wrote an opinion; none was joined by more than two other justices.

Justice Black’s opinion, joined by Justice Douglas, was rhetorically stirring and doctrinally straightforward. Commending the newspapers for fulfilling their essential role in a democratic society, he called the injunctions a “flagrant, indefensible, and continuing violation of the First Amendment.” Black’s opinion, his last as a Supreme Court justice (and what he is reported to have considered his most important First Amendment opinion), was typical of his absolutist approach to free speech cases: Prior restraints are per se impermissible. Justice Douglas, joined by Black, also asserted that prior restraints are always unconstitutional. Acknowledging that the disclosures in this instance “may have a serious impact,” he stressed their importance to the political debate about the war and described “[s]ecrecy in government” as “fundamentally anti-democratic.”

Justice Brennan articulated a standard that left some small room for prior restraints. Speech can be prospectively enjoined only if it will “inevitably, directly, and immediately” produce an extraordinary harm. That extremely high standard had not been met here.

Justices Stewart and White, who joined each other’s opinions, also thought the necessary showing for a prior restraint had not been made, although they found the case much closer. Stewart thought primary responsibility for balancing the secrecy necessary for effective foreign policy against the need for a well-informed public lay with the executive itself. The judicial role was limited: absent a statute or regulations for the judiciary to enforce, courts could enjoin disclosure only on proof that “disclosure ... will surely result in direct, immediate, and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people.”

Justice White was confident that further disclosures “will do substantial damage to public interests” but joined the majority because a prior restraint requires a particularly heavy justification, Congress had not authorized such a remedy, and, given the “massive breakdown in security,” the value of an injunction was “doubtful at best.” White stressed, however, that the First Amendment would not bar criminal sanctions and even identified provisions of the U.S. Code under which a prosecution might be brought. (A later prosecution of Ellsberg and Russo was dismissed because of government misconduct.)

Only Justice Marshall focused on separation of powers issues rather than the First Amendment. He concluded that the courts were powerless because Congress had neither prohibited the challenged conduct nor authorized the executive to seek an injunction.

Chief Justice Burger, Justice Harlan, and Justice Blackmun wrote dissenting opinions; Harlan’s opinion was joined by his two colleagues. All three strongly objected to the haste with which the courts had ruled. They would have enjoined publication to allow full trials and deliberate review. Each voiced concern over the harm that would flow from publication, Blackmun doing so with particular forcefulness. Only Harlan (who, like Black, was writing the final opinion of his career) articulated a legal standard. Describing judicial review of executive decision making in foreign affairs as strictly limited, Harlan argued that if a relevant department head personally determines that disclosure of certain information would “irreparably impair the national security,” the courts must accept that determination. The judicial role would be only to ensure that a foreign relations concern is present and that an authoritative determination has been made.

Impact

Assessments of the decision’s impact are mixed. Almost universally at the time, and in general since, the Pentagon Papers Case has been considered a major victory for press freedom. Yet this is in part the result of how it looked (and how the press, including the victorious litigants, portrayed it). The lack of consensus among the justices, the emptiness of the per curiam opinion, and the fact that three justices in the majority would probably have voted the other way had the case not involved a prior restraint and/or had Congress authorized an injunction, combine to limit the case’s doctrinal impact. Still, the rejection of Justice Harlan’s approach was enormously important, and the case stands out as one of the few instances in which the Supreme Court has not yielded to the government’s claim that a particular limitation on civil liberties was necessitated by concerns of national security. The opinions, the outcome, and the extraordinary speed with which the Court acted sent three influential messages: hostility to prior restraints, the need for independent judicial evaluation of the government’s claims of necessity, and the importance of the press to a functioning democracy.

The incident was of enormous historical importance. In direct and indirect ways it led to Watergate and so, ultimately, President Nixon’s resignation. Creation of the Special Investigations Unit known as the “The Plumbers” in July 1971 was a response to the leak of the papers, and one of its early undertakings was the September 1971 burglary of Ellsberg’s psychoanalyst’s office. Nixon’s preoccupation with leaks, hatred of the press, paranoia, and aggressive attacks on his political enemies—the attitudes and activities that led to his downfall—shifted from simmering to full blown with the Pentagon Papers fight.

MICHAEL E. HERZ

References and Further Reading

- Blanton, Thomas S., ed. The Pentagon Papers: Secrets, Lies and Audiotapes. National Security Archive Electronic Briefing Book Number 48. <http://www.gwu.edu/~nsarchiv/NSAEBB/NSAEBB48/>.
- Ellsberg, Daniel. Secrets: A Memoir of Vietnam and the Pentagon Papers. New York: Viking Press, 2002.
- Gora, Joel M., The Pentagon Papers Case and the Path Not Taken: A Personal Memoir on the First Amendment and the Separation of Powers, Cardozo Law Review 19 (1998): 4:1311–32.

Henkin, Louis, The Right to Know and the Duty to Withhold: The Case of the Pentagon Papers, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 120 (1971): 2:271–80.

Rudenshtine, David. The Day the Presses Stopped: A History of the Pentagon Papers Case. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

Ungar, Sanford J. The Papers and The Papers: An Account of the Legal and Political Battle Over The Pentagon Papers. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000)

Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)

See also Absolutism and Free Speech; Access to Government Operations Information; Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001); Classified Information; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981); National Security and Freedom of Speech; National Security Prior Restraints; Philosophy and Theory of Freedom of Expression; Political Correctness and Free Speech; Self-Governance and Free Speech; Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980); United States v. The Progressive, Inc., 467 F. Supp. 990 (W.D. Wis. 1979)

NEW YORK v. BELTON, 453 U.S. 454 (1981)

In New York v. Belton, the Supreme Court examined the permissible scope of a search incident to arrest, particularly in the context of a vehicle search. The Court had previously developed the search incident to arrest rule primarily to address officer safety concerns and to minimize the potential for destruction of evidence.

Belton was a passenger in a vehicle stopped for speeding. The arresting officer suspected that the car was stolen and ordered all occupants out of the vehicle. He searched the passenger compartment, including a jacket belonging to Belton and discovered cocaine. The trial court found the search permissible under the Fourth Amendment and the Supreme Court affirmed. In a departure from Chimel v. California (1969), in which the Court had limited the permissible scope of a search incident to arrest to “the area within the immediate control of the arrestee,” the Belton Court emphasized the importance of establishing a “workable rule” that is readily applicable to police officers.

The Court determined that an officer may permissibly search the entire passenger compartment of a vehicle, including any closed containers within it, following the arrest of a recent occupant of the vehicle. The Court established this bright-line rule where vehicles are concerned, even though the arrestee may be detained outside the car at the time and may pose no danger of accessing a firearm or other contraband from within the vehicle. In a noteworthy dissent, Justices Brennan and Marshall criticized the majority for abandoning the careful case-by-case analysis of Chimel and its progeny in favor of an “arbitrary ‘bright-line’ approach.”

STEPHANIE ROBERTS HARTUNG

References and Further Reading

Lunney, Leslie A., The (Inevitably Arbitrary) Placement of Bright Lines: Belton and Its Progeny, Tulane Law Review 79 (2004): 365.

Mokovitz, Myron, A Rule in Search of a Reason: An Empirical Reexamination of Chimel and Belton, Wisconsin Law Review 2002 (2002): 657.

Shapiro, Eugene L., New York v. Belton and State Constitutional Doctrine, West Virginia Law Review 150 (2002): 131.

Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968).

United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969)

See also Arrest; Arrest without a Warrant; Automobile Searches; Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969); Exclusionary Rule; Search (General Definition); Seizures; Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)

NEW YORK v. FERBER, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)

Policymakers’ concern over child pornography was negligible to nonexistent during the 1960s and early 1970s. The 1970 report of the Commission on Obscenity and Pornography, organized by President Lyndon Johnson in 1968, gave little attention to the issue. By 1982, however, nearly all of the states and the federal government had targeted the production or distribution of child pornography. Congress, for example, passed the Protection of Children from Sexual Exploitation Act in 1977 prohibiting anyone from employing or inducing a minor to participate in sexual conduct or in the making of pornography. However, the material had to be obscene under the Miller v. California (1973) rule. As a direct result of the Supreme Court’s ruling in New York v. Ferber (1982), in 1984, Congress removed the need to prove obscenity when it passed the Child Protection Act.

At the time of the Ferber decision, at least half of the forty-seven state laws banning the production of sexually explicit material involving juveniles or minors did not require proof of obscenity; twenty of the thirty-five states prohibiting the distribution of this material lacked this requirement. New York's law made it a criminal offense to distribute any material depicting sexual performances by minors under sixteen years of age, and listed examples of the proscribed sexual conduct. Like many other states, the law did not require that the depictions or portrayals be obscene. A jury convicted Ferber of two counts of violating this law after he sold police officers films showing young boys engaged in one of the proscribed behaviors. New York's high court, the Court of Appeals, reversed Ferber's conviction and struck down the law as underinclusive and overbroad, based on its interpretation of Miller v. California.

A unanimous Supreme Court reversed New York's high court, but the majority opinion attracted only five votes as Brennan, Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens concurred only in the judgment. The concurring opinions expressed concerns that New York's law might be overbroad and that it and others like it, as interpreted by the majority opinion, could be applied to works of serious value involving children.

This was the first time that the Supreme Court confronted the issue of child pornography. In conference, Burger noted that traditional obscenity statutes, prohibiting the manufacture, distribution, or in some instances possession of obscene material by adults, did not apply to the persons performing sexual acts. He voted to reverse but the conference split four to four with White passing. White later decided to reverse and was assigned the opinion by Burger.

The Court held that visual depictions of live sexual performances by minors are unprotected by the First Amendment. According to White, states are entitled to "greater leeway" when regulating pornography involving the participation of minors or juveniles, and provides several reasons for why states have compelling interests in these regulations. One is the well-being of minors and the prevention of their exploitation and abuse. The distribution of child pornography, which "is intrinsically related to the sexual abuse of children," creates economic incentives that encourage this abuse; "severe" criminal penalties, he claims, are needed to "dry up the market." The social value of live performances or photographic reproductions of children engaged in lewd sexual behavior, moreover, is "exceedingly modest, if not de minimus." Finally, placing child pornography outside the ambit of the First Amendment's protections because of the "content" of the performance is not inconsistent with earlier Court decisions. Content-based classifications are not rare and may be particularly appropriate when "the evil to be restricted so overwhelmingly outweighs the expressive interests, if any, at stake."

It follows, then, that sexually explicit material involving minors requires adjustments in the Miller test. First, the trier of fact need not find that the material appeals to the prurient interest of an average person; second, the material need not depict sexual conduct in a patently offensive way; and third, the material in question does not have to be considered as a whole. White's opinion, therefore, ratifies the absence in New York's law of the need to establish "obscenity" as defined by Miller. Moreover, nonobscene performances, actual or simulated, as well as depictions of nonobscene sexual conduct involving minors could be banned or prohibited. To limit the reach of this ruling, White stipulates that the kind of conduct states may seek to regulate must be "adequately defined" by the law and confined to performances or depictions of these sexual conducts by children under a specific age.

New laws regarding child pornography soon appeared on the books. In 1985, Congress, recognizing the emerging role of computers as a means of distributing and transmitting child pornography, passed the Computer Pornography and Child Exploitation Act. A further political push came in 1986, when President Ronald Reagan's attorney general, Edwin Meese, released the report of his Commission on Pornography. The Commission gave the issue of child pornography considerably more attention than the 1970 Commission and urged vigorous law enforcement to clamp down on the market for this kind of sexually explicit material.

In 1988, Congress responded with the Child Protection and Obscenity Enforcement Act, which prohibited the use of children in the production of pornographic works. This act also barred the distribution of any obscene material through cable or subscription television regardless of whether minors were involved in it or not. Congress has remained active in this area. For instance, the Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996 made it illegal to distribute or receive child pornography, including virtual child pornography, by any means, although in Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties (2002), the Supreme Court struck down provisions of the law that banned virtual child pornography.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Fraleigh, Douglas. "Reno v. ACLU." In Free Speech on Trial, edited by Richard A. Parker, 298–312. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2003.
- Jenkins, Philip. Beyond Tolerance: Child Pornography on the Internet. New York: New York University Press, 2003.

Kende, Mark S. "The Supreme Court's Approach to the First Amendment in Cyberspace: Free Speech as Technology's Hand-Maiden." Constitutional Commentary 14, no. 3 (1997): 465–80.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties, 535 U.S. 564 (2002)
Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
New York v. Ferber, 438 U.S. 747 (1982)

NEW YORK v. QUARLES, 467 U.S. 649 (1984)

After a woman told officers that she had been raped and that the perpetrator had run into a store carrying a gun, a police officer chased and caught Quarles, the defendant. When he frisked him, the officer noticed that Quarles was wearing an empty gun holster, so after handcuffing him, he asked where the gun was. Quarles responded, "The gun is over there." The gun was recovered and Quarles was read his Miranda rights. The statement and the gun were excluded from evidence by the trial court as illegal fruits of that statement, which was affirmed by the appellate division of the New York Supreme Court and the New York Court of Appeals.

The lower courts based their decisions on the Supreme Court determination that in the course of making an arrest, the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution requires certain protections against compulsory self-incrimination to individuals who are interrogated by police. Because the nature of custodial interrogation is inherently coercive, the court in Miranda v. Arizona (1966) determined that prior to such interrogation a suspect must be warned of his rights. In the case of New York v. Quarles, the Supreme Court reversed the lower courts' decisions, finding a "public safety" exception to the Miranda requirement that warnings be read to a suspect before custodial interrogation. This exception allows police officers to act in exigent circumstances where there is a threat to the safety of the public while permitting admission of evidence gathered.

LISA LEVY

References and Further Reading

Weisselberg, Charles, Saving Miranda, Cornell Law Review 84 (1998): 109.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Miranda Warning

NEWSROOM SEARCHES

The Supreme Court has held that nothing in the Constitution prevents police from raiding newsrooms if they have a valid search warrant (see Zurcher v. Stanford Daily [1978]). The Court rejected arguments by major news organizations that such searches threaten freedom of the press. In dissent, Justice Stewart, joined by Justice Marshall, argued that the press clause of the First Amendment precluded such searches unless there is reason to believe the news organization would not produce the evidence in response to a valid subpoena. Justice Stevens argued that the Fourth Amendment precluded such searches not just of newsrooms, but of premises of all third parties not themselves suspected of crime, unless it was shown that a subpoena would be impractical. But the majority said that the Fourth Amendment applies no differently to third parties than to suspects, and argued that the usual requirement that search warrants be issued only by a magistrate after a showing of probable cause was sufficient to protect against any special dangers to the press arising from newsroom searches.

The decision caused consternation throughout the news industry. Editors and news directors feared that newsroom searches might become a vehicle for disruption and harassment by police and prosecutors. More importantly, they feared that searches would compromise their ability to protect the confidentiality of sources. Because the search warrant procedure provides no opportunity for an advance hearing, journalists argued that confidences could be breached before they have an opportunity to invoke the protections provided by shield statutes or the emerging First Amendment privilege to protect reporter's sources.

The media outcry over the Zurcher decision led Congress to limit newsroom searches by passing the Privacy Protection Act of 1980, 42 U.S.C., Section 2000aa. The statute forbids any official, federal or state, from searching for or seizing "material possessed by a person reasonably believed to have a purpose to disseminate to the public a newspaper, book, broadcast, or other similar form of public communication...." There are some exceptions. The statute does not apply if the person in possession of the materials is a suspect in the offense to which the materials relate, or to evidence necessary to prevent death or serious injury. Materials other than work product may be seized to prevent the material from being destroyed, or if the possessor has failed to turn them over in obedience to a subpoena after exhausting all appeals.

A number of states also passed statutes restricting newsroom searches. These may limit searches by state and local officials even more than the federal statute does. For example, the Texas statute forbids all newsroom searches except for weapons, drugs, or other contraband (see Texas Code Criminal Procedures, Section 18.02).

Since the passage of these statutes, newsrooms searches have been infrequent, and the organizations whose premises were searched have sometimes won lawsuits against the searchers (see, for example, Steve Jackson Games, Inc. v. United States Secret Service [W.D.Tex. 1993], aff'd 36 F.3d 457 [5th Cir. 1994]).

DAVID A. ANDERSON

References and Further Reading

Bayh, Birch, Congressional Response to Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, Indiana Law Review 13 (1980): 835.
Teeter, Dwight L., and S. Griffin Singer, Search Warrants in Newsrooms, Kentucky Law Journal 67 (1979): 847.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Steve Jackson Games, Inc. v. United States Secret Service, 816 F.Supp. 432 (W.D.Tex. 1993), aff'd 36 F.3d 457 (5th Cir. 1994)
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978)

9/11 AND THE WAR ON TERRORISM

After the September 11, 2001, attacks by al-Qaeda on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, President George W. Bush announced a “war on terrorism”—a prolonged fight to disband terrorist cells throughout the world. The Bush administration’s principal weapon in this war has been the asserted exclusive and unreviewable constitutional right to summarily detain, interrogate, and eavesdrop on terrorist suspects, achieved mostly by executive order, military regulation, or other more informal methods.

Despite its express constitutional authority to share warmaking responsibilities with the president, Congress has generally been acquiescent toward the executive on these matters, as exhibited by its fall 2001 enactments of the Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF) and the USA Patriot Act. The AUMF enables the president to use “all necessary and appropriate force” against “nations, organizations or persons” that he believes had a role in 9/11, in order to thwart future acts of terrorism. The Patriot Act, which gives federal officials broad and increased authority to intercept communications and conduct surveillance, includes controversial provisions such as secret “sneak and peek” searches of an individual’s home for an indefinite time period; access without a warrant to medical, library, education, and other records; and the ability to seize, using “national security letters,” a variety of business and financial records while imposing a gag order on recipients. These provisions, widely criticized as an abridgement of privacy and free speech, were drafted by the executive and passed with little consideration by Congress. While some of the most controversial Patriot Act provisions were to sunset on December 31, 2005, Congress agreed to a five-week extension of the Act while it considered legislation that, essentially, reauthorized the provisions with little change.

Primary among the administration’s tools in combating terrorism is the use of preventive detention, often holding individuals, including U.S. citizens, incommunicado, indefinitely, and without probable cause, in military prisons. The Bush administration has relied on presidential war powers to justify these detentions, claiming that these practices are unreviewable by courts.

For example, “enemy combatant” detentions have been used to hold individuals in military prisons incommunicado without any right to counsel or judicial review of status. The designation is unilaterally determined by the president, and because enemy combatants are not considered prisoners of war, they are, under the Bush administration doctrine, denied Geneva Convention rights. Special military commissions have been created by executive order to prosecute enemy combatants for war crimes, but the commission rulings evade civilian review, do not fully comply with courts martial procedures, and otherwise ignore due process norms.

The administration’s claim of unreviewable preventive detention authority has been limited by the Supreme Court. In Rasul v. Bush (2004), the Court ruled that alien detainees outside the geographic United States have access to federal courts to challenge their detention through habeas corpus petitions. In Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004), the Court held that Hamdi, a U.S. citizen captured during combat in Afghanistan and held incommunicado without counsel or process, has the right to counsel and to challenge his status through due process protections before a neutral fact finder.

Perhaps even more important than their holdings, were the Supreme Court’s statements in Rasul and Hamdi, most clearly articulated by Justice O’Connor, that “[a] state of war is not a blank check for the President when it comes to the rights of the Nation’s citizens” and the Constitution “most assuredly envisions a role” for courts “when individual liberties are at stake.”

After Rasul and Hamdi, Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRTs) were established by the military attempting to encompass the due process requirements established by those cases to ensure the lawfulness of enemy combatant detentions. In In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases (2005), one district court held that those CSRTs were so lacking in procedural fairness that they, too, abridged due process. As of this writing, that decision was on appeal.

Two more enemy combatant cases were pending in the Supreme Court as of this writing. In Hamdan v. Rumsfeld (D.C. Cir. 2005), the Court will consider the lawfulness of the executive's creation of the special military commissions to try enemy combatants. In Padilla v. Hanft (4th Cir. 2005), a certiorari petition is pending seeking further review of application of the enemy combatant standard to U.S. citizens arrested on U.S. soil.

Individuals have also been detained by the Bush administration indefinitely without probable cause through the use of material witness warrants to testify in terrorism-related grand jury proceedings. In United States v. Awadallah (2nd Cir. 2003), the Second Circuit reversed a lower court ruling, holding that these detentions violate the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against arrests without probable cause. Material witness warrants continue to be widely used to detain terror suspects indefinitely.

Serious allegations of torture have also arisen in the administration's detention policies. The atrocities at Abu Ghraib, detainee treatment at Guantanamo Bay, and the aggressive interrogation of prisoners held in secret Central Intelligence Agency "black sites," have raised serious concerns about the executive's violation of the antitorture convention and laws.

In response, legislation proposed by Senator John McCain (R-Ariz.) was passed as part of the 2006 Defense Authorization Bill, applying Geneva Convention standards prohibiting cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment of detainees, although a further rider to that legislative proposal, the Graham-Levin-Kyl amendment, undercuts detainee ability to judicially challenge their treatment, and otherwise limits the kind of habeas jurisdiction recognized by the Supreme Court in Rasul.

A further assertion of exclusive and unreviewable executive authority in the war on terror derives from the president's assertion of the right without seeking judicial warrants to spy on U.S. citizen domestic communications made to locations abroad. Bipartisan congressional critics have claimed that this presidential surveillance flatly contradicts warrant requirements of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which expressly provides that it is the exclusive method for conducting intelligence surveillance of U.S. citizens and that abridgement of that statute is subject to criminal sanctions.

Terrorism is concededly a serious threat. The surveillance and detention practices undertaken unilaterally by the President have, nevertheless, raised serious constitutional concerns. The courts and Congress have begun to find that some balance must exist between rights and security. The struggle to accommodate these seemingly conflicting goals remains an ongoing central issue of the war on terrorism.

I. MICHAEL GREENBERGER

References and Further Reading

- Abrams, Norman. Anti-Terrorism and Criminal Enforcement. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West Publishing, 2005.
- Michaels, C. William. No Greater Threat: America After September 11, and the Rise of a National Security State. 2nd ed. New York: Algora Publishing, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF), Pub. L. 107-40, Sections 1–2, 115 Stat. 224 (Sept. 18, 2001)
- Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Convention Against Torture), G.A. Res. 46, U.N. GAOR, 39th Sess., U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1984/72, Annex (1984)
- Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, 50 U.S.C.S. Section 1801 (West 2003 and Supp. 2005)
- Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, 75 U.N.T.S. 135 (Aug. 12, 1949)
- Hamdan v. Rumsfeld*, 415 F.3d 33 (D.C. Cir. 2005), cert. granted 163 L. Ed. 2d 504 (2005)
- Hamdi v. Rumsfeld*, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)
- In Re Guantanamo Detainee Cases*, 355 F.Supp. 2d 443 (D.D.C. 2005) appeal docketed, (D.C. Cir. 2005)
- Padilla v. Hanft*, 423 F.3d 386 (4th Cir. 2005) petition for cert. filed, 74 USLW 3275 (U.S. Oct. 25, 2005) (No. 05-533)
- Rasul v. Bush*, 542 U.S. 466 (2004)
- United States v. Awadallah*, 349 F.3d 42 (2nd Cir. 2003)
- Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001 (USA Patriot Act), Pub. L. No. 107-56, 115 Stat. 272 (Oct. 26, 2001)

See also Due Process; Extremist Groups and Civil Liberties; Grand Jury; Indefinite Detention; National Security; Preventive Detention

NINTH AMENDMENT

That the Constitution of the United States as originally adopted by the Philadelphia convention and submitted to Congress on September 17, 1787, contained no bill of rights is the starting point for considering the meaning of the Ninth Amendment. In his letter of December 20, 1787, to James Madison,

NINTH AMENDMENT

Thomas Jefferson objected that, “[A] bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, general or particular, and what no just government should refuse....” In his letter of October 17, 1788, to Thomas Jefferson, James Madison acknowledged that a “constitutional declaration of most essential rights” would probably have to be added. He wrote that his “own opinion had always been in favor of a bill of rights; provided that it be so framed as not to imply powers not meant to be included in the enumeration,” although he did express the reservation that “experience proves the inefficacy of a bill of rights on those occasions when its controul [sic] is most needed.” He added the skeptical view that “[r]epeated violations of these parchment barriers have been committed by overbearing majorities in every State.”

Indeed, on June 24, 1788, in the Virginia Convention called to consider the ratification of the new Constitution, Patrick Henry was prescient about Madison’s concerns for the implication of specific constitutional language contributing to incorrect inference. “What is the inference when you enumerate rights which you are to enjoy?” His answer was, “That those that are not enumerated are relinquished.” Alexander Hamilton also thought that a Bill of Rights might be dangerous. Hamilton argued in Federalist 84 that the specification of rights, “would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and on this very account would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted. For why declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do?” One answer to these concerns can be found in the Ninth Amendment.

The Ninth Amendment (agreed to on September 27, 1789) contains a straightforward declaration: “The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.” On August 17, 1789, Elbridge Gerry had said that the declaration ought to be “deny or impair,” rather than “deny or disparage,” because the word “disparage” had no plain meaning, but his revision was not adopted. Madison’s first proposal of this article (June 8, 1789) follows:

The exceptions here or elsewhere, made in favor of particular rights, shall not be so construed as to diminish the just importance of other rights retained by the people; or as to enlarge the powers delegated by the constitution; but either as actual limitations on such powers, or as inserted merely for greater caution.

Each version contains the same kernel of meaning: the listing of rights in the Constitution does not mean that there are no others, although Madison’s first version goes further than the eventual provision.

The plain declaration of the Ninth Amendment, and also of Madison’s first proposed formulation of the provision, is consistent with Madison’s understanding of what sort of constitutional government was wanted. Prior to the creation of constitutional government, the people possessed the political power that they might choose to vest in government or retain unto themselves. Thus, by “ordaining and establishing” the Constitution, the people vested only the powers of the federal government that are listed in Article I, Section 8. To be sure, the necessary and proper clause in that section describes the occasion for certain implied powers, but only with reference to the powers previously delegated in Section 8. Indeed, the text of the Tenth Amendment carries forward a provision from the Articles of Confederation which confirms that “the powers not delegated to the United States or prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people,” but with the following important differences: (1) that the word “expressly” is not included as a limited on delegated powers, as confirmed in John Marshall’s opinion in McCulloch v. Maryland (1819); and (2) that the state “sovereignty” is not mentioned.

Just as powers flow from the people to the Constitution, the rights held by the people precede the Constitution, and the listing of rights in the Bill of Rights acknowledges their possession by the people, not the creation of them. That additional nonexpressed rights exist and are retained by the people is the declaration of the Ninth Amendment, and clearly this was consistent with the understanding of Madison and other proponents of a bill of rights, but discovering what rights are retained has been a persistent difficulty.

A leading law review article by law professor John Choon Yoo argues that the Ninth Amendment originally referred chiefly to the affirmative rights of the people to exercise their majoritarian rights through representative government. In part, he inferred this conclusion from the “mini-Ninth Amendments” that were added to state constitutions after the ratification of the federal Constitution. Indeed, even during the debates on ratification of the Constitution certain states, including Pennsylvania, Vermont, and Virginia proclaimed that the people had an inalienable right to reform, alter, or abolish the governments they previously had created. These inalienable rights are the essential rights of a sovereign people to create, alter, or abolish governments. Thus, the rights retained by the people as described in the Ninth Amendment were then seen chiefly as the collective rights of a popular majority, at least in Yoo’s analysis.

It was usually later that individual rights were invoked under the Ninth Amendment. For example, abolitionists argued that natural rights of all men included the right of personal security, the right to personal liberty, and the right to own and enjoy property—hence slavery was a violation of fundamental natural rights protected by the Ninth Amendment. Yoo also argues that the reconstruction Congress intended through the Fourteenth Amendment to make another declaration of unenumerated rights by referring to the protection against state action of the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, which, according to its chief architect, Representative Charles Bingham, would also have made the first eight amendments of the Bill of Rights applicable to the states. The fundamental rights acknowledged by the Ninth Amendment were believed to include both natural and common law rights, such as Blackstone's enumeration of the rights to personal security, personal liberty, and to acquire and enjoy property.

As it later happened, the Ninth Amendment eventually came to be associated most clearly with the right of privacy, that is, the right to be left alone unless a government can demonstrate some compelling reason for interference. While the right of privacy has had several manifestations, the most difficult one has been the right to reproductive freedom, first with respect to contraception in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), and then at its most controversial in the instance of Roe v. Wade (1973), involving a woman's right to terminate a pregnancy.

And the controversy about the rights retained protected by the Ninth Amendment continues still.

DONALD W. JACKSON

References and Further Reading

- Abraham, Henry J., and Barbara A. Perry. Freedom and the Court: Civil Rights and Liberties in the United States. 8th ed. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.
- Hamilton, Alexander. The Federalist (No. 84). New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Yoo, John Choon, Our Declaratory Ninth Amendment, Emory Law Journal 42 (1993): 967–1043.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- McCulloch v. Maryland*, 17 U.S. 316 (1819)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

NIX v. WILLIAMS, 467 U.S. 431, 104 (1984)

Historically, in applying the exclusionary evidence rule (which prohibits the prosecution from using evidence seized in violation of a defendant's constitutional rights), the courts have also applied the “fruit of the poisonous tree” doctrine. This doctrine, which is also referred to as the “derivative evidence rule,” is discussed more fully under the entry entitled “Fruit of the Poisonous Tree” doctrine.

Nix v. Williams established the so-called “inevitable discovery” exception to the derivative evidence rule. This exception provides that, when the police engage in illegal conduct to obtain evidence, they are prohibited from using not only the principal evidence (that was the object of the illegal action), but any evidence derived from the unconstitutional conduct. Basically, if the police can demonstrate that they would have inevitably found the evidence sought to be excluded, then the derivative evidence rule should not apply. In other words, the evidence can be admitted to help determine defendant's guilt.

The Nix case provides not only the foundation for the inevitable discovery doctrine, but its classic illustration. In that case, a man with mental problems was accused of murdering a young girl. At the time of his apprehension, neither the girl nor her body had been found. While the police were transporting the suspect from one city to another, a police officer deliberately elicited a confession from the suspect in violation of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel. From the confession, the police learned the whereabouts of the body and subsequently took gruesome pictures that they sought to introduce at the suspect's trial. The suspect sought to exclude the evidence based on the derivative evidence rule. The court overruled the request, finding that a full-scale search was then being conducted for the body, which would have inevitably been found regardless of the illegality.

The difficulty in most inevitable discovery cases is in proving that the discovery was “inevitable” as opposed to merely “possible.” In Nix, the illegal police conduct (in that case, an illegally obtained confession) led the police to the body, thereby obviating the need for a further search. As a result, the Court could only speculate about whether the body would inevitably have been found had the illegal confession not been obtained. The Court found that the discovery was inevitable because the police had mapped out broad areas that included the place where the body was ultimately found, and were systematically searching the areas. As they finished one area, they proceeded to the next. The Court presumed that the search would have proceeded, as planned, and therefore that the body would have been found. As a result, the Court admitted the evidence.

RUSSELL L. WEAVER

References and Further Reading

- Weaver, Russell L., Leslie W. Abramson, John M. Burkoff, and Catherine Hancock. Principles of Criminal Procedure. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2004.
- Weaver, Russell L., Leslie W. Abramson, Ronald Bacigal, John M. Burkoff, Catherine Hancock, and Donald E. Lively. Criminal Procedure: Cases, Problems & Exercises. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2001.

See also Exclusionary Rule

NIXON, RICHARD MILHOUS (1913–1990)

Richard Milhous Nixon, thirty-seventh president of the United States and a controversial political figure, was born in 1913 in Yorba Linda, California into a Quaker family. After graduating from Whittier College and earning a law degree in 1937 from Duke Law School, the young attorney returned to Whittier to practice law. During World War II, Nixon went to Washington where he served in the Office of Price Administration. He subsequently served as an officer with the U.S. Navy in the Pacific and, he returned home to Whittier after the war to resume his law practice.

Nixon's lifelong passion for politics surfaced in 1946 when he was tapped by a committee of Republican business and professional men to challenge Democratic incumbent, Jerry Voorhis, for a seat in the House of Representatives. In his campaign, the young contender began early on to hone his "take no prisoners" political skills as he exploited the increasingly popular issue of anticommunism. The strategy worked, and he soundly defeated the five-term congressman. In the House, he enhanced his reputation as one of the nation's leading anticommunist crusaders by serving on the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC). He acquired national recognition as HUAC's star investigator in the Whittaker Chambers–Alger Hiss hearings. The serious young congressman received accolades for his dogged, yet careful, sober examination of witnesses.

Anticommunism was also the decisive issue in his senatorial victory in 1950 in a campaign in which Nixon challenged Democrat Helen Gahagan Douglas. Both candidates slung broadsides at each other with wide-ranging accusations of procommunist leanings. Nixon's reputation, however, as a ruthless anticommunist was significantly advanced with his distribution of the infamous "pink sheet" that detailed the similarities between Douglas's voting record and that of Socialist (and probable communist) congressman, Vito Marcantonio. Nixon's red-baiting strategy was enormously successful; he won the Senate seat with a healthy plurality. After only two years in the Senate, Nixon's solid anticommunist credentials brought him to the attention Republican presidential candidate Dwight D. Eisenhower, who needed a running mate that would mollify the conservative wing of the party.

Nixon performed loyally for the Republican Party as vice president, especially as an energetic campaigner for both the President and the Republican Party. In 1960, however, he lost his bid to succeed Eisenhower when charismatic Democrat John F. Kennedy defeated the vice president in an extraordinarily close election. Two years later in 1962, Nixon lost another election, this time to incumbent Democratic California governor, Edmund S. (Pat) Brown. In a maudlin, self-pitying press conference after his defeat, Nixon offered a clue to the problems that would plague his later political career when he blamed the press for his loss, declaring that they would not have him to kick around anymore.

Nixon, however, was not finished with politics and, in spite of his promise that his political career was over, for the next six years he remained a Republican stalwart and loyal campaigner for Republican candidates. By 1968 he had become the titular leader of the party and its candidate for president. He engineered a close victory over Democrat Hubert H. Humphrey with his "Southern strategy," which targeted southerners and northern blue collar workers, former members of the New Deal coalition, who had had enough of Democratic liberalism and youthful war protest. Nixon's appeal to this silent majority changed forever the political complexion of the two major parties and shifted the political center significantly to the right.

This political realignment, however, would not be the distinguishing characteristic of Richard Nixon's political career. Neither would he be most remembered for his considerable foreign policy achievements in his first term: détente with the Soviet Union, diplomatic recognition of the People's Republic of China, withdrawal of most U.S. forces from Vietnam, and Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's mostly skillful navigation through the minefield of Arab–Israeli hostility. It would be the politics of Nixon's "imperial presidency" and his misuse and abuse of executive power that would come to define both his presidency and political career.

The presidential administration of Richard Nixon was focused on politics and political combat. Nixon seemed to view himself always as a victim, under attack by enemies, such as the Congress, the Eastern liberal establishment or the media, who were out to undermine his presidency and blemish his image. This siege mentality, which was exacerbated by Nixon's isolated management style and reliance on a very loyal White House staff, created a modus operandi in the administration that would result in the wholesale abuse of presidential power, based to a significant degree on a wide-ranging disregard for civil liberties and constitutional limitations.

Within the first year of his administration, the president indicated that he wanted in place a domestic intelligence system to be coordinated out of the White House. The Huston Plan (after its author, White House staffer, Thomas Charles Huston), which was presented to Nixon in July 1970 proposed a permanent interagency committee that would oversee a broad range of surveillance activities such as mail openings, burglaries, and infiltration in the pursuit of keeping track of administration “enemies.” The White House did, in fact, maintain a list of such persons who became targets of such surveillance, as well as harassment by various government agencies. Although the plan never got off the ground because of the civil liberties concerns of FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, the activities that Huston proposed would become part of White House solutions to various problems.

Especially troublesome to Nixon and his staff were leaks to the media. Nixon and his two closest advisors, Robert Haldeman and John Ehrlichman, became obsessed with tracking down administration employees who fed information to the press. Wiretaps were routinely installed on the telephones of both staffers and journalists beginning with national security employees in 1969. Wiretapping, however, was not used just for press leaks. Other administration “enemies” such as antiwar protestors and black militants were also the target of electronic surveillance, all in the alleged interests of national security.

The culmination of this paranoia about leaks came with the organization of what came to be called the “Plumbers” unit in 1971. Nixon was enraged when antiwar activist Daniel Ellsberg leaked the Pentagon Papers to the New York Times. Although the papers dealt with the Vietnam policy of previous administrations, Nixon was concerned that he would be pictured as having no control over either his staff or the bureaucracy. He called for the creation of a group that originally was to focus on plugging leaks to the media, although ultimately its members became engaged in covert operations against many other of the administration’s perceived enemies. The group’s first major project was the illegal break-in of Daniel Ellsberg’s psychiatrist’s office in pursuit of information that could be used to discredit Ellsberg. The Plumbers were also used against political targets, especially in the 1972 re-election campaign, working closely with the Committee to Re-Elect the President.

Reprisal against White House “enemies” was not just limited to wiretaps and “black bag jobs.” Nixon and his White House staff blithely used various government agencies to harass administration opponents. The Internal Revenue Service was very frequently asked to conduct audits on journalists, liberal lobbying groups, recalcitrant Democrats, and any other individual or organization that opposed Nixon policies. The FBI was also called into service for electronic surveillance or the harassment of White House opponents through unnecessary background checks. Pressure was put on the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to monitor network programs with regard to “fairness,” and transcripts of Oval Office tapes indicate that Nixon expressed interest in using FCC licensing requirements to retaliate against enemies such as the Washington Post.

The crescendo of this abuse of executive power and its accompanying disregard for constitutional liberties reached its peak during the 1972 presidential re-election campaign. Although Nixon and his staff established a separate organization to coordinate the campaign, the Committee to Re-Elect the President (CREEP), it was clearly the White House and the president who were in charge. From the very beginning, White House staffers saw to it that Democratic contenders were harassed with all varieties of “dirty tricks,” such as sending out invitations to nonexistent Democratic functions and planting false stories in the newspapers about Democratic candidates and their families. The campaign worked diligently at squeezing money out of Republican supporters, sometimes almost to the level of extortion. It was, however, the continuing obsession with “intelligence” that would bring down the Nixon White House. When a team of burglars, tied to CREEP, and ultimately linked to the White House, was apprehended on a bugging mission at the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee in the Watergate office complex in June 1972, the resulting cover-up, with the knowing participation of the president of the United States, was eventually exposed by two young Washington Post reporters and involved the White House in a tangled web of lies and obfuscations. The denouement of the ugly incident came in August 1974 after months of investigations, not only by the press, but also by judicial authorities, a Senate special committee, and a special prosecutor, when Richard M. Nixon, faced with impeachment by the House of Representatives, became the first president to resign. In the course of these probes, the revelation and release of recordings of Oval Office conversations made clear not only the extent of Nixon’s participation in the cover-up of the Watergate break-in, but also the wide-ranging abuse of power in which the White House had been engaged during the president’s tenure. The Articles of Impeachment, passed by the House Judiciary Committee in the last days of July, charged the president with offenses related directly to the obstruction of justice with regard to Watergate, but also more generally with abuse of presidential power in “repeated ... conduct violating the constitutional rights of citizens, imparting the due and proper administration of justice and the conduct of lawful inquiries, or contravening the laws governing agencies of the executive branch and the purposes of these agencies.”

Nixon spent his post-presidential years in California, where he focused on engineering a revived reputation as the U.S. senior expert on foreign policy, and publishing a number of books on the subject. In the final analysis, however, Richard Nixon remains an enigmatic figure. Although passionate about politics, a masterful political strategist and, often intelligent master of public policy, his willingness to go to excessive lengths in pursuit of political success as well as policy objectives certainly diminished the achievements of his presidency.

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

- Ambrose, Stephen E. Nixon: The Education of a Politician, 1913–1962. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.
- . Nixon: The Triumph of a Politician, 1962–1972. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989.
- Bernstein, Carl, and Bob Woodward. All the President's Men. New York: Warner Paperback Library, 1975.
- Kutler, Stanley I. The Wars of Watergate: The Last Crisis of Richard Nixon. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1990.
- . Abuse of Power: The New Nixon Tapes. New York: Free Press, 1997.
- Nixon, Richard M. RN, The Memoirs of Richard Nixon. New York: Grosset and Dunlap, 1978.

NLRB v. CATHOLIC BISHOP OF CHICAGO, 440 U.S. 490 (1979)

Despite the Catholic Church's often-eloquent advocacy of labor unions and of workers' rights, the Catholic hierarchy of the Archdiocese of Chicago refused to accord its lay (nonclerical) faculty teaching in the Church's primary and secondary schools the fundamental human and federal labor law right to unionize. The Church refused to recognize the faculty union, and, consequently, refused to bargain collectively with the union regarding the teachers' wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment. This bitter labor-management struggle for the better part of the decade of the 1970s resulted in a critically important case of first impression decided by the Supreme Court in 1979.

In NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, the Supreme Court was faced with whether the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) had the authority to assert jurisdiction over labor-management relations and practices in Church-operated schools, and thus protecting the right of the teachers to unionize and to bargain collectively.

Chief Justice Burger wrote for the five-to-four majority, finding that the NLRB did not have jurisdiction to investigate the unfair labor practice charges that the teachers had brought against the Bishop, their employer, for the Church's refusal to recognize the union in violation of the National Labor Relations Act.

The NLRB had earlier found that the Bishop had committed such unfair labor practices. The Bishop successfully challenged the NLRB's jurisdiction over the Church as the employer of the teachers in the Church's schools; the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in Chicago reversed the NLRB's decision. The Supreme Court affirmed the Seventh Circuit's decision in favor of the Catholic Bishop of Chicago.

The Supreme Court majority carefully scrutinized the legislative history of the National Labor Relations Act. Chief Justice Burger examined First Amendment separation of church and state underlying principles, summarizing that “the absence of an ‘affirmative intention of the Congress clearly expressed’ fortifies our conclusion that Congress did not contemplate that the Board would require church-operated schools to [recognize] unions as bargaining agents for their teachers.” Because nothing in the legislative history of the National Labor Relations Act affirmatively and expressly stated that the NLRB had jurisdiction over the labor relations of church-operated schools, the Court majority concluded that the board lacked jurisdiction.

Chief Justice Burger concluded:

Accordingly, in the absence of a clear expression of Congress' intent to bring teachers in church-operated schools within the jurisdiction of the Board, we decline to construe the [National Labor Relations] Act in a manner that could in turn call upon the Court to resolve difficult and sensitive questions arising out of the guarantees of the First Amendment religion clauses.

The dissent by Justice Brennan, joined by Justices White, Marshall, and Blackmun, excoriated the majority for neglecting the history of the broad authority of the NLRB over labor-management relations.

The Catholic Church first addressed the rights of workers during the Industrial Revolution. Pope Leo XIII wrote the first great labor encyclical in 1891, Rerum Novarum, On the Condition of the Working Class. This landmark encyclical recognized the primacy of human labor as ends over the means of capital. Pope Leo demanded that the human, civil, and labor rights of workers and their families be protected, including the right to unionize, and the right to just wages and safe working conditions. Virtually every Pope since Leo XIII has reiterated and reaffirmed these rights, perhaps most eloquently Pope John Paul II. In 1981, he commemorated the ninetieth anniversary of Rerum Novarum with his encyclical Laborem Exercens, On Human Work. He insisted on the fundamental dignity and rights of workers, and the subordination of the means of capital to the proper ends of human needs. Pope John Paul also acknowledged the importance of unions and the effectiveness of the strike mechanism in labor disputes. In the pastoral letter on Catholic social teaching and the American economy in 1986, Economic Justice for All, the U.S. Conference of Bishops demanded that all church institutions fully recognize the rights of employees to organize and bargain collectively. Thus, the labor rights for all workers were advocated with specificity by the bishops to protect those working in Church-related institutions.

In light of the Church's unequivocal and powerful pro-labor social teaching, the Chicago Bishop case is particularly pernicious for the cause of human, civil, and labor rights. The Church hierarchy in Chicago took advantage of First Amendment constitutional law in order to avoid collective bargaining with its lay faculty school teachers, blatantly contrary to the Church's century of social and labor teachings.

The Church as an employer has continued to rely on the precedent of NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago. This hypocrisy is glaringly obvious. Catholic employers must courageously begin to practice what the Church has continuously preached. Only then can Catholic labor theory begin to fulfill its promise to transform both itself and the workforce, and to enhance and further human, civil, and labor rights.

Meanwhile, the pernicious ramifications of this decision extend far beyond the labor-management relations within Catholic schools. Indeed, all employees within religiously-affiliated institutions, ranging from hospitals to homeless shelters, can be deprived of their rights to unionize and to bargain collectively under the National Labor Relations Act, trumped by the First Amendment potential for excessive entanglement of government oversight with the internal practices and beliefs of the religiously affiliated employer.

DAVID L. GREGORY

References and Further Reading

Gregory, David L., Catholic Labor Theory and the Transformation of Work, Washington and Lee Law Review 45 (1988): 119.

———, Catholic Social Teaching on Work, Labor Law Journal 49 (1998): 912.

Gregory, David L., and Charles J. Russo, The First Amendment and the Labor Relations of Religiously-Affiliated Employers, Boston University Public Interest Law Journal 8 (1999): 612.

Note: NLRB Regulation of Parochial Schools: A Practical Free Exercise Accommodation, Yale Law Journal 97 (1987): 135.

Pope Leo XIII. "Rerum Novarum (On the Condition of Labor)." 1891. Papal Encyclicals Online. <http://www.papalencyclicals.net>.

Pope John Paul II. "Laborem Exercens (Concerning Human Work)." 1981. Papal Encyclicals Online. <http://www.papalencyclicals.net>.

U.S. National Conference of Catholic Bishops. Economic Justice for All: Pastoral Letter on Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy. 1986. Catholic Social Teaching, Office for Social Justice. <http://www.osjspm.org/cst/eja.htm>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

U.S. Const., First Amendment

National Labor Relations Act, 28 U.S.C. 151 et seq.

See also Religion in the Workplace

NO COERCION TEST

During the 1970s and 1980s, an growing number of legal commentators began to criticize the dominant Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971) test for evaluating claims under the First Amendment's establishment clause. The Lemon test forbade any law whose "primary effect" was to "advance religion," a principle that the Court used to strike down prayer and other religious elements in public schools. Conservative critics of Lemon, convinced that the test is both analytically incoherent and hostile to religion, have proposed as one alternative that the government may advance, favor, or endorse religion as long as it does not coerce anyone to assent to a religious belief or participate in a religious exercise. This standard would validate many government actions that create no real coercive pressure on citizens: creches or menorahs in municipal holiday displays, posting of the Ten Commandments in public buildings, and official statements with religious content such as the national motto "In God We Trust."

The Court first expanded its establishment clause interpretation beyond coercion in the original school prayer case, Engel v. Vitale (1962). Although the state there argued that teacher-led prayers in public schools were permissible because students could decline to participate, the Court answered that "the Establishment Clause, unlike the Free Exercise Clause, does not depend upon any showing of direct governmental compulsion.” Likewise, the Court struck down a government display of a creche in County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union (1989), even though Justice Kennedy’s dissent pointed out that “[p]assersby [were] free to ignore” the creche. The majority held that notwithstanding the absence of coercion, the government “may not celebrate Christmas ... in a way that endorses Christian doctrine.”

Most recently, the majority of the justices confirmed their reading of the establishment clause as extending beyond coercion, when they prohibited a courthouse display of the Ten Commandments that—although not coercive—reflected a government purpose to promote the religious views contained in the Commandments (McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union [2005]). However, four justices dissented on the ground that “[n]o one was compelled to observe or participate in any religious ceremony or activity.” With the replacement of Justice O’Connor—the key swing vote and proponent of the broader “no endorsement” test—by the more conservative Samuel Alito, the future Court may still narrow the establishment clause’s restrictions to cases of government coercion.

Even if a no coercion standard is ultimately adopted, proponents likely would disagree on some of its specifics. The Court in Engel, after stating that the establishment clause reached beyond “direct coercion,” noted that classroom prayers involved subtle, “indirect” pressure even if students in theory could opt out. In Lee v. Weisman (1992), the Court held that school-sponsored prayers at graduation ceremonies also were coercive because there was “social pressure” on a dissenter to stand silently during the prayer—which might be interpreted as acquiescence in its sentiments—even though no one had to join in reciting it. In contrast to this broad definition of coercion, Justice Scalia and two other dissenters would have limited the establishment clause to cases of coercion “by force of law and threat of penalty.”

The coercion test also is ambiguous in cases about government financial aid to religious entities, which involve arguable coercion either way: funding of religious entities requires taxpayers to support them (along with other entities), but denying funding to religious entities while funding secular alternatives arguably pressures citizens to receive education or social services in a nonreligious setting when they would prefer a religious provider.

The debate over the coercion test includes arguments over the original understanding of the establishment clause. Proponents of the coercion analysis point to the long history of government actions passively endorsing or favoring religion. These include presidential proclamations of prayer and thanksgiving, invocations at legislative and court sessions, and the appointment of congressional chaplains—many of which were adopted or approved by the First Congress, which also drafted the First Amendment. Such practices, it is argued, can only be explained by a principle allowing noncoercive endorsements of religion.

Opponents of the coercion test argue that, as in other instances, the framers may have failed to follow all the implications of their constitutional principles, permitting religious actions supporting generalized Protestantism largely because there were few non-Protestants to object. Opponents also point to point to state-level disputes in which programs of support for religion were rejected as “establishments,” even though they did not force anyone to participate in a religion unwillingly. For example, in the 1780s, Virginia and Maryland rejected proposals for tax-supported payments to churches even though, in Professor Laycock’s words, the taxpayer had “the right to designate the recipient of the tax, to pay the tax to secular uses, and in Maryland, to escape the tax altogether by declaring unbelief.” Proponents of the coercion test respond that the Virginia and Maryland bills, like any others involving mandated tax payments, were coercive and were disapproved on that basis.

Turning to analytical arguments, proponents of the coercion test claim that because government can and does endorse many nonreligious moral ideals, forbidding noncoercive endorsements of religion creates “hostility to religion.” For example, if government can celebrate the secular aspects of Christmas but not the religious ones, this will arguably make government an agent of secularizing Christmas. Opponents of the coercion test respond that keeping government “secular” does not make it antireligious, and that ample means exist for private groups to advance religion and counter secularization through displays without government sponsorship.

Opponents of the coercion test also argue that permitting noncoercive endorsements of religion is difficult to harmonize with another central establishment clause principle: that government may not prefer one religious view over others. The Court has called such “denominational” neutrality “the clearest command of the Establishment Clause” (Larson v. Valente [1982]). The conflict arises because virtually any government acknowledgment of religion, however passive or noncoercive, inevitably acknowledges a particular religion. Even generalized references to “God” leave out nontheistic religions and those that worship many gods, and they may also be objectionable to citizens whose religious beliefs are more particular and less ecumenical. Justice Scalia responded in McCreary that the principle of “no preference between religions” applied only to cases involving financial aid to religion, and not to noncoercive acknowledgments of a general monotheism. Proponents of noncoercive endorsements sometimes also suggest that government endorse many faiths—for example, that it erect a creche, a menorah, and other symbols during the winter holidays. But one can question whether such government actions could ever capture the range and nuances of America’s many religious views.

THOMAS C. BERG

References and Further Reading

- Laycock, Douglas, “Noncoercive” Support for Religion: Another False Claim about the Establishment Clause, Valparaiso Law Review 26 (1991): 37–69.
- , “Nonpreferential Aid” to Religion: A False Claim About Original Intent, William and Mary Law Review 27 (1986): 875–921.
- McConnell, Michael W., Coercion: The Lost Element of Establishment, William and Mary Law Review 27 (1986): 933–41.
- Paulsen, Michael Stokes, Lemon Is Dead, Case Western Reserve Law Review 43 (1993): 795–863.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Larson v. Valente*, 456 U.S. 228 (1982)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union of Ky.*, 545 U.S. ____ (2005)

NO ENDORSEMENT TEST

The “no endorsement test” holds that government violates the establishment clause of the First Amendment if it speaks or acts in ways that endorse or disapprove of religion. First announced in 1984 in a concurring opinion by Justice Sandra Day O’Connor, the doctrine has achieved widespread (although far from unanimous) acceptance among judges and legal scholars. The doctrine has recently provoked controversy when applied by federal courts to invalidate the words “under God” in the Pledge of Allegiance and the placement of Ten Commandments monuments on public property.

Evolution of the Test

The “no endorsement” doctrine grew out of dissatisfaction with earlier establishment clause jurisprudence.

In Everson v. Board of Education (1947), the Supreme Court’s first modern establishment clause case, the Court interpreted the First Amendment as erecting a “wall of separation” between church and state that prohibited the state from aiding religion, but the Court did not distill its conclusions into any formal doctrine. Everson did not focus on expressions or symbolic actions by the government; and indeed, five years later in Zorach v. Clauson, the Court itself famously declared that “[w]e are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being.” Later, in Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971), the Court announced a three-part test for assessing establishment clause challenges: a law needed to have (1) a secular purpose and (2) a primary effect that neither advanced nor inhibited religion, and also (3) has to avoid excessive entanglement between government and religion. Again, the Lemon doctrine did not explicitly address the validity of expressions or symbolic actions by government.

In ensuing years, application of the three-prong Lemon test produced what critics widely viewed as chaotic results. In Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), concurring in the decision upholding a city-sponsored Christmas display that included a creche, Justice O’Connor noted this dissatisfaction and proposed the “no endorsement” test as a “clarification” of existing doctrine. In essence, she proposed a shift from the earlier emphasis on a challenged law’s material consequences to its expressive or symbolic aspects—to the “message” it sends. Thus, a law perceived as endorsing religion would be unconstitutional even though it gives no material aid; conversely, a law that does not endorse religion might be upheld, O’Connor said, even though “it in fact causes, even as a primary effect, advancement or inhibition of religion.”

In later cases, Justice O’Connor continued to advocate the “no endorsement” approach in concurring opinions, and in County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union (1989), a second nativity scene case, a majority of justices appeared to embrace it. Later cases both in the Supreme Court and in lower courts have viewed “endorsement of religion” as a factor that can invalidate a law, program, or symbol. However, the courts have not adopted O’Connor’s original suggestion that the establishment clause look to endorsement instead of more material consequences; rather, they have treated endorsement as an additional basis of invalidity.

Whose Perceptions Count?

Because perceptions of a law’s “message” can differ among observers, and because in a religiously diverse country almost anything that government does may be perceived by someone as endorsing or disapproving of religion, in applying the “no endorsement” test the Supreme Court has been forced to consider whose perceptions should control. Since the First Amendment is presumably supposed to protect the rights of individuals and minorities, it would seem perverse to say that a law is invalid only if a majority of citizens perceives an impermissible endorsement. But to say that any citizen’s perception of endorsement or disapproval is enough to invalidate a law would be a recipe for governmental paralysis: What law or action could survive that test?

Justice O’Connor sought to avoid this dilemma by suggesting that the controlling perceptions should be those of an “objective” or “reasonable” observer. Perhaps of necessity, other justices have likewise accepted some such hypothetical observer as the test of validity. Predictably, judges and citizens often disagree about whether a “reasonable observer” would perceive endorsement of religion.

The difficulty was already evident in the nativity scene cases in which the “no endorsement” test originated. In Lynch, Justice O’Connor concluded that a city’s Christmas display did not endorse religion, apparently because the creche was surrounded by other traditional Christmas figures, including reindeer, a Santa Claus sleigh, and a talking wishing well. But later, in Allegheny County, she found religious endorsement in a creche standing alone. The other justices who favored the test concurred. But in the same case they disagreed about the constitutionality of a separate display in which an eighteen-foot-tall Jewish menorah stood alongside a forty-five-foot-tall Christmas tree. Justice Blackmun thought that the tree was in itself a secular symbol, and that its comparatively larger size tended to neutralize the potentially religious message of the menorah. Justice Brennan drew the opposite conclusion, among other reasons because he believed that the menorah was unusually large for a menorah while the tree was of average size for a tree.

The interpretation of what a reasonable observer would perceive is thus a common and central question—and often a hotly disputed one—in “no endorsement” cases. The question bears directly on the often controversial debates about traditional and seemingly religious public expressions or symbolism, such as the national motto (“In God We Trust”) printed on currency or the words “under God” in the Pledge of Allegiance. Justices have said in dictum that these expressions are permissible because they have lost their religious significance through long usage and serve mainly to express confidence in the country or hope for the future. Critics often—and lower courts occasionally—find these saving explanations implausible.

The Pros and Cons of “No Endorsement”

The “no endorsement” test has attractive features that appear to have generated acceptance by a majority of the judges and commentators who have considered it. In her Lynch concurrence, Justice O’Connor linked the doctrine to a constitutional commitment to inclusiveness and equal treatment of citizens. The fundamental meaning of the establishment clause, she suggested, was that religion should not affect a person’s “standing in the political community.” But if government endorses religion, it violates this principle by “send[ing] a message to nonadherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community, and an accompanying message to adherents that they are insiders, favored members of the political community.”

Other justices and commentators have frequently repeated this “inclusiveness” rationale, and they have sometimes supported the doctrine on other (perhaps overlapping) grounds as well. Government messages endorsing religious can be divisive, and the establishment clause is often thought to be designed to avoid such divisiveness. The clause has also repeatedly been said to mean that government must be “neutral” toward religion, and “no endorsement” seems to be a natural corollary of a commitment to neutrality. Finally, the “no endorsement” doctrine is said to be a logical implication of the assumption that government is incompetent, in both a legal and more ordinary sense of the term, to act or pronounce upon religious questions.

Critics have challenged the “no endorsement” doctrine on a variety of grounds. One common objection focuses on the “reasonable observer” device: this hypothetical observer, critics contend, is manipulable and incapable of providing clear guidance. In addition, the device arguably thwarts the purpose of doctrine. As noted, the “no endorsement” doctrine seeks to prevent exclusionary messages that will alienate some citizens. But the “reasonable observer” device means, in effect, that when courts reject claims of endorsement (as they do, and inevitably must, in some cases), they add insult to injury: The courts in effect tell litigants not only that they have lost but that the reason they have lost is that they are not “reasonable” observers.

Another common objection argues that the “no endorsement” doctrine departs from longstanding American traditions reflected not just in occasional expressions such as the Pledge of Allegiance and the national motto or in practices such as legislative prayer or Thanksgiving proclamations, but also in landmarks of our constitutional heritage. Lincoln’s revered Second Inaugural Address, engraved on the wall of the Lincoln Memorial, was a profoundly religious expression from beginning to end. The Declaration of Independence appeals to the “Creator” and “nature’s God,” and some scholars argue that these religious references are not cosmetic but are central to the Declaration’s argument. Indeed, Jefferson’s celebrated Virginia Statute for Religious Liberty began by declaring its essential premise—that “Almighty God hath created the mind free,” so that any infringement of that freedom would depart from “the plan of the Holy author of our religion.” The perverse consequence of the “no endorsement” test, critics contend, is that it would render unconstitutional—as a violation of religious freedom, ironically—the seminal enactment in this country’s achievement of religious freedom.

Prospects

Although relatively recent as a constitutional doctrine, the “no endorsement” test is by now well entrenched in the law. Recurring disputes over matters like the Pledge of Allegiance or the Ten Commandments probably ensure, however, that the test will remain controversial for the foreseeable future.

STEVEN D. SMITH

References and Further Reading

Choper, Jesse H., The Endorsement Test: Its Status and Desirability, The Journal of Law & Politics 18 (2002): 499–536.
 Smith, Steven D., Symbols, Perceptions, and Doctrinal Illusions: Establishment Neutrality and the “No Endorsement” Test, Michigan Law Review 86 (1987): 266–332.

Cases and Statutes Cited

County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)

See also Ceremonial Deism; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947); Lemon Test; Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984); O’Connor, Sandra Day; Pledge of Allegiance (“Under God”); Religion in “Public Square” Debate; Religious Symbols on Public Property; Secular Purpose; Ten Commandments on Display in Public Buildings; Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)

NONCITIZENS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

The extent to which noncitizens enjoy civil liberties in the United States is a complex and unsettled question whose answer may depend on the context in which civil liberties are asserted, the noncitizen’s status, and whether it is the federal or state government regulating the noncitizen. Civil liberties include free expression and association rights, equal protection rights, and procedural and substantive due process rights. Our concept of civil liberties has evolved through time, the modern period reflecting, perhaps, the most expansive view of civil liberties. Similarly, the extent to which noncitizens have enjoyed civil liberties in the United States has changed through time. Different periods of time have generated different levels of protection for the civil liberties of both citizens and noncitizens at the legislative and judicial level. For example, early in the nation’s history, the Alien and Sedition Acts targeted both aliens and seditious speech. The Alien Act granted the president broad authority to deport any alien he judged a danger to the United States. The Sedition Act prohibited any person to utter, print, write, or publish any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language intended to cause contempt or scorn for the United States, the Constitution, or the flag. At the time, the constitutionality of both acts was vigorously debated with James Madison and Thomas Jefferson taking the view that both were unconstitutional and that aliens or noncitizens enjoyed the full protection of the constitution. Others, notably Federalist party leaders, expressed the view that aliens or noncitizens were not parties to the Constitution and, thus, were not protected by it. This debate continues today. Notwithstanding the debate between those who contend that noncitizens are entitled to enjoy the same civil liberties as citizens and those who contend that the Constitution does not protect noncitizens, neither act would likely survive constitutional scrutiny today; seditious libel is protected speech under the First Amendment and most resident aliens or noncitizens are entitled to some degree of due process prior to being deported.

One’s civil liberties may be protected by both legislation and judicial review. Noncitizens, however, may be dependent on Congress for the exercise of civil liberties in a way that citizens are not. Generally, citizens are entitled to enforcement of their civil liberties by the federal courts. Federal courts protect civil liberties by enforcing the various constitutional norms that guarantee them, enshrined particularly in the Bill of Rights, and the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, and Nineteenth Amendments. Noncitizens, however, are not always entitled to strong judicial enforcement of their civil liberties. In fact, in some contexts, noncitizens may enjoy no or few civil liberties other than those granted to them by Congress.

The Supreme Court has held that aliens or noncitizens in the United States are entitled to constitutional protection under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution. This view is consistent with the plain language of the amendments that extend protection in the relevant clauses to “persons,” not “citizens.” Even noncitizens who are undocumented are guaranteed protection by these amendments under the Constitution. However, the extent of protection provided will be affected by the context in which civil liberties are affected. In a series of cases heard by the Court in the late nineteenth century, the Court interpreted the Constitution to give Congress plenary power to provide for the admission and exclusion of aliens to and from the United States. In early expressions of the plenary power doctrine, the Court concluded that in the context of immigration-related decisions, such as decisions involving admission to the United States, exclusion from the United States, and deportation from the United States, noncitizens enjoyed little or no constitutional protection, other than what Congress chose to grant them. Modern federal court treatment of federal regulation of noncitizens in immigration-related matters applies minimal due process protections to noncitizens, but continues to recognize that Congress has great discretion in determining the conditions upon which a noncitizen may remain in the United States and in determining what conduct will result in a noncitizen’s deportation. Thus, the critical difference between a citizen and a noncitizen is that the noncitizen always remains subject to deportation or removal from the United States. The Court has yet to rule that the substantive reasons for deportation or removal are subject to constitutional constraints.

Other civil liberties, such as First Amendment rights, Fourth Amendment rights, or substantive due process rights, when raised in the context of immigration decisions, similarly receive a much lesser level of protection than when raised in nonimmigration contexts. For example, the Court has held that detention of noncitizens, when tied to their deportation or removal from the United States, is not held to the same constitutional standard that would be applied to detention of citizens. Thus, noncitizens may be detained in prisons for long periods of time, without the possibility of bail, while the government determines whether or not they are entitled to reside in the United States. Detention of noncitizens in other, nonimmigration contexts, such as involuntary commitment due to mental illness or in the criminal law context, when arrested for commission of a criminal offense, would be subject to the same extent of constitutional protections accorded to citizens.

The extent to which noncitizens enjoy civil liberties may depend as well on the status of the noncitizen. Noncitizens include persons who have been granted the right to reside permanently in the United States and to become citizens after five years of permanent residence. Noncitizens also include persons who have been granted the right to reside temporarily in the United States whether to engage in tourism, business, employment, or education. Some of these temporary entrants stay in the United States after their visas have expired and become unauthorized aliens. Noncitizens also include persons who have entered the United States without authorization or without documents but who have established de facto residence in the United States. The extent of protection the noncitizen receives may depend, in part, on whether she is a permanent resident alien, a temporary visitor, or an undocumented or unauthorized alien. For example, the Court has reasoned that illegal or undocumented immigrants as a class for equal protection purposes are generally entitled only to rational basis review; thus, laws that target undocumented noncitizens are presumed to be constitutional and require no more than that the government in enacting the legislation have a legitimate interest that is rationally related to the legislative measure. Permanent residents generally enjoy the same civil liberties that U.S. citizens enjoy, including privacy, intimacy, expression, association, equal protection, and due process rights.

Since the federal power over immigration is viewed as plenary with Congress, the Court has distinguished between state regulation of noncitizens and federal regulation of noncitizens. Thus, generally, the Court rigorously scrutinizes state regulations that discriminate against noncitizens who are permanent residents of the United States.

M. ISABEL MEDINA

References and Further Reading

- Alien Act, Chapter 58, 1 Statute 570 (1798).
- Henkin, Louis H., The Constitution and United States Sovereignty: A Century of Chinese Exclusion and Its Progeny, Columbia Law Review 84 (1984): 1.
- Johnson, Kevin R., Los Olvidados: Images of the Immigrant, Political Power of Noncitizens and Immigration Law and Enforcement, Brigham Young University Law Review 1993 (1993): 1139.
- Neuman, Gerald, L. Strangers to the Constitution: Immigrants, Borders and Fundamental Law. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.
- Romero, Victor C. Alienated—Immigrant Rights, the Constitution, and Equality in America. New York: New York University Press, 2005.
- The Sedition Act, Chapter 74, 1 Statute 596 (1798).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698 (1893).
Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U.S. 228 (1896).
Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886).

Suffrage, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 141
 (April 1993): 1391–470.
Spragins v. Houghton, 3 Ill. (2 Scam.) 377 (1840).

NONCITIZENS AND THE FRANCHISE

Although the right to vote is commonly thought to be only reserved for U.S. citizens, no provision in the U.S. Constitution requires U.S. citizenship for the franchise. In fact, noncitizens were able to vote in the United States during early colonial times, and continued to do so through the nineteenth century. Rather than determining voting rights based on citizenship, the criteria used at the time included property ownership, race, and residence. At least one state supreme court countenanced the right to vote of an “unnaturalized foreigner” under its state constitution. In that same case, the court noted that noncitizens voted under the constitutions of ten states were able to vote, since they were “inhabitants” or “freemen” in their respective states. However, by the late 1920s, as a result of nationwide anti-immigrant movements, many state constitutions were amended to disenfranchise noncitizens.

Noncitizens who reside permanently in the United States are members of the political community and are subject to democratic duties such as the payment of taxes and service in the U.S. military. Thus, arguably, they should be able to exercise the right to vote in face of their civic obligations. This argument has met with limited success, and mostly at the local level, where noncitizens have been allowed to vote for particular elections. For example, noncitizen parents of schoolchildren are eligible to vote for school board members in Chicago and New York City. Some localities in Maryland also allow noncitizens to vote and even to hold municipal office.

MARÍA PABÓN LÓPEZ

References and Further Reading

105 Illinois Comp. Stat. Ann. 5/34-2.1(d)(ii).
 Aylsworth, Leon E. “The Passing of Alien Suffrage.” American Political Science Review 25, no. 1 (1931): 114–6.
 Harper-Ho, Virginia, Noncitizen Voting Rights: The History, the Law and Current Prospects, Journal of Law and Inequality 18 (Summer 2000): 271–322.
 Kettner, James H. The Development of American Citizenship, 1608–1870. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1978.
 Neuman, Gerald, “We are the People”: Alien Suffrage in German and American Perspective, Michigan Journal of International Law 13 (Winter 1992): 259–95.
 New York Education Law, Section 2590(c)(3).
 Raskin, Jamin B., Legal Aliens, Local Citizens: The Historical, Constitutional and Theoretical Meanings of Alien

NONCITIZENS AND LAND OWNERSHIP

Private ownership of land occupies a central position in American law, and in the nineteenth century West Coast states, a link emerged between property ownership and citizenship, which is exemplified by how the 1859 Oregon Constitution declared that no “China-man” shall ever own land in Oregon.

An “Alien Land Law” was passed by the California legislature in 1913, granting aliens eligible for U.S. citizenship plenary property ownership rights, but limiting “aliens ineligible to citizenship” to those rights explicitly granted by treaties—here, the relevant 1911 U.S.–Japan treaty did not mention protecting property rights in agricultural land of Japanese residing in the United States.

While facially neutral, this law relied on the federal racial prerequisite to naturalization—one had to be a “free white person” to become naturalized—to bar Japanese farmers from land ownership, and was a response to the success of the Japanese truck farmers in California in the early twentieth century.

Despite the 1913 law, Japanese landholdings increased as Japanese farmers used strategies to circumvent the law such as assigning title in the name of citizen children, with land held in trusts or guardianships, as well as forming title-holding agricultural corporations with noncitizen farmers as shareholders. By 1920, anti-Japanese activists placed an initiative on the ballot outlawing methods used to circumvent the 1913 law. The 1920 initiative passed with a majority in every California county, and resulted in a decline in acreage under Japanese ownership throughout the decade.

Other western states soon followed. Arizona had enacted an Alien Land Law in 1917. Between 1921 and 1925, Washington, Louisiana, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, and Kansas had passed such similar laws. During World War II, Wyoming, Utah, and Arkansas passed Alien Land Laws.

In 1923, the U.S. Supreme Court opined on the constitutionality of these laws. In Terrace v. Thompson (1923), the Supreme Court upheld the Washington Alien Land Law on the ground that a state could rightly restrict property ownership to U.S. citizens and that doing so did not amount to impermissible racial discrimination. Porterfield v. Webb (1923) upheld California’s 1920 initiative amending the 1913 Alien Land Law. In Webb v. O’Brien (1923), Frick v.

Webb (1923), and Cockrill v. California (1925), the Court upheld the 1920 initiative's various restrictions on circumventions of the Alien Land Law.

After World War II, the California law was challenged in Oyama v. California (1948), wherein the U.S. Supreme Court overturned a provision of the 1920 initiative that forbade an "alien ineligible to citizenship" from being a guardian to a minor U.S.-born child on equal protection grounds. The California Supreme Court finally overturned the entire 1920 law in Fujii v. California (1952), and Oregon and Montana followed suit in Namba v. McCourt (1949) and Montana v. Oakland (1955).

Washington's Alien Land Law was repealed in 1966 by ballot initiative. The Wyoming legislature was successfully lobbied by the Alien Land Law Project of the University of Cincinnati Law School in 2001 to repeal its Alien Land Law.

KEITH AOKI

References and Further Reading

- Aoki, Keith, No Right to Own? The Early Twentieth-Century "Alien Land Laws" as a Prelude to Internment, Boston College Law Review 40 (1998): 40.
 Lazarus III, Mark L., An Historical Analysis of Alien Land Law: Washington, Territory & State, 1853–1889, University of Puget Sound Law Review 12 (1989): 197.
 Yamamoto, Eric K., Margaret Chon, Carol L. Izumi, Jerry Kang, and Frank H. Wu. Race, Rights and Reparation: Law and the Japanese American Internment. New York: Aspen, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cockrill v. California*, 268 U.S. 258 (1925)
Frick v. Webb, 263 U.S. 326 (1923)
Fujii v. State, 38 Cal. 2d 718 (1952)
Montana v. Oakland, 129 Mont. 347 (1955)
Namba v. McCourt, 204 P. 2d 569 (1949)
 Oregon Constitution, Article XV, Section 8 (1859, repealed 1946)
Oyama v. California, 332 U.S. 633 (1948)
Porterfield v. Webb, 263 U.S. 225 (1923)
Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U.S. 197 (1923)
Webb v. O'Brien, 263 U.S. 313 (1923)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of

NONPREFERENTIALISM

The Supreme Court has struggled since the mid-twentieth century to articulate some single principle that might guide its decision of cases construing the First Amendment's establishment clause. In Everson v. Board of Education (1947), for example, the Court announced that the clause should be understood to have erected the "wall of separation" between church and state. But a metaphor, however helpful, lacked the precision necessary to resolve specific issues such as the Court confronted in Everson. Accordingly, the majority opinion in Everson more specifically interpreted the principle of separation to forbid laws that aid one religion or all religions, prefer one religion over another, or prefer religion generally over nonreligion. It summed up the essence of the establishment prohibition as requiring government to maintain a posture of neutrality both among various religions and between religion and nonreligion.

Neither Everson's catalogue of prescriptions nor its principle of neutrality seemed sufficient to resolve the myriad establishment issues that the Court was called upon to decide in the decades after Everson. Eventually, it codified in Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971) a test for interpreting the establishment clause. This test prohibited government action lacking a secular purpose or secular effect, or which amounted to an excessive entanglement between government and religion. Still later, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor convinced the Court—at least for a time—to supplement the Lemon test with a reformulation of its essential prohibition articulated in terms of a ban on government endorsement of religion. According to O'Connor, the essence of the establishment prohibition was to prevent government from making an individual's beliefs or lack of belief relevant to that individual's standing as a citizen.

More than a few observers of these doctrinal developments have expressed dissatisfaction with the overall tenor of the Court's establishment clause jurisprudence, insisting that the Court's decisions have been pervasively hostile to religious belief and practice. Some of the Court's critics have argued that its various doctrinal formulations are inconsistent with long-established forms of government support for religion, such as congressional chaplains and presidential proclamations establishing national days of thanksgiving and prayer. The same critics have been quick to note that the Court's own sessions begin with a religious invocation: "God save this honorable Court." They suggested an alternative interpretation of the establishment clause, one that would permit government to support religion, so long as the support is nonpreferential. This view—known as nonpreferentialism—specifically repudiates the idea that government must remain neutral as between religion and nonreligion. So long as government maintains neutrality among various religions, it has satisfied the requirement of the establishment clause. The nonpreferentialism position has the support of several scholars and has been offered as the correct reading of the establishment clause by one Supreme Court justice—Justice William Rehnquist.

The Rehnquist Dissent in Wallace v. Jaffree

Then-Associate Justice Rehnquist chose a dissent in Wallace v. Jaffree (1985) as the occasion for urging a fundamental re-examination of the meaning of the establishment clause. The case involved one of the varieties of “moment of silence” laws that sprang up in the wake of the Court’s school prayer cases—Engel v. Vitale (1962) and Abington School District v. Schempp (1963). In Engel, the Court invalidated the state-sponsored recitation of a prayer in public schools composed by the state’s board of regents. Subsequently, in Abington, the Court extended this holding to declare unconstitutional state-sponsored Bible readings and recitations of the Lord’s Prayer in public schools. Opponents of these decisions argued that the Court had banished prayer from the public schools and, after attempts to gain passage of a constitutional amendment allowing state-sponsored prayer failed, began to champion in the 1980s laws creating “moments of silence” in which school children might, if they chose, either meditate or pray. In Wallace v. Jaffree, the Court held unconstitutional an Alabama statute that had provided for a “moment of silence” in public schools. Most of the justices of the Court, in separate opinions, expressed the view that at least some such statutes might be constitutional. Nevertheless, a majority of the justices concluded that the legislative history of the Alabama law revealed an intent on the part of the state legislature to return prayer to public schools. The law thus lacked a secular purpose in the eyes of the Court’s majority, and was unconstitutional under the Lemon test.

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Rehnquist proposed that the Court revisit its jurisprudence under the establishment clause. In particular, he urged the Court to dismantle the “wall of separation,” which he claimed was a metaphor that distorted the meaning of the First Amendment. Parsing the debates about the proposed amendment in the First Congress, Rehnquist concluded that these debates revealed only an intent on the part of Congress to prohibit the establishment of a national church or the preferential treatment of one religion over another. He also argued that the separation metaphor ignored a variety of historical practices in the United States, reaching back to the founding period, such as the designation of national days of thanksgiving and prayer. Rehnquist was confident about what the clause did not prohibit: It did not require government to remain neutral between religion and nonreligion, and it did not prohibit nondiscriminatory aid to religion. Since the “moment of silence” statute at issue in Wallace amounted to no more than nondiscriminatory support of religion generally, it did not, in Rehnquist’s view, violate the establishment clause.

The Arguments against Nonpreferentialism

Many scholars believe that the nonpreferentialism position does not do justice either to original understanding of the First Amendment or to the diversity of American religious experience. Although nonpreferentialists claim the authority of history, critics of the position dispute the nonpreferentialist reading of the nation’s early history. For example, James Madison is sometimes recruited in support of nonpreferentialism, partially through his original suggestion that the First Amendment prohibit establishment of a national religion. Nevertheless, it is clear from Madison’s letters and—even more—from his Detached Memoranda, discovered only in the twentieth century, that he believed that practices such as the appointment of chaplains for the houses of Congress and the declaration of national days of prayer were national establishments of religion and, thus, unconstitutional. Furthermore, as Justice David Souter argued in his concurring opinion in Lee v. Weisman (1992), the First Congress considered variant readings of the establishment clause that would have clearly embraced the nonpreferential position. That body, however, rejected these readings in favor of the final prohibition against laws “respecting an establishment of religion,” a formulation that is arguably the most expansive prohibition of all it considered.

Many opponents of the nonpreferential position contend that the various historical practices on which it relies are themselves contrary to the establishment clause. Madison himself, who authorized a national day of prayer and thanksgiving during the War of 1812, later concluded in his Detached Memoranda that this authorization was not consistent with the establishment clause. He was apparently willing to tolerate some deviations from the antiestablishment principle as de minimus violations. Others have suggested similar grounds for accepting certain forms of civic religiosity. Justice William Brennan, for example, argued in his dissent to the Court’s opinion in Lynch v. Donnelly (1984) that some forms of public religiosity amount to “ceremonial deism”—that is, forms of religious expression that have, through ceremonial repetition, largely lost their religious content. Other observers have insisted that all forms of public support for religion, no matter how trivial, amount to breaches in the “wall of separation” and therefore violations of the establishment clause.

The nonpreferentialism position argues that government ought to be allowed to provide nondiscriminatory aid to religion. Nevertheless, the very possibility of there being forms of support for religion that are, in fact, nonpreferential is itself a dubious proposition, certainly in the context of modern American religious diversity. For example, it is doubtful whether there are any prayers agreeable to all believers or any support for some religions that is not, at the same time, contrary to the beliefs of other religions. So-called nondenominational prayers almost always privilege particular theological visions over others, such as a personal God over an impersonal one, for instance. At most, nonpreferential support for religion amounts to support compatible with a number of religions, and not targeted to please a narrow spectrum of religious sensibilities.

Although Justice Rehnquist argued in his Wallace dissent for the adoption of nonpreferentialism, he did not subsequently reiterate this position. Moreover, no other justice on the Court has signified support of this specific position, although Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy, and Clarence Thomas, along with Chief Justice Rehnquist, have been largely hospitable to attempts to recognize a greater latitude for government to support religious belief and practice. A majority of the Court, though, continues to reject the nonpreferentialism position in favor of the requirement that government remain neutral not only between religions but also between religion and nonreligion. Nevertheless, the Court still occasionally approves practices such as legislative prayer that are not readily consistent with its stated doctrine.

TIMOTHY L. HALL

References and Further Reading

- Adams, Arlin M., and Charles J. Emmerich. A Nation Dedicated to Religious Liberty: The Constitutional Heritage of the Religion Clauses. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.
- Cord, Robert L. Separation of Church and State: Historical Fact and Current Fiction. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1988.
- Curry, Thomas J. Farewell to Christendom: The Future of Church and State in America. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Garry, Patrick M., Religious Freedom Deserves More than Neutrality: The Constitutional Argument for Nonpreferential Favoritism of Religion, Florida Law Review 57 (2005): 1–52.
- Laycock, Douglas, “Nonpreferential” Aid to Religion: a False Claim about Original Intent, William and Mary Law Review 27 (1985/1986): 875–923.
- Levy, Leonard W. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment. 2nd rev. ed. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
- Marsh v. Chambers*, 463 U.S. 783 (1983).
- Smith, Rodney K., Nonpreferentialism in Establishment Clause Analysis: A Response to Professor Laycock, St. John’s Law Review 65 (1991): 247–63.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abington School District v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

See also Accommodation of Religion; Ceremonial Deism; Civil Religion; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment Clause: Theories of Interpretation; No Endorsement Test; Rehnquist, William H.; Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

NORTH CAROLINA CONSTITUTION OF 1776

By April 1776, advocates of American independence from Great Britain had assumed a dominant role in North Carolina politics. As a result, planning for a new state government there moved rapidly in the spring, summer, and fall of that year. On May 11, the provincial legislature passed an interim constitution, establishing a council of safety, composed of only thirteen members, in which complete authority was vested pending the convention of a popularly elected legislature on November 12. Before the elections, voters were informed that the representatives they chose were to meet with the express purpose of drafting and adopting a permanent constitution. In little more than a month, the new legislature accomplished its task. Under pressure from constituent instructions, the body had been compelled to include a “declaration of rights” explicitly enumerating and safeguarding a number of “first principles.” At the outset of the American Revolution, many colonists harbored deep suspicions of political authority, and they sought to ensure the observance of natural rights in the face of what they saw as the encroaching essence of power.

Until the late seventeenth century, the Crown had been sovereign in the British Empire. After the Glorious Revolution of 1688–1689, however, ultimate governing authority resided in Parliament. Things were to be different in the aspiring new nation across the Atlantic, and the first article of the North Carolina declaration of rights vested sovereignty not in the executive or legislature, but in the people. The American conception of mixed government was also clearly articulated in the Constitution of 1776, which provided for the balancing of separate and distinct branches of government. This represented an important departure from the unwritten English constitution, in which a balance of social orders as embodied in the king, House of Lords, and House of Commons was the ideal. In addition to these theoretical and structural features, North Carolina's declaration of rights contained securities for several specific civil liberties. Protection against arbitrary imprisonment, the right to trial by jury, freedom of the press, the right to bear arms (and the absence of a standing army), freedom of assembly, the right to instruct representatives and petition them for the redress of grievances, and freedom of religious worship were all expressly acknowledged in the document.

The articles of North Carolina's declaration of rights were hardly conceived de novo. Rather, they reflected the ideological landscape of colonial British North America generally and the influence of the Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland constitutions in particular. Nonetheless, the influence of the Whig view of power and Lockean natural rights philosophy are manifest in the document. Along with similar sections in several other early state constitutions, the declaration of rights in the North Carolina Constitution of 1776 provided a model for the federal Bill of Rights.

JAMES CORBETT DAVID

References and Further Reading

- Adams, Willi Paul. The First American Constitutions: Republican Ideology and the Making of the State Constitutions in the Revolutionary Era. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, published for the Omohundro Institute of Early American History and Culture, 1980.
- Vexler, Robert I., ed. Chronology and Documentary Handbook of the State of North Carolina. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana Publications, 1978.
- Wood, Gordon S. The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, published for the Omohundro Institute of Early American History and Culture, 1998.

NORTH CAROLINA v. ALFORD, 400 U.S. 25 (1970)

When defendants in criminal cases enter pleas of guilty, they are generally doing so because they committed the crime with which they are charged. However, there are some circumstances under which a defendant might decide that it is in his best interest to enter a plea of guilty even if he has not committed a crime. In North Carolina v. Alford, the U.S. Supreme Court addressed the issue of whether a court could accept a guilty plea if the defendant claims that he did not commit the charged offense.

Henry C. Alford was charged with first-degree murder, a crime that carried a potential death sentence if convicted by a jury. The prosecutor agreed to accept a guilty plea to second-degree murder in the case, a charge that carried a possible sentence of two to thirty years' imprisonment. Alford agreed to accept this plea offer because, although he claimed innocence, he feared that he would be convicted and sentenced to death if he took his case to trial. The trial court accepted the guilty plea, but the appellate court overturned Alford's conviction. The U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear the case and held that a defendant need not admit guilt to enter a plea of guilty in a criminal case, as long as the guilty plea represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among alternatives available to the defendant, and there are sufficient facts to support the conviction.

JUDITH M. BARGER

References and Further Reading

- Cohen, Neil P., and Donald J. Hall. Criminal Procedure: The Post-Investigative Process, Cases and Materials. 2nd ed. New York: LEXIS Publishing, 2000.
- Cook, Julian A., All Aboard! The Supreme Court, Guilty Pleas, and the Railroad of Criminal Defendants, University of Colorado Law Review 75 (2004): 863.

See also Guilty Plea

NORTH CAROLINA v. PEARCE, 395 U.S. 711 (1969)

In North Carolina v. Pearce, the Supreme Court addressed two issues involving the sentencing upon reconviction of individuals who have successfully attacked their original convictions: whether the Constitution requires that they be given credit toward the new sentence for time already served on the original sentence, and the constitutional limitations on imposition of a harsher sentence for the same offense after retrial.

Justice Stewart writing for the Court found the double jeopardy clause of the Fifth Amendment as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment "protects against multiple punishments for the same offense" (citing Ex parte Lange [1894]). A failure to give full credit toward the new sentence for the portion of the original sentence served violates this protection. Thus, all time previously served by the individual on the original sentence must be subtracted from the sentence imposed at retrial.

On the second question, the Court held neither the protection against double jeopardy nor the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides an absolute prohibition against imposition of a longer sentence upon reconviction. Justice Stewart held that vindictiveness or the punishment of an individual for successfully challenging his original conviction would be a patent violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. As a protection against such motivation, the Court required that the imposition of a longer sentence upon retrial must be accompanied by a statement in the record of the judge's reasons for a harsher sentence. The court also indicated these reasons must be based upon "identifiable conduct on the part of the defendant occurring after the time of the original sentencing proceeding." Subsequent cases have limited the application of the presumption of vindictiveness from a silent record.

VANCE L. COWDEN

References and Further Reading

Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794 (1989).
North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969).
Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465 (1976).
Texas v. McCullough, 475 U.S. 134 (1986).
United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368 (1982).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ex parte Lange, 85 U.S. 163; 18 Wall. 163 (1894)

See also Double Jeopardy: Modern History; Due Process

O'BRIEN CONTENT-NEUTRAL FREE SPEECH TEST

In United States v. O'Brien (1968), a federal statute that made the destruction of a draft card a crime was challenged by a demonstrator who burned his card as a symbolic act of protest against the Vietnam War. The Court upheld this application of the statute by invoking a novel standard that has come to be known as the “O'Brien rules” or the “O'Brien content-neutral free speech test.” Although the standard was announced for that particular case, the rules were not by their terms limited to regulations of symbolic expression and the Court has used the O'Brien rules to determine the validity of various types of content-neutral time, place, and manner regulations.

Under the O'Brien rules, government regulation that applies to a form of expression is constitutional if: (1) it is within the constitutional power of government, (2) it furthers an important or substantial governmental interest, (3) that interest is unrelated to the suppression of speech, and (4) the restriction it incidentally imposes on speech is no greater than necessary to further that interest. Note that the O'Brien rules do not explicitly require that the regulation be content neutral. In Members of the City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent (1984), however, the Court upheld an ordinance that prohibited the posting of signs on various kinds of public property by first characterizing the ordinance as content neutral and then applying the O'Brien rules. That case implicitly suggests that a requirement of content (or at least viewpoint) neutrality is to be added to the rules when they are used to test a time, place, and manner regulation. This view finds further support in cases such as Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence (1984), a case sustaining a prohibition against camping in certain public parks as applied to demonstrators, and Ward v. Rock Against Racism (1989), dealing with restrictions on volume of sound at outdoor performances, where the Court said that the standards governing content-neutral time, place, and manner regulations are “essentially the same” as the O'Brien rules.

This essential similarity between the O'Brien rules and the Court’s “normal” “time, place or manner” test is particularly important in determining what standard of scrutiny is appropriate under the fourth prong of the O'Brien rules: that “the restriction it incidentally imposes on speech is no greater than necessary to further that interest.” While the plain language of this prong sounds like the “least restrictive alternative” test normally employed in heightened scrutiny, the Court in Ward stated clearly that content-neutral time, place or manner regulations should be judged under the “narrowly tailored” standard, rather than the “least restrictive alternative” test. Accordingly, if the O'Brien rules and the test for content-neutral regulations are essentially similar, then prong four of O'Brien should be read as requiring only that the regulation be narrowly tailored.

The Court derived the O'Brien rules in a case that involved symbolic expression, burning a draft card as an expression of political protest, and has subsequently applied the rules to regulation of various types of symbolic speech. In Texas v. Johnson, for example, the Court struck down a Texas statute prohibiting anyone from defacing or damaging a flag "in a way that the actor knows" will be offensive to observers. Justice Brennan's majority opinion held that the law was unconstitutional, in part because the flag desecration statute failed O'Brien's third prong: the statute was not "unrelated to the suppression of speech"; rather, it was explicitly aimed at preventing desecration of the flag as a form of protest. One year later, in United States v. Eichman (1989), the Court struck down a federal statute, enacted in reaction to Texas v. Johnson (1989), that criminalized defacing, defiling or burning the flag, with Justice Brennan again writing a majority opinion finding that the statute had the impermissible purpose of seeking to suppress desecration of the flag as a form of expression.

The Court's application of the O'Brien rules to regulation of nude and topless dancing has engendered significant criticism, however. In a 1991 case, Barnes v. Glen Theatres, Inc. (1991), the Court upheld an Indiana statute that banned public nudity, which had been challenged by the owners of two adult cabarets on the ground that it infringed on their constitutional right to present the nonobscene erotic messages conveyed by totally nude dancing. Here, applying the O'Brien rules, Justice Rehnquist's plurality opinion emphasized that the statute was aimed at regulating conduct rather than at suppressing speech and was justified by the state's traditional interest in regulating conduct to promote order and morality. The plurality conceded that nude dancing was expressive conduct within the outer perimeters of the First Amendment, but argued that this did not undercut its validity because the measure was not aimed at preventing nude dancing, but at banning nudity. The effect of the ordinance on nude dancing was incidental, the plurality held, because the requirement that a dancer wear pasties and a G-string did not deprive her dance of whatever erotic message it was intended to convey. It simply made the message less graphic. But Justice White's dissent on behalf of four members of the Court argued that the statutory ban was premised on the erotic content of the message conveyed by nude dancing. It therefore discriminated on the basis of content and thus should not be evaluated under the O'Brien rules for content-neutral regulations but rather under strict scrutiny, which it could not survive.

The Court revisited the nude dancing issue again in 2000 in City of Erie v. Pap's A.M. (2000), involving a Pennsylvania statute similar to the one upheld in Barnes, that had been ruled unconstitutional by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court because it had the "unmentioned purpose" of suppressing erotic expression. The Court upheld the statute, with a plurality affirming that government restrictions on public nudity should be evaluated under the O'Brien rules for content-neutral restrictions on symbolic speech.

ALAN C. WEINSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- Braverman, Daan, William C. Banks, and Rodney A. Smolla. Constitutional Law: Structure and Rights in Our Federal System. 5th ed. Newark, NJ: LexisNexis, 2005.
- Metromedia, Inc. v. City of San Diego*, 453 U.S. 490 (1981).
- Ross, Susan, Reconstructing First Amendment Doctrine: The 1990 [R]Evolution of the Central Hudson and O'Brien Tests, Hastings Communications and Entertainment Law Journal, 23 (2000–2001): 4:723–50.
- Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee*, 505 U.S. 672 (1992).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barnes v. Glen Theatres, Inc.*, 501 U.S. 560 (1991)
- City of Erie v. Pap's A.M.*, 529 U.S. 277 (2000)
- Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence*, 468 U.S. 288 (1984)
- Members of City Council of City of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent*, 466 U.S. 789 (1984)
- Texas v. Johnson*, 491 U.S. 397 (1989)
- United States v. Eichman*, 486 U.S. 310 (1989)
- United States v. O'Brien*, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
- Ward v. Rock Against Racism*, 491 U.S. 781 (1989)

O'BRIEN FORMULA

The O'Brien formula originated from the case United States v. O'Brien (1968). In that matter, O'Brien burned his draft registration card in protest of the Vietnam War. He was arrested and convicted for violating a federal law criminalizing the destruction of draft cards. O'Brien argued that his actions were protected as symbolic speech under the First Amendment's freedom of expression. In a seven-to-one decision, however, the Supreme Court upheld the conviction by establishing a test to determine when governmental regulation involving symbolic speech (conduct combining both "speech" and "nonspeech" elements) is justified.

The O'Brien formula states that conduct combining both elements can be regulated if four requirements are met:

1. The regulation is within the constitutional power of the government.
2. It furthers an important or substantial governmental interest.
3. That interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression.

4. The incidental restriction on First Amendment freedoms is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of the governmental interest.

In its O'Brien decision, the Supreme Court reasoned that First Amendment guarantees do not permit destruction of a draft registration certificate. The Court maintained that regulation of the draft is within the government's constitutional power and that the government's interest in the efficient functioning of the Selective Service System is substantial. Since the government has a substantial interest in regulating draft registration, any infringement on O'Brien's right to symbolic speech was merely incidental. Therefore, O'Brien could be charged with criminal conduct for burning his draft registration card.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Arbetman, Lee P., and Edward L. O'Brien, eds. Street Law: A Course in Practical Law. 6th ed. Lincoln, IL: National Textbook Company, 1999.
- Texas v. Johnson*, 491 U.S. 397 (1989).
- Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 3rd ed. New York: West Publishing Company, 1999.
- Willis, Clyde E. Student's Guide to Landmark Congressional Laws on the First Amendment. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- United States v. O'Brien*, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

OBSCENITY

Introduction

Despite the various uses of the word "obscene," the Anglo-American law of obscenity since the mid-nineteenth century has been concerned primarily with the sexual connotations of the word. Obscenity laws regulate sexually explicit materials. Among the enduring questions of political theory that such laws implicate are speculations on the essence of human nature, the relationship between law and morals, and the appropriate role of the state in a democratic society that values certain fundamental individual liberties (most notably in this context freedom of expression).

If one of the purposes of law is to provide order and security to society, an inevitable question arises: What are the threats to society posed by such materials? One might intuitively answer that individuals immersed in sexually explicit material may be incited to commit a variety of crimes, sexual or otherwise (such as violence against women). But even in the absence of overt antisocial behavior, may not such materials demean the individual and blunt his or her moral and aesthetic feelings, in turn leading to a general weakening of the moral fabric of society? Consider, however, the 1970 report of the Commission on Obscenity and Pornography, a presidential commission appointed by Lyndon B. Johnson to investigate the possible harms created by what at the time was considered an unprecedented flood of sexually explicit material. The report (delivered to Richard Nixon, Johnson's successor) concluded that there was no evidence that "exposure to explicit sexual materials plays a significant role in the causation of delinquent or criminal behavior." The report also doubted whether obscenity causes other types of antisocial behavior. In fact, given evidence that repeated exposure to such materials led to lowered levels of arousal, the commission concluded that ending legal restraints might also lead to a diminished interest in pornography.

President Nixon rejected the commission's conclusions and recommendations, characterizing them as "morally bankrupt," and analogized the relationship between free speech and pornography to that between liberty and anarchy. As Richard F. Hixson notes in Pornography and the Justices, it must have been "unthinkable for Americans, who have always felt a need to regulate obscenity, to cease and desist.... Empirical data pitted against belief structure seldom wins the day." (But as Nixon undoubtedly understood, playing to belief structures wins on election day.)

In 1986, President Reagan's attorney general, Edwin Meese, headed a new commission on pornography and reported on experimental studies concluding that exposure to violent pornography was related to greater willingness to behave violently in laboratory experiments. Critics responded that the most such studies show is that depictions of any violence, erotic or not, correlate with more violence in laboratory experiments. These critics also pointed to the continuing lack of evidence that nonviolent sexual depictions increase aggressive or violent behavior.

Early Legal Concepts and Developments

All of the states that ratified the First Amendment had laws making either blasphemy or profanity a crime, and some states made it a crime, in the words of the Massachusetts Bay Colony statute, to disseminate "any filthy, obscene, or profane song, pamphlet, libel or mock sermon.” In the early nineteenth century, many municipalities also made criminal distribution of obscene printed materials—although none of these laws, state or local, defined “obscurity.”

In Anglo-American law, the first widely accepted judicial test for deciding obscenity derived from an English case, Regina v. Hicklin (1868). Lord Chief Justice Cockburn described the test for obscenity in this way: “whether the tendency of the matter ... is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall.” The work involved in this case was a familiar anti-Catholic diatribe, The Confessional Unmasked; Shewing the Depravity of the Romanish Priesthood, the Iniquity of the Confessional and the Questions Put to Females in Confession. The tract was far more political and religious than sexual, but Cockburn found it obscene because it would suggest to young persons (of either sex) “impure and libidinous” thoughts.

Under the Hicklin test, obscenity was decided on the basis of the impact of parts of the offending material (rather than the work as a whole) on the most susceptible individuals. The test took no account of the author’s intent. If the work was adjudged obscene, improper motive was implied. In essence, the basis for censorship became isolated passages, and their potential to corrupt was measured by the corruptibility of the most innocent and vulnerable.

At about the same time in America, an expanding market for pornography after the Civil War collided with a quintessential American Puritan, Anthony Comstock, who spearheaded a crusade for direct government involvement in the suppression of obscenity. Comstock’s overwhelming concern was sexual, as opposed to religious, obscenity. In 1865, Congress had passed the first statute prohibiting the shipment of obscene books and pictures through the mails. In 1873, Congress passed the so-called “Comstock Act,” an omnibus antiobscenity bill. In 1876, the Act was amended to label obscene publications “non-mailable.” Comstock was appointed a special agent by the postmaster general to enforce the law, which he did with sometimes manic fervor until his death in 1915.

American judges followed their English counterparts and allowed seizure of or prosecution for materials that tended to deprave and corrupt those whose minds were susceptible to immoral influences, especially sexual influences. Among the typical materials seized as obscene in this era (1873–1936) were advertisements for contraceptives, descriptions of the biology of human reproduction, sympathetic discussions of homosexuality, and accounts of incidents of fornication or sodomy.

In 1896, the U.S. Supreme Court began its foray into obscenity law when it reviewed two lower-court convictions. In one, it upheld the conviction of a New York publisher who had mailed “indecent” pictures of women in violation of the Comstock Act. Justice John Marshall Harlan (I) approved of the trial judge’s use of the Hicklin test. Six weeks later, the Court overturned the conviction of a defendant who mailed a newspaper article containing language that the Court found “coarse and vulgar” but not obscene. Obscenity, the Court held, concerns words that “signify that form of immorality which has relation to sexual impurity.”

In 1913 in a federal district court case, United States v. Kennerly, Judge Learned Hand characterized the Hicklin test as consistent with mid-Victorian morals but not contemporary American ones. Hand lamented its tendency “to reduce our treatment of sex to the standard of a child’s library in the supposed interest of a salacious few...”

Hand did not suggest a better test, but in 1933, in United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses,” Federal District Judge John M. Woolsey proposed a test that would examine the impact or dominant effect of the whole book on the average reader of normal sexuality, coupled with an evaluation of the author’s intent. Using that test, Woolsey concluded that James Joyce’s Ulysses, while unusually frank in some of its passages, was not written solely for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Woolsey’s opinion was upheld by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. Judge Augustus Hand (a cousin of Learned Hand), approving the “work as a whole” approach, argued that the sexually explicit passages in the book portrayed the thoughts and feelings of the novel’s characters and were not meant “to promote lust or portray filth for its own sake.”

Judge Learned Hand (who by now had been promoted to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals) returned to the fray in 1936 in United States v. Levine. The “isolated passages” approach, Hand wrote, was one that “[n]o civilized community not fanatically puritanical would tolerate....” The work in question must be judged in its totality. “If it is old, its accepted place in the arts must be regarded; if new, the opinions of competent critics in published reviews or the like must be considered.”

As early as 1930 in Near v. Minnesota, the Supreme Court had suggested (without directly addressing the question) that obscenity is not protected by the First Amendment, but it was not until 1941 that the Court said so directly and unequivocally (although still relying on assumption rather than reasoned constitutional argument). The case was Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire. The opinion by Justice Frank Murphy is based on what came to be known as the two-tiered theory of the First Amendment—some speech is protected, some is not. The case involved a conviction for using so-called “fighting words” (defined by Murphy as “those which by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace”). Murphy argued that fighting words are similar to obscenity and lewdness and libel. All such expressions “are no essential part of any exposition of ideas, and are of such slight social value as a step to truth that any benefit that may be derived from them is clearly outweighed by the social interest in order and morality.” Note that as lower-level “worthless” speech, totally outside the realm of constitutional protection, obscenity could be punished without any proof of threat to society. Unlike “fighting words,” the Court offered no definition of obscenity. (In a 1952 case, Beauharnais v. Illinois, Justice Felix Frankfurter, without any further definition or elaboration, equated obscenity and group libel, describing both as outside “the area of constitutionally protected speech.”)

Following World War II, not only babies were booming. Pornography came into its own—soldiers carried pornography home from overseas, and a whole new generation of pulp literature flourished. The first issue of Playboy, featuring a buxom Marilyn Monroe on the cover, appeared in December 1953, followed soon by less pretentiously smutty scandal magazines like Confidential and Keyhole. At the same time, lurid paperbacks proliferated. And again, eros and thanatos clashed, with a new wave of decency campaigns worthy of Comstock’s crusaders. But the new Comstockians now seemed like throwbacks out of the mainstream. The battleground shifted from Times Square to the courtrooms as efforts by law enforcement officials to suppress pornography brought a new wave of litigation, making inevitable and necessary the Supreme Court’s addressing directly the question of the definition of obscenity and the precise constitutional status of obscene expression.

From Roth-Alberts to Miller

In 1957, the Court decided two cases, Roth v. United States and Alberts v. California, involving respectively a federal and a state obscenity statute. Justice William J. Brennan, writing for the Court, argued that the First Amendment protected all ideas “having even the slightest redeeming social importance....” Obscenity, however, had been condemned by history and by the Court (citing Chaplinsky), and thus Brennan held that it was “not within the area of constitutionally protected speech.”

Brennan went on to reject the argument that the state bears the burden of proving that any given allegedly obscene material was related to antisocial conduct; if obscenity is without constitutional protection, then the government can control it without any further justification.

The Court also drew an important (and frequently misunderstood) distinction between sex and obscenity. Sex is a vital component of the human experience, and portrayals of sex (as in art, literature, or scientific works) are entitled to full constitutional protection, unless the work “deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest,” in which case it is obscene. Elaborating on this distinction, Brennan articulated what came to be known as the Roth-Alberts test for obscenity: “[W]hether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest.”

Essentially, Brennan held that material is obscene and thus entitled to no constitutional protection if it appeals to a prurient interest in sex, has no redeeming value (either literary, artistic, political, or scientific), and is (in its totality, not just in isolated portions) offensive to the average person reflecting contemporary community standards.

Thus, a single word—“prurient”—became the key to distinguishing between allowable discussions or portrayals of sex and sexual activity, and proscribed obscenity. Justice Brennan defined the word in this way: “[i]tching; longing; uneasy with desire or longing; of persons, having itching, morbid, or lascivious longings; of desire, curiosity, or propensity, lewd....” As Professors Nowak and Rotunda observe, it is “possible that material can be prurient and political; that it can be possessed of a tendency to excite lustful thoughts and contain profound social commentary....” That insight, they surmise, explains Chief Justice Earl Warren’s concurrence in these cases, in which he argued that the conduct of the defendant, not the obscenity of the material, is (or should be) the primary concern of the courts. Justice Harlan (II) in a separate opinion pursued this point, arguing that obscenity is an abstraction that cannot be solved in the generalized way Brennan chose. Instead, Harlan opted for a case-by-case approach that would allow courts to take into account the unique value and individuality of every communication. The constitutional standards “do not readily lend themselves to generalized definitions” so that “the constitutional problem in the last analysis becomes one of particularized judgments” to be made by appellate courts themselves. (He also argued that states have considerably more leeway to regulate obscenity, consistent with the Fourteenth Amendment, than the federal government possesses under the First Amendment.)

Finally, Justices William O. Douglas and Hugo Black dissented, and what they wrote is often cited as a prime example of their First Amendment absolutism. They averred that obscenity, however defined and in whatever context, is still a form of expression, and no expression can be punished under our constitution unless “it is so closely brigaded with illegal action as to be an inseparable part of it....” (Eleven years later Douglas would make a similar criticism of the Court’s revised clear and present danger test in Brandenburg v. Ohio [1969].) Allowing the state to punish speech that has an undesirable impact on thoughts “is drastically to curtail the First Amendment....”

Some critics denounced the Roth decision as another example of the Warren Court’s liberal activism, paving the way for pornographers to ply their trade with few restraints. Others welcomed the effort to make obscenity standards more precise, and thus give some notice to those who dealt in sexually explicit materials, as well as providing some guidelines for legislators and prosecutors who did not want to run afoul of the First Amendment. Many cautioned that the decision raised more questions than it answered.

A foreshadowing of future difficulties came in 1964 in Jacobellis v. Ohio. The Court held that a trial court’s finding that material was obscene was not binding on review; the appellate court taking the case would have to watch the movie or read the book to make “an independent constitutional judgment on the facts of the case as to whether the material involved is constitutionally protected.” The definitional problems were vividly illustrated by Justice Potter Stewart’s comment in Jacobellis: “I shall not today attempt further to define the kinds of material I understand to be embraced [by the word obscenity] and perhaps I could never succeed in intelligibly doing so. But I know it when I see it, and the motion picture involved in this case is not that.” (Stewart further muddled the waters when he equated obscenity with pornography, though he qualified pornography with the adjective “hard-core”—also presumably identifiable only through the Stewart eyeballing test). It was becoming painfully obvious that the Supreme Court could not agree on any more precise formula to apply consistently to allegedly obscene material.

In 1966 in A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Attorney General of Massachusetts, the Court reviewed the conviction under a Massachusetts obscenity statute of the book known as Fanny Hill. In overturning the conviction, Justice Brennan held that each of the three elements of the Roth-Alberts rule had to be applied independently, and material cannot be obscene if it meets any one of them. The work in question was something of a classic of ribald literature, written in 1748–1749 in England, and Brennan concluded that therefore it could not be found “utterly without redeeming social value” (Emphasis in original). Now, it seemed, the prurency of the work was not the focus of inquiry as it had appeared to be in Roth.

That same year, Justice Brennan wrote for the Court again in Ginzburg v. United States. The materials involved here were arguably not obscene, and possessed of social value, but Brennan focused on the publisher’s efforts to market the materials, which Brennan characterized as “commercial exploitation of erotica solely for the sake of their prurient appeal.” Paradoxically, Brennan did not even discuss the question of the social value of the publications, grounding his decision only on what he characterized as “pandering” by publisher Ralph Ginzburg, and leaving unanswered the question of why intent to appeal solely to prurient interests can outweigh the social value of the materials.

The Court in this period also disagreed on the proper understanding of “contemporary community standards.” Some justices favored a national community standard (and some only for federal prosecutions); others favored local community or state standards, with greater or lesser degrees of flexibility.

Beginning with Redrup v. New York in 1967, the Court overturned an obscenity conviction in a per curiam decision without an opinion—a practice that would be followed thirty times over the next six years. As Justice Brennan would later explain (in 1973 in Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton), convictions were reversed for any materials “that at least five members of the Court, applying their separate tests, deemed not to be obscene.”

The Miller Test

By 1973, the Warren Court had given way to the Burger Court, and several other changes in personnel made it possible for a five-justice majority, for the first time since Roth, to coalesce on a new test for obscenity. The case was Miller v. California.

Chief Justice Warren Burger wrote the opinion of the Court. Burger began with certain fundamentals, affirming, for example, that there are “few eternal verities” in matters literary, artistic, political, or scientific, and that courts must remain sensitive to any infringements on freedom of speech or the press. Thus, statutes designed to regulate obscenity must be carefully limited. Nonetheless, the fundamental notion of Roth remained—obscenity is not protected by the First Amendment.

Burger then articulated the test for obscenity (one that continues to be followed). The “basic guidelines” for trial courts determining obscenity must be

(a) whether ‘the average person, applying contemporary community standards’ would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest; (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value.

Element (c) of Burger’s formulation was a reaction to the “utterly without redeeming social value” test utilized in earlier decisions. Burger argued that the standard required the prosecution to prove a negative (the work has absolutely no social value)—a burden “virtually impossible to discharge under our criminal standards of proof.” Presumably the shift from “utterly” to “serious” was meant to give juries a bit more leeway to find materials obscene. (In Pope v. Illinois in 1987 the Court held that, unlike prurience, the value of a work does not vary from community to community—the standard is whether a “reasonable person” would find value in the material taken as a whole.)

The Court gave examples of patent offensiveness: “(a) Patently offensive representations of ultimate sexual acts, normal or perverted, actual or simulated; (b) Patently offensive representations of masturbation, excretory functions, and lewd exhibition of the genitals.” (In Ward v. Illinois [1977], an obscenity case involving sadomasochistic materials, the Court held such materials could be constitutionally proscribed even though they were not among those listed in Miller. The Court argued that the Miller specifics “were offered merely as ‘examples’ ..., they ‘were not intended to be exhaustive.’”)) Particularly interesting is Justice Brennan’s dissent in another obscenity case handed down the same day as Miller. Brennan’s primary concern was that all of the Court’s obscenity standards, from Roth to Miller, were intolerably vague and therefore threatening to fundamental First Amendment values. He would not say that the state’s interests in this area are trivial or nonexistent, but nonetheless “these interests cannot justify the substantial damage to constitutional rights ... that inevitably results from state efforts to bar the distribution even of unprotected material to consenting adults.” Brennan allowed an exception for “distribution to juveniles or obtrusive exposure to unconsenting adults....” Additionally, he would allow state regulation of the manner of distribution of sexually oriented material. But the tastes of consenting adults were off limits. A more pristine example of John Stuart Mill’s “harm principle” is difficult to imagine. (In a 1990 interview with Nat Hentoff, Brennan stated: “I put 16 years into that damn obscenity thing.... I tried and I tried, and I waffled back and forth, and I finally gave up. If you can’t define it, you can’t prosecute people for it.”)

Special Problem Areas

Protection of Minors; Private Possession: Even Justice Brennan conceded that when it came to minors, different rules may apply. In Ginsberg v. New York (1968), the Court found constitutional a statute that defined obscenity in terms of an appeal to the prurient interest of minors. But the Court has also held in a variety of contexts that statutes designed to protect children must be narrowly drawn and must meet familiar First Amendment proscriptions on overbreadth and vagueness.

A more recent concern has been child pornography and the frequent abuse of children used to create such materials. In 1982 in New York v. Ferber, the Court in essence created a new category of speech that was unprotected by the First Amendment—sexually explicit but not constitutionally obscene materials depicting sexual activity by minors. The Court upheld Ferber’s conviction under a New York state statute making it a crime to knowingly promote sexual performances by children under the age of sixteen by distributing material depicting such performances. Ferber himself was not engaged in the production of child pornography; he merely sold pornographic films. To Ferber’s dismay, one of his customers was an undercover police officer.

Justice Byron R. White wrote for the Court, arguing that the state’s interest in protecting the physical and psychological health of minors is a compelling one, and that the harm to children used in the production of such materials is magnified by their sale and distribution, and concomitant increase in demand for the product. White added that if there is a legitimate need to portray sexual conduct by minors, it can be achieved through the use of models over the statutory age who look younger.

Relying on Ferber, the Court in Osborne v. Ohio in 1990, held that the state could prohibit the possession and viewing of child pornography at home. The defendant had cited a 1969 Supreme Court decision, Stanley v. Georgia, which had held that “mere private possession of obscene matter” in one’s home is not a crime. The Court thought the distinction between the two cases was clear—in Osborne, unlike Stanley, the state was not relying for its defense of the statute on the paternalistic interest in regulating Osborne’s thoughts and feelings. Rather, the state's purpose was to protect the child victims of such pornography by destroying the market at every point in the production/distribution chain, right down to private ownership and use of the material.

In Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition (2002), the Court overturned part of the Child Pornography Protection Act of 1996 (CPPA) that included within the realm of federally prohibited child pornography so-called "virtual pornography," that is, sexually explicit images which appear to be real children but are created either by using adults who look like children or by using computer imaging. To the extent that the law prohibited virtual child pornography it was unconstitutional because the materials were not produced through the exploitation of real children.

The Internet and Sexually Explicit Materials: In 1997 the Court overturned various provisions of the Communications Decency Act of 1996 (CDA) in the case of Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union. Congress passed the legislation to protect minors from allegedly "indecent" and "patently offensive" material on the Internet. Some in Congress relied on an earlier Supreme Court decision, FCC v. Pacifica (1978), which upheld the power of the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to sanction a broadcaster for transmitting "indecent" but not obscene material during a time when children were likely to be in the audience.

The CDA made it a federal crime to transmit indecent or obscene material over the Internet, and specifically prohibited the knowing transmission of such material to any recipient under 18 years of age. Another section criminalized patently offensive messages. The law did not apply to those who took reasonable measures to restrict access by minors to such communications, and also exempted those who restrict access to such materials by requiring certain specific forms of proof of age, such as a verified credit card.

The Court held that the prohibition on indecent material over the Internet was unconstitutional. Distinguishing Pacifica, Justice John Paul Stevens (writing for himself and six other justices) argued that the CDA applies to all hours of the day or night, and involves criminal penalties, rather than the milder regulatory sanctions imposed by the FCC in Pacifica.

Stevens emphasized the statute's vagueness. "Could a speaker confidently assume that a serious discussion about birth control practices, homosexuality, or the consequences of prison rape would not violate the CDA? This uncertainty undermines the likelihood that the CDA has been carefully tailored to the congressional goal of protecting minors from potentially harmful materials." Another overriding concern for Stevens was the statute's overbreadth. "Its open-ended prohibitions embrace all nonprofit entities and individuals posting indecent messages or displaying them on their own computers in the presence of minors." The broad terminology Congress used covers "large amounts of nonpornographic material with serious educational or other value."

In response to the decision in Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, Congress passed the Child Online Protection Act (COPA), which requires operators of commercial websites to limit children's access to sexually oriented material that the average person "applying contemporary community standards" would determine panders to a minor's prurient interest. Unlike the CDA, this law applies only to commercial websites and defines offensiveness in relation to community standards. The law requires such websites to take measures (for example, age verification services, credit card validations) to exclude children. Also unlike the CDA, no material is prohibited—if the website takes steps to keep children out.

A federal district court and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit found the law unconstitutional because the use of contemporary community standards constituted a considerable restriction on speech when applied to a nationwide (indeed worldwide) medium such as the Internet, which cannot be limited to users in a particular geographic area.

In 2002, the Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (I) held that use of the "community standards" approach was not overbroad under the First Amendment, and returned the case to the Third Circuit for additional proceedings. This time, the Third Circuit found that the law was not narrowly tailored and therefore was overbroad and therefore unconstitutional. The government appealed, and in 2004 in Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (II), the Supreme Court in a five-to-four decision returned the case to the District Court in Philadelphia for further scrutiny of what Justice Anthony Kennedy called "plausible, less restrictive alternatives" to COPA. In the interim, the injunction against enforcement of COPA that had begun in 1998 would remain in effect. While not addressing the ultimate question of the law's constitutionality, the Court strongly hinted that the speech restrictions that the law imposes are overbroad in light of less restrictive, technology-based filters currently available.

Pornography and Feminism: Two prominent feminists, Catharine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin, have argued for a new exception to the First Amendment—pornography that graphically and explicitly portrays the sexual subordination of women. Such pornography, while not meeting the current legal definition of obscenity, is nonetheless in their view a form of sex discrimination against women and should be prohibited.

While the Supreme Court has not yet directly passed on the issue, an ordinance embodying the MacKinnon-Dworkin theory was enacted in Indianapolis, and in 1985 the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit found it unconstitutional in American Booksellers Assn. v. Hudnut. The court held that the ordinance amounted to improper viewpoint discrimination, noting that “[s]peech treating women in the disapproved way—as submissive in matters sexual or as enjoying humiliation—is unlawful no matter how significant the literary, artistic, or political qualities of the work taken as a whole. The state may not ordain preferred viewpoints in this way.” (Not all feminists support censorship of such speech, and many question MacKinnon’s and Dworkin’s assumption that the category of “women” can be subsumed under a common identity. These feminists argue that not all women, regardless of race/ethnicity, culture, class, or beliefs, are automatically subordinated to a male patriarchy.)

Zoning Ordinances: The Supreme Court has indicated that some sexual speech is of such low value that, while not proscribable as obscenity, it is still subject to greater degrees of regulation. The most notable example involves zoning ordinances used by local governments to limit the location of adult bookstores and movie theaters.

In Young v. American Mini-Theaters, Inc. in 1976 the Court upheld a city ordinance that limited the number of adult theaters that could be located on any given block and excluded such businesses from residential areas. In 1986 in City of Renton v. Playtime Theaters, Inc., the Court relied on Young to uphold an ordinance that forbade adult movie theaters within 1,000 feet of any residential, zone, church, park, or school. While the result of the ordinance was to place off-limits for such theaters about 95 percent of the land in Renton (a city in which the remaining 5 percent was hardly suitable for or available to such theaters), the Court rejected First Amendment arguments, holding that its conclusion followed inexorably from Young.

Conclusion

Justice John Marshall Harlan (II) once characterized the obscenity problem that he and his fellow justices (and their successors) attempted to deal with as “intractable.” Perhaps “insoluble” would have been a more appropriate description (as some have concluded). Most American judges, though, have persisted in their attempts to strike a balance between public law and private morality. In the process, they have gradually relaxed some of the restrictions on the public portrayal of sexuality. By the mid-1960s, there remained very few legal barriers against sexual expression—with the notable and not inconsiderable exception of materials deemed “obscene.” Thus, the Puritan strain that runs through American history seems alive and well, and after reviewing all that the courts have done in this area of law, one might be forgiven for concluding, with H.L. Mencken, that the essence of American Puritanism (popular and political) is “the lurking, lingering fear that somewhere, someone may be happy.”

PHILIP A. DYNIA

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Law and Business, 2002.
- Easton, Susan M. The Problem of Pornography. London: Routledge, 1994.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Lipschultz, Jeremy Harris. Broadcast Indecency. Boston: Focal Press, 1997.
- Nowak, John E., and Rotunda, Ronald D. Constitutional Law. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2004.
- Wallace, Jonathan, and Mangan, Mark. Sex, Laws, and Cyberspace. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Attorney General of Massachusetts*, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)
- Alberts v. California*, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
- American Booksellers Association v. Hudnut*, 711 F.2d 323 (1985)
- Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (I)*, 535 U.S. 564 (2002)
- Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (II)*, 542 U.S. 656 (2004)
- Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition*, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)
- Beauharnais v. Illinois*, 343 U.S. 250 (1952)
- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 468 (1942)
- Child Online Protection Act of 1998, 37 U.S.C. Section 609
- Child Pornography Act of 1996, 18 U.S.C. Section 2252A
- City of Renton v. Playtime Theaters, Inc.*, 475 U.S. 41 (1986)
- Communications Decency Act of 1996, 47 U.S.C. Section 223
- Comstock Act of 1873, 18 U.S.C. Section 1462M
- FCC v. Pacifica*, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
- Ginsberg v. New York*, 390 U.S. 629 (1968)
- Ginzburg v. United States*, 383 U.S. 463 (1966)
- Jacobellis v. Ohio*, 378 U.S. 184 (1964)
- Miller v. California*, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
- Near v. Minnesota*, 282 U.S. 697 (1931)
- New York v. Ferber*, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)

OBSCENITY

Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990)
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 166 (1973)
Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987)
Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967)
Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. 2 Q.B. 360 (1868)
Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)
United States v. Kennerly, 209 F. 119 (1913)
United States v. Levine, 83 F. 2d 156 (1936)
United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses," 72 F.2d 705 (1934)
Ward v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 767 (1977)
Young v. American Mini-Theaters, Inc., 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

See also A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966); American Booksellers Association, Inc. et al. v. Hudnut, 771 F. 2nd 323 (1985); Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969); Burger, Warren E.; Communications Decency Act (1996); FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978); Fighting Words and Free Speech; Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968); Hand, (Billings) Learned; Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964); Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973); Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931); New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982); Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973); Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967); Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. 2 Q.B. 360 (1868); Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997); Renton v. Playtime Theaters, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986); Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957); Warren, Earl; Young v. American Mini-Theaters, Inc., 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

OBSCENITY IN HISTORY

English Roots of American Obscenity Law

The regulation of obscenity in America is rooted in the censorship that prevailed during the reign of Henry VIII in sixteenth-century England. The notorious Court of the Star Chamber used licensing and other methods to censor books and theater productions. The Star Chamber was concerned mainly with religious heresy and sedition—works that offend the church or state, rather than with sexual content. By the seventeenth century, though, the increasing sexual explicitness of English theater and literature led to demands for control over content that was immoral or concerned bad manners. As a result, at the start of the nineteenth century, the common law crime of obscene libel had developed and could be used to suppress content that was sexual rather than religious or political. Thus, obscenity regulation split off from its religious and political origins.

Sexually explicit content was controlled mainly because it was presumed to have harmful effects on its audience. This was illustrated in an early definition of obscenity that emerged from Regina v. Hicklin, an English case decided in 1868 that concerned an anti-Catholic pamphlet. The test for obscenity was whether the alleged obscenity would deprave or corrupt audience members who were susceptible to this type of influence, rather than whether the material would have such an influence on members of the general public.

Colonial America and the Early Republic

The law of obscenity developed in the American colonies in a manner similar to its development in England, with the original emphasis on religious speech. Laws that criminalized blasphemy or heresy began to appear in the early eighteenth century and emerged in all colonies. Obscenity was also prohibited by the states. The first reported conviction for the common law crime of obscene libel, Commonwealth v. Sharpless, occurred in 1815 in Pennsylvania. Sharpless was accused of exhibiting for money a painting of a man and a woman in an "indecent posture." This behavior threatened the peace and dignity of all residents of Pennsylvania, and had the potential to corrupt and subvert its youth, according to the court. The court looked to English precedent and held that obscene libel was a crime in the commonwealth as well. "The courts are guardians of the public morals," the court stated. Similarly, in Commonwealth v. Holmes, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in 1821 assumed that obscene libel was a common-law misdemeanor over which it had jurisdiction. Holmes was accused of publishing a book containing an obscene print that threatened to debauch and corrupt the morals of youth and other citizens of the commonwealth. Both Sharpless and Holmes relied on the Hicklin standard that gauged the harmfulness of obscene content on its likely effect on the vulnerable, such as youth, rather than on the population in general. By the nineteenth century, state legislatures began to pass laws to control the spread of obscene material, which had become more widely available. Contributing to the increased availability of obscene content were the diminished influence of the Church and increased access to public education, which increased literacy.

Prosecutions for obscenity remained rare, however, until after the Civil War, when reformer Anthony Comstock began his campaign to ban bawdy content. He created an extraordinarily influential organization called the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. Comstock pushed Congress to pass federal legislation to control obscenity, and the result was the Comstock Act, passed in 1873, that prohibited the mailing of obscene publications. As a special agent of the Post Office, Comstock oversaw the destruction of hundreds of thousands of pieces of obscene material. Active enforcement of obscenity laws thus characterized late nineteenth-century America. Courts continued to rely on the Hicklin standard for obscenity, which focused on the effect of obscenity on the susceptible, rather than on the average person.

Developments in the Twentieth Century and Beyond

Most obscenity cases considered by the U.S. Supreme Court arose in the twentieth century for two key reasons. First, it was during the twentieth century that the media of mass communication burgeoned in the nation, increasing the channels through which obscene content was available. Second, this was the century in which the Supreme Court began to establish its First Amendment jurisprudence. Throughout these years, debate over the control of obscenity has arisen each time a new medium of communication has gained widespread use. The rationale for this content-based regulation of speech has continued to be obscenity's presumed potential for inciting social disorder, crime, and juvenile delinquency.

From the start, the Court grappled with the definition of obscenity. It first discussed the matter in Winters v. New York in 1948, which arose from the sale of allegedly obscene magazines. In Winters, the Court struck down as too vague a state statute prohibiting the distribution of obscene material. Because it provided criminal penalties, the law needed to make clearer the type of conduct that violated the law.

Similarly, in Butler v. Michigan (1957), the Court deemed as too broad another state law restricting obscenity. The law criminalized the distribution of materials "tending to corrupt the morals of youth," to anyone, including adults. The court said the law, which protected the "reading public against books not too rugged for grown men and women in order to shield juvenile innocence," went too far. In a well-known statement, Justice Felix Frankfurter, writing for the court, stated: "Surely, this is to burn the house to roast the pig." The Hicklin standard was thus found unconstitutional.

The court engaged in its first extended discussion of whether obscenity was unprotected speech under the First Amendment in Roth v. United States, decided in 1957, and held that it was not. Roth was a New York bookseller who mailed advertisements to attract sales. He was charged with mailing obscene advertising circulars as well as an obscene book, in violation of federal and state obscenity statutes. The court defined obscenity as "material which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest." This definition left open the possibility of First Amendment protection for the portrayal of sex in art, literature, and scientific works.

These decisions were followed by the sexual revolution of the 1960s, a time in which social strictures over sexual activity were greatly relaxed. In previous decades, print materials had prompted obscenity prosecutions; at this time, film, which began to portray nudity, became the catalyst for prosecutions. Although the Court had previously considered movie censorship in Burstyn v. Wilson (1952) and held that the medium was protected by the First Amendment, the nature of the content was at issue in Jacobellis v. Ohio, decided in 1964. In this case, the Court held that a French film including an explicit love scene was an artistic work protected by the First Amendment. In a concurrence, Justice Potter Stewart mentioned the continuing difficulty of defining obscenity, but, in a well-known statement, wrote, "I know it when I see it."

Although the Court maintained that obscenity was outside the scope of First Amendment protection, it rejected the notion that mere possession of obscene material was a crime. Stanley v. Georgia (1969) arose from a police search of the home of a man accused of bookmaking. The search turned up several reels of film. Upon viewing the films, police deemed them obscene and seized them. The homeowner was convicted of possession of obscene material, but the Supreme Court overturned the conviction. "If the First Amendment means anything, it means that a State has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch," stated Justice Thurgood Marshall. "Our whole constitutional heritage rebels at the thought of giving government the power to control men's minds." Marshall wrote the opinion on behalf of a Court headed by Chief Justice Earl Warren. The Warren Court has been widely perceived as a liberal one that made unprecedented expansions of individual rights.

The Court tackled the problem of defining obscenity again in Miller v. California (1973), which stemmed from the mailing of sexually explicit advertising brochures. This time a more conservative Court led by Chief Justice Warren Burger made the decision. The Court expanded on the ideas in Roth and developed a three-part test for obscenity: (a) whether the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would deem the work as appealing to the prurient interest; (b) whether the work depicted sexual conduct, as defined by state law, in a patently offensive way; and (c) whether the work as a whole lacked serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. The Miller test continued as the standard at the start of the twenty-first century.

The Miller Court explicitly rejected the notion that the sexual revolution obviated the need for regulation of patently offensive, hard-core pornography. Rather, in a case decided that same year, Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, the Burger Court recognized the state's interest in regulating obscenity in places of public accommodation. The case arose from the screening of two sexually explicit films at an adult theater that restricted attendance to those twenty-one and older. The court said the theater's efforts to limit exposure to the film to consenting adults were not enough to safeguard the quality of life in the community. Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Burger said there was "at least an arguable correlation between obscene material and crime." It was not necessary, Burger said, for the state legislature to provide scientific data to demonstrate the adverse effects of obscenity on society. "From the beginning of civilized societies, legislators and judges have acted on various unprovable assumptions," he wrote.

Another limit on sexually explicit material was drawn in New York v. Ferber, decided in 1982. The Court upheld a state criminal statute forbidding the promotion of sexual performances by children through the distribution of material depicting such performances. Child pornography is outside the scope of First Amendment protection, the Court stated, because protection of children is a legitimate state interest. Distribution of photographs and films depicting sexual abuse of children also exacerbate the abuse by making a permanent record of it, the Court said.

Conspicuously absent from the obscenity case law have been cases arising from the broadcast media. The reason is that freedom of speech in broadcasting has been restricted since Congress passed the Radio Act of 1927. The act was superseded by the Communications Act of 1934, but federal statutes maintained the government's power to prohibit obscenity on the airwaves. The act created an independent agency, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), that was responsible for broadcast regulation. The FCC also has regulatory power over television, cable, and telephones. Because of the statutory prohibition of obscenity on these media, questions about sexually explicit content have centered on indecency. In Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica (1978), the Supreme Court held that the FCC had the power to regulate a radio broadcast that was indecent but not obscene. The broadcast in question was the "Filthy Words" monologue of humorist George Carlin, who repeated over and over a series of expletives that were banned from the airwaves. The FCC deemed the broadcast indecent rather than obscene because, as social satire, it was not lacking in serious political value. But government still had the right to regulate it because of the unique circumstances presented by a radio broadcast. The audience is constantly tuning in and out, the Court said, and children may be in the audience. The "uniquely pervasive presence" of the broadcast media makes them difficult for unwilling audience members to avoid, warranting additional control over their content, according to the Court.

The circumstances of communication continued to play a role as the Court dealt with the regulation of other electronic media. In Sable Communications of California v. Federal Communications Commission (1989), the Court struck down a federal ban on indecent commercial telephone messages, more commonly known as "dial-a-porn." The FCC's restrictions on callers, which required credit cards and access codes, were deemed sufficient to protect children from unsuitable messages. In United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group (2000), the Court found unconstitutional a provision in the Telecommunications Act of 1996 that placed severe restrictions on the transmission of sexually oriented programming over cable television. Cable operators were already using technological means to limit access to paying customers. The occasional technological failures that sometimes arose, exposing nonsubscribers to a sexual image now and then, did not warrant the law's extensive restrictions.

As a new medium of communication, the Internet has been the focus of considerable legislation at the turn of the twenty-first century, with much attention being directed to control over content. Although federal law criminalizes obscenity, Congress sought to further restrict obscenity and the Internet with the Communications Decency Act. The act was part of the wide-ranging regulatory reform legislation known as the Telecommunications Act of 1996. The Communication Decency Act sought to protect children from "indecent" and "patently offensive" communications on the Internet by criminalizing the transmission of such content to them. The Court, however, held in Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union (1997) that the law abridged free speech protected by the First Amendment. As with so many other cases, the Court said that, in trying to protect children, the law suppressed a great deal of protected speech that adults had a constitutional right to receive and share. Similarly, the Court struck down provisions of the Child Pornography Prevention Act in Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition (2002), including a ban on virtual child pornography. This is sexually explicit imagery that appears to depict minors but was produced without using any real children, as might be done with computer technology.

Congress responded to the decision in Reno by passing the Child Online Protection Act. But again, the Court found the legislation was not the least restrictive means available for protecting children from harmful content on the Internet. In Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union (2004), the court let stand a preliminary injunction preventing enforcement of the law due to its apparent conflict with the First Amendment.

The Court, did, however, uphold a statute requiring any public library receiving federal funds for Internet access to install software that blocks obscenity and to prevent minors from accessing harmful information. This type of condition is a legitimate part of Congress's spending power, the Court stated in United States v. American Library Association (2003). Congress can require libraries to use funds for materials of appropriate quality, the court stated, upholding the Children's Internet Protection Act.

In most cases, restrictions on speech, including sexually explicit speech, have been considered potential threats to the civil liberties of citizens. However, another important school of thought views pornography as a violation of the civil rights of women. A leading proponent of this viewpoint has been Catharine A. MacKinnon, a law professor and feminist. MacKinnon views pornography as harmful to women, and believes that women should be able to seek redress through civil legal action. From this perspective, the harm caused by pornography outweighs the interest in free speech. Control of pornography is thus seen not as a violation of First Amendment freedoms, but as supporting the civil rights of women.

KAREN M. MARKIN

References and Further Reading

Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.

Kalven, Harry Jr. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.
MacKinnon, Catharine A. Women's Lives, Men's Laws. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2005.
Schauer, Frederick F. The Law of Obscenity. Washington, D.C.: Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., 1976.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union, 542 U.S. 656 (2004)
Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)
Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952)
Butler v. Michigan, 352 U.S. 380 (1957)
Child Online Protection Act of Oct. 21, 1998, 112 Stat. 2681
Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996, 110 Stat. 3009
Children's Internet Protection Act of 2001, 114 Stat. 2763 (2000)
Commonwealth v. Holmes, 17 Mass. 336 (1921)
Commonwealth v. Sharpless, 2 Serg. & Rawle 91; 1815 Pa. LEXIS 81
Communications Act of 1934, 48 Stat. 1064
Communications Decency Act of Feb. 8, 1996, 110 Stat. 133
Comstock Act of 1873, 17 Stat. 599
Federal Communications Commission v. Pacifica, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964)
Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973)
Radio Act of 1927, 44 Stat. 1162
Regina v. Hicklin, [1868] L.R. 3 Q.B. 360
Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
Sable Communications of California v. Federal Communications Commission, 492 U.S. 115 (1989)
Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)
Telecommunications Act of February 8, 1996, 110 Stat. 56
United States v. American Library Association, 539 U.S. 194 (2003)
United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, 529 U.S. 808 (2000)
Winters v. New York, 333 U.S. 507 (1948)

See also Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002); Burger, Warren E.; FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978); Frankfurter, Felix; Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964); MacKinnon, Catharine; Marshall, Thurgood; Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973); New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982); Obscenity; Paris Adult Theater v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973); Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. 3 Q.B. 360 (1868); Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997); Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957); Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969); United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, 529 U.S. 803 (2000); Warren, Earl

O'CONNOR, SANDRA DAY (1930–)

Sandra Day O'Connor, an Associate Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court from 1981 until 2005, cast the swing vote in many civil liberties decisions. O'Connor's sensitivity toward the factual context of cases and her tendency to prefer broad standards and balancing tests over bright-line rules often made her votes unpredictable, and generated criticism that her opinions were inconsistent and lacked a coherent judicial philosophy. Ultimately, her civil liberties jurisprudence may reflect a balance between a fundamental libertarianism and her strong recognition for public order, combined with a firm belief in federal judicial deference to state legislatures. On a wide range of issues, including criminal justice, religious freedom, and racial equality, O'Connor was a centrist whose opinions helped to preserve and sometimes expand the scope of civil liberties. During the final years of her long tenure, she tended to strike this balance more often in favor of individual liberty.

Born on an Arizona ranch in 1930, O'Connor graduated from Stanford University and Stanford Law School. Although O'Connor ranked third in her law school class, the elite law firms at which she sought employment during the middle 1950s rejected her because they refused to hire women. After serving in various governmental posts and practicing law in her own small firm in Phoenix, O'Connor became an Arizona state senator in 1969, quickly rising to the post of majority leader. She served as trial judge in Phoenix and later as a member of the Arizona Court of Appeals before President Reagan nominated her to the Supreme Court in 1981.

O'Connor was the first of many Supreme Court nominees whose views on abortion were an issue in the confirmation process. Although O'Connor expressed her personal opposition toward abortion in her testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, opponents of abortion were concerned because she had voted in favor of an abortion measure during her tenure as an Arizona senator. In her early opinions involving abortion, O'Connor was sharply critical of the trimester framework developed in Roe v. Wade (1973), and she maintained that only regulations that imposed an "undue burden" on abortion should be subject to the Court's strict scrutiny.

Ultimately, however, O'Connor was instrumental in preserving the constitutional right to abortion first announced by the Court in Roe. In Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992), O'Connor jointly authored an opinion with Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and David H. Souter asserting that the principle of stare decisis justified retention of Roe because Americans for the past two decades had "organized intimate relationships and made choices ... in reliance on the availability of abortion in the event that contraception should fail." This opinion also observed that women's "ability to control their reproductive lives" had facilitated their ability "to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation." O'Connor, Kennedy, and Souter joined Justices Harry A. Blackmun and John Paul Stevens in voting to overturn a Pennsylvania statute requiring married women to notify their husbands before obtaining an abortion, but they voted with four other justices to sustain other restrictions in the statute. O'Connor's support of abortion rights keenly disappointed many conservatives, who had hoped that she would vote to overturn Roe.

During her tenure on the Court, O'Connor also gradually emerged as something of a champion of the rights of homosexuals. Although O'Connor in Bowers v. Hardwick (1986) cast the swing vote to sustain the constitutionality of a Georgia statute prohibiting homosexual sodomy, she was part of the Court's six-to-three majority seventeen years later in Lawrence v. Texas (2003), which overturned a similar law. Although five members of the Court in Lawrence contended that a Texas sodomy statute violated due process, O'Connor argued in a concurring opinion that the statute denied equal protection because it branded "all homosexuals as criminals, thereby making it more difficult for homosexuals to be treated in the same manner as everyone else." Since O'Connor continued to maintain that the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause did not impose any substantive limit on the state to enact laws regulating sexual activity, she contended that the vote in Lawrence was not inconsistent with her vote in Bowers. O'Connor also joined the Court's six-to-three majority in Romer v. Evans (1996), which invoked the equal protection clause to invalidate a Colorado law that prohibited all legislative, executive, or judicial action to bar discrimination based on sexual orientation.

In cases involving religion, O'Connor also was a pivotal figure. Her major contribution was her development of the so-called "endorsement test," in which the Court considers whether the government has endorsed a practice that is challenged under the establishment clause. O'Connor began to develop this test in her concurring opinion in Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), a five-to-four decision in which the Court held that a city did not violate the establishment clause by including a creche in a Christmas display in a park. In a later case, Allegheny County v. Greater Pittsburgh American Civil Liberties Union (1989), the Court adopted O'Connor's endorsement analysis in a five-to-four decision, joined by O'Connor, holding that the prominent display of a creche in a courthouse was unconstitutional.

O'Connor relied on the endorsement test in her concurring opinion in McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union (2005), in which she cast the deciding vote to determine that the posting of the Ten Commandments in a courthouse violated the establishment clause. O'Connor similarly relied upon this test in voting with the majority in the Court's six-to-three decision in Van Orden v. Perry (2005), holding that the display of the Ten Commandments among various historical memorials in a park was not unconstitutional.

In cases involving public aid to religiously affiliated schools, O'Connor also occupied an intermediate position. Although she maintained that the Constitution prohibited direct public aid to such schools, she was more tolerant of aid that was filtered through students or their parents. O'Connor was the swing vote in the Court's 2002 decision in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, which upheld the constitutionality of vouchers for the payment of tuition at religiously affiliated schools.

In cases involving criminal procedure, O'Connor's experience as a trial judge informed her awareness of the delicate balance between the exigencies of law enforcement and fairness toward the accused. As a proponent of the Rehnquist Court's so-called "new federalism," O'Connor also urged restraint by federal courts in their review of state criminal decisions. In particular, she was an influential advocate of the theory that a defendant exhaust his state court remedies before seeking relief in federal court.

In death penalty cases, O'Connor moved with the Court toward stricter scrutiny of capital punishment laws. Although she concurred in Stanford v. Kentucky (1989), upholding the death penalty for juvenile offenders, she voted with the majority in Roper v. Simmons (2005) to strike down a similar law. Likewise, she voted to permit execution of mentally retarded persons in Penry v. Lynaugh (1989), but joined the Court's contrary ruling thirteen years later in Atkins v. Virginia (2002).

O'Connor tended to be skeptical of the constitutionality of affirmative action programs and cast the deciding vote in Adarand Contractors, Inc. v. Peña (1995), which announced that the Court would strictly scrutinize affirmative action programs instituted by state or federal governments, and had the effect of ending most public programs that gave preferences to minority contractors. In Grutter v. Bollinger (2003), however, O'Connor wrote the Court's opinion for a five-to-four majority in holding that a public law school had a compelling interest in achieving a diverse student body and therefore could use race as a factor in student admissions. In a companion case, Gratz v.

Bollinger (2003), which held that a public university could not automatically award racial minorities points for use in admissions, O'Connor wrote a concurring opinion arguing that the procedure was unconstitutional because it failed to provide "a meaningful individual review of applicants."

In several five-to-four decisions concerning voting districts designed to promote the election of African Americans, O'Connor voted with the majority in holding that the equal protection clause prohibits legislatures from using race/ethnicity as the predominate factor in drawing district boundaries. O'Connor wrote the opinion in the Court's seminal opinion in Shaw v. Reno in 1993.

In another case involving equal protection of voting rights, Bush v. Gore (2000), O'Connor cast the decisive vote in holding that a manual recount of certain Florida votes in a contested presidential election would be unconstitutional. In the wake of the Court's decision, Albert Gore, Jr. conceded the election to George W. Bush.

In the Court's first so-called "right to die" decision, Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (1990), O'Connor cast the deciding vote in support of the Court's ruling that a state could require clear and convincing evidence that a permanently unconscious person would have wanted the withdrawal of life support systems, but she wrote a separate concurring opinion emphasizing that terminally ill persons have a liberty interest in refusing unwanted medical treatment. She reiterated this theme in her concurring opinions in Washington v. Glucksberg and Vacco v. Quill in 1997, which held that the Constitution confers no right of physician-assisted suicide.

WILLIAM G. ROSS

References and Further Reading

- Brownstein, Alan, A Decent Respect for Religious Liberty and Religious Equality: Justice O'Connor's Interpretation of the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment, McGeorge Law Review 32 (Spring 2001): 837–75.
- Davis, Peggy Cooper, and Carol Gilligan, A Woman Decides: Justice O'Connor and Due Process Rights of Choice, McGeorge Law Review 32: (Spring 2001): 895–914.
- Maveety, Nancy. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor: Strategist on the Supreme Court. Lanham, MD and London: Rowman & Littlefield, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adarand Contractors, Inc. v. Peña*, 515 U.S. 200 (1995)
- Allegheny County v. Greater Pittsburgh American Civil Liberties Union*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
- Atkins v. Virginia*, 536 U.S. 304 (2002)
- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)

Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000)
Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)
Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244 (2003)
Gutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003)
Lawrence v. Texas, 123 S.Ct. 2472 (2003)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union of Ky., 545 U.S. ___ (2005)
Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302 (1989)
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)
Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005)
Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630 (1993)
Stanford v. Kentucky, 492 U.S. 361 (1989)
Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997)
Van Orden v. Perry, 125 S. Ct. 2854 (2005)
Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

O'CONNOR v. ORTEGA, 480 U.S. 709 (1987)

Officials at Napa State Hospital, after placing Dr. Magno Ortega on administrative leave pending an investigation into possible workplace improprieties, searched his office. Information found in the office was later used in an administrative proceeding that led to Dr. Ortega's dismissal. Dr. Ortega then filed an action in federal court against hospital officials alleging that the search violated the Fourth Amendment. On a motion for summary judgment, the district court ruled against Dr. Ortega, finding that the search was proper. On appeal, the circuit court found that the search did violate the Fourth Amendment, and remanded the case to the district court for a determination of damages.

The Supreme Court found both lower courts to be in error. Under the Court's analysis, while public employees have legitimate workplace privacy interests protected by the Fourth Amendment, these must be balanced against the public employer's interest in supervision, control, and the efficient operation of the workplace. The Court here makes a key distinction between searches by law enforcement officials, which are held to a probable cause standard, and searches by public employers, which are held to a less stringent reasonable standard. According to the Court, public employers' searches are valid if done for noninvestigatory work related matters or to investigate workplace misconduct, are reasonably justified, and the scope of the search is reasonably related to the objective of the intrusion. Under this standard, the Court found that the district court erred by failing to first determine the context of the search and the circuit court erred by not evaluating the reasonableness of the search and its scope.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

Israel, Jerold H., and Wayne R. LaFave. Criminal Procedure in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West, 2001.

See also Search (General Definition); Warrantless Searches

OHIO v. ROBINETTE, 519 U.S. 33 (1996)

Robinette was stopped for speeding by an Ohio deputy sheriff on drug interdiction patrol. The deputy approached Robinette's car, asked for and received his driver's license, and returned to his cruiser and ran a records check that revealed no outstanding warrants. The deputy then returned to the Robinette's car, ordered him out of the vehicle, told him he was going to let him go with a warning, and handed back Robinette's license. The deputy then asked Robinette if Robinette would consent to a vehicle search. Robinette consented, drugs were found, and Robinette was arrested. At trial and on appeal, Robinette sought to have the drugs excluded as the product of an unlawful seizure, claiming his consent was obtained unlawfully. The Ohio Supreme Court concluded that the search of Robinette's car violated the Fourth Amendment because his consent was invalid, as the deputy did not make it clear to Robinette that the lawful detention (the traffic stop) had ended and that Robinette was free to leave before the deputy sought consent to search the car.

The Supreme Court reversed the Ohio court, holding that the Fourth Amendment does not require a police officer to tell a motorist when a lawful detention has ended and a consensual encounter has begun. The Court has consistently maintained a distinction between Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights to remain silent and have counsel (where police are required to inform suspects of their rights through the Miranda warnings) and Fourth Amendment rights (which the Court has consistently held impose on the police no affirmative duty to inform). Thus police officers need not inform a suspect he or she may refuse to consent to a search, or that a lawful detention such as a traffic stop or investigatory stop has ended. This decision has implications for civil liberties, as law enforcement agencies use drug interdiction patrols and pretext stops as means of searching for drugs. Police officers, under Whren v. United States (1996), are allowed to stop a vehicle for any reason so long as there exists a lawful basis for the stop. Under Robinette, law enforcement officers may take advantage of a lawful detention to attempt to turn it into a full-blown search, if consent is given, without first making it clear to the suspect that he or she is free to leave.

CRAIG HEMMENS

References and Further Reading

Hemmens, Craig, and Jeffrey R. Maahs, Reason to Believe: Ohio v. Robinette. Ohio Northern University Law Review 23 (1997): 2:309–46.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996)

See also Warrantless Searches

OLMSTEAD v. UNITED STATES, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)

Roy Olmstead was a suspected bootlegger, selling alcoholic beverages in violation of the National Prohibition Act. U.S. government agents installed telephone wiretaps on the homes and offices of Olmstead and others. The wires were inserted along the telephone wires and accomplished without trespass on the property of the defendants. Evidence collected over five months, resulting in 775 typewritten pages of transcripts, demonstrated that Olmstead and his co-defendants employed at least fifty people, owned two sea-going vessels in addition to a number of smaller coastal boats, and had a large inventory of illegal liquor. Their business was thriving, with annual sales of more than two million dollars.

Olmstead and his co-defendant claimed that the wiretaps violated the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures and the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against self-incrimination. Chief Justice William Howard Taft wrote the majority opinion, narrowly interpreting the reach of the Fourth Amendment to "material things—the person, the house, his papers or his effects." Even though the chief justice recognized that the Fourth Amendment also extends to sealed letters, he rejected the suggestion that a letter and a telephone conversation are similar; sealed letters, he noted, are in the custody of the Post Office Department, which is forbidden to open them. It is, according to the chief justice, "a paper, an effect" that is in the custody of the government. Telephone conversations are not, he asserted, in the custody of the government and there was no searching or seizing, just "hearing and that only." Therefore, he concluded, that the Fourth Amendment could not be extended to include telephone wires. Should Congress wish to secure the privacy of telephone conversations, it could have done so through legislation, as it had done for sealed letters. Since Congress had not done so, wiretapping in this case was not covered by the Fourth Amendment's protection against unlawful searches and seizures.

Even though the evidence was obtained in a way that violated laws of the State of Washington, which made intercepting telegraph or telephone messages a misdemeanor, Justice Taft argued that under common law rules, the admissibility of evidence is not affected by the illegality of the means by which it was obtained. There was, at that time, no case that could sustain the proposition that evidence could not be admitted in a trial because it was unethically secured. The Chief Justice argued that, if the Fourth Amendment had not been violated—and he asserted that it had not—then the Fifth Amendment was not relevant to the Court's decision.

Only five justices joined Taft in the majority, and over the years, Olmstead v. United States has become best known for the dissent written by Justice Louis Brandeis. The famous dissent by Brandeis began by emphasizing that the words of the Constitution must adapt to a changing world and conditions that the authors had not known. He drew on Chief Justice John Marshall's words in McCulloch v. Maryland (1819) that constitutions are "designed to approach immortality as nearly as human institutions can approach it." At the time that the Constitution and its first ten amendments were written, Brandeis explained, force and violence were the only means available for coercing a confession and force and entry were the only ways to search and seize. Wiretaps constituted a more sophisticated approach to achieve both confessions and searches, and he predicted that even newer methods would undoubtedly be found for government espionage.

Brandeis relied heavily on Boyd v. United States (1886) to argue that the essence of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments was to protect against all invasions by the government into the "sanctities of a man's home and the privacies of life ... and of his indefeasible right of personal security, personal liberty and private property." Whereas the chief justice had distinguished between the postal service and the telephone service, Brandeis asserted that both were public services furnished by the government and, quoting the appeals court judge below, said that there was no difference between a sealed letter and a telephone conversation: "[O]ne is visible, the other invisible; the one is tangible, the other intangible; the one is sealed, and the other unsealed; but these are distinctions without a difference." Indeed, Brandeis continued, the invasion of one's privacy through wiretaps is far greater, because the people at both ends of the line are affected. A confession can be compelled through wiretapped conversations, because the accused believes that he is having a private conversation.

Central to Brandeis's thesis is that the Fourth and Fifth Amendments have at their bases the broad intention "to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness"; "they conferred, as against the government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men." Intrusions by the government into a person's right to privacy violates the Fourth Amendment, and when it is used in a criminal proceeding, the information obtained violates the Fifth Amendment's protection against self-incrimination. To solidify his argument, Brandeis noted that the federal officers who authorized the wiretaps themselves violated the laws of the State of Washington: "[T]he crimes of these officers were committed for the purpose of securing evidence with which to obtain an indictment and to secure a conviction." The Eighteenth Amendment that authorized prohibition did not authorize anyone to violate the laws of a state. "A court will not," he continued, "redress a wrong when he who invokes it has unclean hands." Justices Holmes, Stone, and Butler also dissented.

Olmstead was extended in 1942 to the use of dictaphones, the wires of which led to an adjacent office, and to detectaphones, devices that would enable one to hear a conversation on the other side of a wall, in the case of Goldman v. United States (1942). There was no trespass and, therefore, no illegal search or seizure. Finally, however, in Katz v. United States in 1967, the requirement that a warrant must be obtained prior to installing a wiretap was imposed and recognized "reasonable expectations of privacy" in the course of telephone conversations. Olmstead was overruled, and Brandeis's arguments from forty years earlier prevailed.

MARY L. VOLCANSEK

Cases and Statutes Cited

Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
Goldman v. United States, 316 U.S. 129 (1942)
Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316 (1819)

O'LONE v. ESTATE OF SHABAZZ, 482 U.S. 342 (1987)

Religious freedom constitutes one of the most valued civil liberties, and no less so among inmates. Incarceration, however, has historically imposed numerous restrictions on their practice of religion. Some restrictions have ample justification as necessary security measures; other restrictions have rested on prejudice, ignorance, or exaggerated security concerns. Aggrieved inmates could not secure relief from onerous and arbitrary restrictions until the federal judiciary abandoned its self-imposed and aptly named "hands-off" doctrine. In 1972 the Supreme Court in Cruz v. Beto invited judicial protection of inmates' religious freedom. Twenty-five years would pass before the Court in O'Lone v. Shabazz established a governing standard for determining which restrictions on prisoners' free exercise rights violated the First Amendment. Left to their own devices in the interim, the U.S. courts of appeals had divided over a governing standard.

The Shabazz plaintiffs complained about prison policies that indirectly barred their attendance at Jumu'ah, a Muslim congregational service held inside the walls of their New Jersey prison on Fridays. Because of their minimum security status, the plaintiffs worked outside the prison walls. In turn, their work status barred them from returning to the facility before the close of the workday and, consequently, during or before the religious services. The trial court found no First Amendment violation, but the court of appeals reversed and remanded because defendant prison officials failed to address alternative methods for accommodating the inmates' attendance at the Jumu'ah services. Siding with prison officials, the Supreme Court in Shabazz reversed the circuit court ruling. A five-to-four Court found that the challenged restrictions on prisoners' free exercise of religion did not violate the Constitution.

To resolve this free exercise claim, the Shabazz Court used the test employed in Turner v. Safley (1987) to permit severe limitations on inmate-to-inmate correspondence but strike down a ban on the marriage of inmates. By the Shabazz Court's own admission, it selected the Turner test to further its policy of "ensur[ing] that courts afford appropriate deference to prison officials." In stark contrast to the close scrutiny usually applied to First Amendment infringements in the civilian community, the standard employed in Shabazz requires restraints on free exercise to be reasonably related to legitimate prison goals. To make this determination, the Shabazz Court considered four factors delineated earlier in Turner. The first addresses whether the rule or policy bears a "rational connection" to a government interest that is both legitimate and neutral regarding religion. If the plaintiff demonstrates the absence of a connection, the inquiry ceases and the challenged rule or policy violates the free exercise clause. If the connection does exist, a court balances the remaining factors: whether there exists an alternative means for the plaintiffs to exercise their religious beliefs; the impact on prison staff, inmates, and penal resources of accommodating the asserted right; and the existence of a de minimis alternative to the challenged rule or policy.

In its application of the four-part reasonableness test, the Court largely adopted the arguments of the defendant prison officials. First, assigning inmates to outside work details and forbidding their return to the prison before the end of their workday eased overcrowding, prevented congestion at the prison's main entrance, and instilled rehabilitative work habits. Second, prison officials had made various accommodations, such as a pork-free diet, to enable the affected Muslim inmates to otherwise practice their faith. Third, accommodating the plaintiffs' asserted right to attend religious services would lead to charges of favoritism and tax the already overburdened staff. Fourth, there were no easy, de minimis alternatives to the challenged prison regulations.

The impact of Shabazz has been diminished by congressional legislation safeguarding religious practices. Enacted in 1993, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) prohibited the federal government and the states from substantially burdening religious practices unless they employed the least restrictive means in furtherance of a compelling state interest. The Supreme Court in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997) ruled the RFRA unconstitutional under the separation of powers doctrine in its application to the states. In 2000, Congress passed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), which in relevant part reimposes the compelling state interest/least restrictive means standard on state governments when they substantially burden the religious freedom of prisoners and other institutionalized persons. RLUIPA has thus far survived constitutional challenge, including on establishment clause grounds before the Supreme Court in Cutter v. Wilkinson (2005).

Notwithstanding the enactment of RFRA and RLUIPA, Shabazz presaged a broad application of the reasonableness standard formulated in Turner v. Safley. The Turner Court had indicated that its reasonableness standard should be used whenever prison rules and regulations are challenged. In Shabazz, the Court took the first of several new steps in that direction by extending the reach of the reasonableness standard to free exercise claims. Subsequently, the Court used this governing standard to address a host of alleged rights violations, including prisoners' claims arising from severely restricted prison visitation, censorship of books, and involuntary medical treatment with antipsychotic drugs.

JAMES E. ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Blischak, Matthew P., O'Loone v. Estate of Shabazz: The State of Prisoners' Religious Free Exercise Rights, American University Law Review 37 (Winter 1988): 453–86.
- Branham, Lynn S., Go Sin No More: The Constitutionality of Governmentally Funded Faith-Based Prison Units, University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 37 (Winter 2004): 291–352.
- Buss, William G., An Essay on Federalism, Separation of Powers, and the Demise of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, Iowa Law Review 83 (January 1998): 391–434.
- Chiu, Anne Y., When Prisoners Are Weary and Their Religious Exercise Burdened, RLUIPA Provides Some Rest for Their Souls, Washington Law Review 79 (August 2004): 999–1027.
- Clear, Todd R., Patricia L. Hardyman, Bruce Stout, Karol Lucken, and Harry R. Dammer. "The Value of Religion in Prison." Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice 16, no. 1 (2000): 53–75.
- Developments in the Law—In the Belly of the Whale: Religious Practice in Prison*, Harvard Law Review 115 (May 2002): 1891–913.
- Giles, Cheryl Dunn, Turner v. Safley and Its Progeny: A Gradual Retreat to the "Hands-Off" Doctrine?, Arizona Law Review 35 (Spring 1993): 219–36.
- Laycock, Douglas, and Oliver S. Thomas, Interpreting the Religious Freedom Restoration Act Texas Law Review 73 (December 1994): 209–45.
- McConnell, Michael W., The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, Harvard Law Review 103 (May 1990): 1409–517.
- McNeil, Matthew, The First Amendment Out On Highway 61: Bob Dylan, RLUIPA, and the Problem with Emerging Postmodern Religion Clauses Jurisprudence, Ohio State Law Journal 65 (2004): 1021–56.
- Mushlin, Michael B. Rights of Prisoners, vol. 1, 3d ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.
- Pepper, Stephen, Taking The Free Exercise Clause Seriously, Brigham Young University Law Review 1986 (1986): 299–336.
- Solove, Daniel J., Faith Profaned: The Religious Freedom Restoration Act and Religion in the Prisons, Yale Law Journal 106 (November 1996): 459–70.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
- Cruz v. Beto*, 405 U.S. 319 (1972)
- Cutter v. Wilkinson*, 544 U.S. ____ (2005)
- Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993, 42 U.S.C. Sections 2000bb–2000bb-4 (2000)
- Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000, 42 U.S.C.A. Section 2000cc et seq.
- Turner v. Safley*, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

See also Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Prisoners and

Free Exercise Clause Rights; Religious Freedom Restoration Act; Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000; Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

OMNIBUS CRIME CONTROL AND SAFE STREETS ACT OF 1968 (92 STAT. 3795)

In response to soaring crime rates, urban riots, and public demand for federal action in the late 1960s, Congress passed the Safe Streets Act, its largest anticrime package to date. Initially, President Johnson and liberal Democrats had proposed the bill to combat the social roots of crime. However, the final version focused almost entirely on increasing police effectiveness. Through large federal grants and stiffer laws, the legislation aimed to reduce crime in urban poverty areas inhabited mostly by the black underclass.

The federal government had no jurisdiction to control crime in the states, so as part of the bill, Congress authorized the creation of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) to add federal funding to local law enforcement. State law enforcement officials received block grants allowing them autonomy to spend grant monies under broad headings such as police planning, training, and crime prevention research.

While block grant funding was the mainstay of the legislation, Congress intended several provisions of the act to increase the legal efficiency of police. One aspect gave police fewer restrictions during identification line-ups and interrogation. A police officer was no longer required to read a suspect "Miranda warnings" before questioning. Furthermore, the bill limited federal judges' power to review state court rulings on voluntary confessions and, when review was permitted, they had to follow narrow standards for determining "voluntariness."

Because judges now had more complicated rules for deciding "voluntariness," critics argued that the new law challenged previous Supreme Court decisions in Miranda v. Arizona (1966) and United States v. Wade (1967). However, in 2000, after a panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit admitted into evidence a confession obtained without Miranda warnings, the Supreme Court, in Dickerson v. United States, definitively decreed that Miranda warnings must be the standard of "voluntariness," not the provisions in the Safe Streets Act.

Congress also intended the bill to reduce organized crime. The act permitted wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping with a warrant in a wider variety of criminal investigations. However, a warrant was not required for forty-eight hours if police suspected organized criminal activity or if national security was threatened.

Finally, regulations on the sale of handguns over interstate borders tightened up. Like many aspects of the bill, this one attempted to crack down on criminals since they would not as easily be able to appropriate weapons. Yet, a loophole allowing continued interstate traffic in rifles and shotguns undermined this provision.

In 1981, Congress cut funding for the Safe Streets Act. The nation had expended enormous amounts of tax dollars and had rolled back the rights of criminal suspects, yet no reduction in crime rates had occurred. In fact, crime rates climbed during the tenure of the act. In the end, analysts have suggested that the legislation failed for two main reasons. First, politicians and experts did not understand how actually to reduce crime, and second, the block grant mechanism turned out to be too clumsy.

GARRY D. WICKERD

References and Further Reading

Cronin, Thomas. U.S. v. Crime in the Streets. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982.
National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence. Law and Order Reconsidered. Washington D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1970.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)

See also Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000); Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)

ON LEE v. UNITED STATES, 343 U.S. 747 (1952)

On Lee was working, while awaiting trial on a narcotics charge, at his laundry business in Hoboken, New Jersey. His old acquaintance, Chin Poy, entered and began a conversation with Lee. Unbeknownst to Lee, Poy was an "undercover agent" who was wired with a radio transmitter. During the course of the conversation in the laundry and later on the sidewalk, Lee made statements that were highly incriminating to himself. These statements, overheard by another officer via the radio transmitter, were later used to help convict Lee at trial.

The court of appeals affirmed the conviction. The U.S. Supreme Court found the analysis of the lower courts to be constitutional, holding that the conduct of the federal agents did not amount to a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Under the Court's analysis, a trespass did not occur because (1) Poy presumably entered the laundry with On Lee's consent, and (2) the use of devices to overhear conversations is appropriate where entry onto the premises is legal. The Court went on to find that because there was no obstruction of "a communication facility" under the control of Lee, the Federal Communications Act had not been violated. The Court's opinion was important in defining when exactly an unlawful trespass by government officers occurs, when courts should consider conversations overheard by devices to be unlawful, and under what circumstances a court might consider excluding admissible evidence that was obtained by government officers who acted beyond the bounds of lawful behavior.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

Tasltitz, Andrew E., and Margaret L. Paris. Constitutional Criminal Procedure. Los Angeles: Foundation Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

The Communications Act, Act of June 19, 1934, 48 Stat. 1064

See also Electronic Surveillance, Technology Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; Search (General Definition); Wiretapping Laws

OPEN FIELDS

The Fourth Amendment protects against unreasonable searches and seizures by law enforcement of "persons, houses, papers, and effects." When officers enter property that is outside someone's home, any Fourth Amendment concerns center on whether this property falls within "curtilage" or "open fields." The Supreme Court has held that open fields fall outside the protection of the Fourth Amendment, while curtilage is protected. Law enforcement officers can lawfully enter and search an open field without a warrant.

Open fields can include unoccupied or undeveloped land, even wooded areas, outside the curtilage, the area generally associated with and surrounding the home. Common law distinguished the two by considering curtilage an extension of a person's home and thus his privacy; open fields were generally considered accessible to the public. In Hester v. United States, the Court found that the Fourth Amendment did not protect open fields because they are neither "houses" nor "effects" within the amendment's meaning. In later reaffirming Hester, the Court additionally noted a person could not legitimately expect that his activities would be private in open fields. A search, in Fourth Amendment terms, does not occur unless a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy in the place searched. While posting a "No Trespassing" sign may protect common law property rights, the Court found that this has no bearing on whether Fourth Amendment protections apply.

Because the open fields doctrine is a bright-line rule, later cases have considered how to define the extent of the curtilage by determining whether the area is intimately connected to the home.

MARGARET M. LAWTON

References and Further Reading

California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986).

Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Procedure. 3rd ed. Newark, NJ: LexisNexis Publishing, 2002.

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure: Criminal Practice Series. Vol. 2. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999).

Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170 (1984).

Saltzburg, Stephen A., Another Victim of Illegal Narcotics: The Fourth Amendment (as Illustrated by the Open Fields Doctrine), University of Pittsburgh Law Review 48 (1986): 1–25.

United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294 (1987).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57 (1924)

See also Exclusionary Rule; Florida v. Riley, 488 U.S. 445 (1989); Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967); Plain View; Search (General Definition)

OPERATION RESCUE

Formed in 1987, this organization has been a vocal one, representing the most recent type of pro-life (or anti-abortion) organizing since the 1980s. The "first wave," active before the Supreme Court's 1973 Roe v. Wade decision, consisted largely of individuals either affiliated with the Catholic Church or in the medical professions, some of whom later founded or joined national organizations. Some examples include Father Paul Marx (active since the 1950s, ultimately founding Human Life International in 1981), Jack Willke, M.D. (ultimately the organizer of the National Right to Life Committee in 1973), and Mildred Jefferson, M.D., of Boston. Early victories for the second wave were found in the Jackson and Hyde Amendments prohibiting public funds for abortion. Key groups in this wave included Human Life International and the National Right to Life Committee (joined by smaller, women-headed groups such as the Eagle Forum, founded in Illinois in 1972, and Concerned Women for America, founded in San Diego in 1979).

The third wave of organizing in this stream began in the mid-1980s. It stemmed from impatience with mainstream legislative and court actions and veered into the realm of directly confrontational tactics. The forerunner in this sector was Joseph Scheidler of Illinois, who pioneered direct-action techniques, including clinic blockades and "sidewalk counseling" through his group, the Pro-Life Action League. Operation Rescue was founded at a conference of the Pro-Life Action Network in 1987 by Scheidler and Randall Terry of Project Life, in Binghamton, New York. Operation Rescue was closely modeled on the ethos and strategies of the Pro-Life Action League. Operation Rescue has been described as a militant alternative to the National Right to Life Committee, which did not support its type of confrontational tactics. For Operation Rescue, the bodies of anti-abortion protesters were used as the barrier to clinics and their operations. Terry often described his organization as participating in a civil rights struggle for the unborn and in precipitating a civil war over the abortion question in the United States.

While Operation Rescue disavows the use of guns and bombs at abortion clinics, it has used many types of mechanisms to disrupt clinic practices. This organization can be viewed as an extremely provocative group among third-wave organizations, willing to push the legal envelope as to the amount of permitted interaction between clients and protesters. The group has been active at local, national, and international levels. For example, in 1990, statistics were given that Operation Rescue had participated in clinic actions in 173 cities in forty-four states and the District of Columbia, and in two Canadian provinces. Its actions have included "the use of truth teams," whereby group members have made appointments at clinics and once inside, worked to "dissuade clients from having abortions"; and activities at the Democratic National Conventions, including clinic blockades in Atlanta and the delivery of a fetus to presidential nominee Bill Clinton at the New York Convention in 1992. In Canada, Operation Rescue first participated in a blockade against the clinic operated by Dr. Henry Morgentaler in Toronto in October 1988 and participated in such blockades throughout the 1980s and 1990s. One such example was in 1997 when Operation Rescue participated in clinic blockades at the Elizabeth Bagshaw center in Vancouver, British Columbia, bolting clinic doors shut with kryptonite, with protesters chaining themselves to a cement block outside the door and chaining themselves together with kryptonite. The idea of civil disobedience by protesters to both protest the practice of abortion and attempt to call public attention to their views resulted in numerous arrests over time. It was shown that there were many repeat players in the blockades, such that one group which was keeping arrest statistics noted that "of 32,000 arrests in 1988-89, about twelve thousand people were arrested only once while 5,750 people accounted for the remaining 20,000 arrests."

Operation Rescue's willingness to use many quasi-legal tactics in its civil disobedience strategy made it a key actor in the evolution of constitutional doctrine in two specific ways. The first line of cases had to do with the claims of Operation Rescue (and other similar organizations in this stream) that its First Amendment rights of free speech were being curtailed by buffer zones outside clinics. In the first such case, Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic (1993), clinic operators had tried to enjoin Operation Rescue from blockading the clinics and harassing clients. They used the vehicle of the 1871 Civil Rights Act, originally passed to ensure the civil rights of freed slaves and tried to analogize between those originally covered by the legislation and women seeking to access their constitutional rights to abortion. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that women were not among the original class to be protected under the 1871 law, and stopped federal judges from using the act to enjoin anti-abortion protests. However, one year later in the Madsen v. Women's Health Center (1994), the Supreme Court upheld the suit brought by the Aware Women's Health Center for Choice in Melbourne, Florida whereby a state court judge had enjoined the protesters (including Operation Rescue) from appearing within a thirty-six-foot buffer zone. The Supreme Court upheld most of this injunction, except that which forbade access to private property surrounding the clinic.

The second area of court cases concerning Terry of Operation Rescue and Scheidler of the Pro-Life Action League has been that based on a new use of the powerful federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) statute of 1970 by the National Organization of Women (NOW) to try to assess damages against these men, and has included probably the longest-running court case in the abortion rights area, from 1986 until the time of this writing (2005). NOW first brought suit against Joseph Scheidler of the Pro-Life Action League and Randall Terry of Operation Rescue in 1986 under RICO, a powerful federal statute aimed at thwarting economic conspiracies (such as by the Mafia). In taking action against Scheidler and Terry, NOW argued that the RICO statute applied because the two men were in an ideological conspiracy to shut down certain businesses, that is, abortion clinics. RICO allows plaintiffs to seek criminal charges and if successful, receive triple damages. The first suit went through the Seventh District Court (having been initially dismissed for lack of an economic motive, appealed by NOW) to the Supreme Court, where in 1994 the Supreme Court unanimously ruled that plaintiffs did not need to prove an economic motive to successfully bring suit under the RICO statute.

This decision also allowed the trial of Scheidler and Terry to begin in the federal District Court of Illinois, where it had originally been filed in 1986. In 1994, NOW filed briefs to expand the claim to link the defendants to shootings and arson. In 1997, NOW successfully argued to the District Court that N.O.W. v. Scheidler should be given the status of a class-action lawsuit. In this instance, the judge certified NOW as the class representative of both NOW members but also of all women "whose rights to the services of women's health centers in the United States at which abortions are performed have been or will be interfered with by defendants' unlawful activities." Within Operation Rescue, internal discord brought about the end to Terry's leadership, with Flip Benham assuming control of the organization in 1994 (and renaming it Operation Save America).

Randall Terry filed for bankruptcy in 1998 to avoid paying any judgments that might be levied against him. He was also subject to a permanent injunction against his activities by the district court, the violation of which would lead to future fines.

In 1998, the federal District Court of Illinois upheld NOW's RICO arguments against Terry and Scheidler, finding that "the defendants engaged in a nationwide conspiracy to deny women access to medical facilities." The jury found that Operation Rescue and the Pro-Life Action League should be held liable for the triple damages allowed under the statute, and the following year the district court judge issued the first nationwide injunction against these groups, preventing them from committing more violence.

Since that time, while Operation Rescue has gone bankrupt, the issues of whether future violence may be prevented by injunctions and RICO can be used to punish noneconomic crimes are yet to be settled. The same case has gone to appeal to the Supreme Court in 2002, back through the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals and down to the District Court of Illinois.

As of this writing, it rests with the U.S. Supreme Court, which agreed to hear Scheidler's appeals beginning November 30, 2005.

MELISSA HAUSSMAN

References and Further Reading

- Baker, Ann. "Pro-Choice Activism Springs from Many Sources." In From Abortion to Reproductive Freedom: Transforming a Movement, edited by Marlene Gerber Fried, 179–84. Boston: South End Press, 1990.
- Melich, Tanya. The Republican War Against Women. New York: Bantam Books, 1998.
- Mezey, Susan Gluck. Elusive Equality: Women's Rights, Public Policy, and the Law. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Planned Parenthood. Website. <http://www.plannedparenthood.org>.
- Staggenborg, Suzanne. The Pro-Choice Movement: Organization and Activism in the Abortion Conflict. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Tatalovich, Raymond. The Politics of Abortion in the United States and Canada. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe, 1997.
- Tribe, Laurence H. Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes. New York: W.W. Norton & Company, 1992.
- Willke, Jack. "A History of Pro-Life Leadership: For Better or Worse." In Back to the Drawing Board: The Future of the Pro-Life Movement, edited by Teresa Wagner, 123–36. South Bend, IN: St. Augustine's Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic*, 506 U.S. 263 (1993)
- Madsen v. Women's Health Center*, 512 U.S. 753 (1994)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- N.O.W. v. Scheidler*, 510 U.S. 249 (1994); 267 F.3d 687, 705 (7th Cir. 2001); Mem. Op. & Order (N.D. Ill. Mar. 28, 2001)

See also Abortion; National Organization for Women (NOW); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

OREGON'S DEATH WITH DIGNITY ACT (1994)

Genesis of the Act

In 1994, Oregon voters were presented with a referendum, denoted Ballot Measure 16, that proposed to create a statutory right for a mentally competent adult to terminate his or her life with the assistance of physician-prescribed medicine should that adult become terminally ill. The proposal won the vote of a narrow majority of Oregonians that year (51.43 to 48.7 percent), and began a national odyssey, as Oregon became the first state to legalize physician-assisted suicide in the United States. The act was known as the Oregon Death with Dignity Act (ODWDA), and more than a decade after its passage, other states are beginning to explore the possibility of following Oregon's example (most notably, California, as of 2005).

Controversial from its beginnings, Oregon's legislative assembly attempted to repeal the act in 1997 with another referendum—Ballot Measure 51—which was defeated by an even greater margin than the original vote to establish the act (roughly 59.9 to 40.0 percent). On October 27, 1997, the act finally went into effect, and has been legal and valid in Oregon since that time, despite numerous state and federal challenges both in legislatures and in courts.

The Statute's Requirements

The statute contains many requirements and checks upon the use of the "right" conferred, meant to deter the possibility of abuse and to avoid giving the impression that the state was encouraging elder suicide in any way. First, the statute creates a right only for use by a mentally capable adult who voluntarily expresses his or her wish to die. Second, an attending physician must confirm that the adult patient has an incurable and irreversible disease and will die within a six-month period, and this medical opinion must then be confirmed by a different consulting physician. These two physicians must also separately evaluate and establish the mental competence of the adult patient, and either physician may demand an evaluation by a psychiatrist if she or he is unsure. Third, two witnesses who are not the aforementioned physicians must be present at the drafting of the written request for life-ending medication by the adult patient. Fourth, the attending physician is required to inform the adult patient upon his or her request for the medication of its likely consequences, and of the availability of alternative treatments and hospice and comfort care, along with a host of other information required to be provided to the patient. Fifth, there are two mandatory waiting periods: one between the initial oral request and the writing of the prescription (fifteen days), and another between the time of the adult patient's witnessed written request, and the writing of the prescription (forty-eight hours). Sixth, at any time the adult patient may rescind his or her request for the medication, without restriction. There are many other safeguards and requirements listed in Oregon Statutes 127.800–897, but these are the most pertinent for evaluating the procedures built into the act.

The Moral and Political Debate over Physician-Assisted Suicide

There is considerable disagreement in moral philosophy over whether human beings have a right to kill themselves, and how this may or may not differ from the long-established common law right to refuse treatment for medical conditions. Religion offers no refuge from the debate, with some traditions supporting the Oregon Act, while many religious traditions oppose physician-assisted suicide on the ground that suicide is forbidden by their religious texts or authorities.

Overlapping the moral and philosophical debates, there is also a vibrant national political debate over physician-assisted suicide. The passage of the ODWDA came at a time of a growing national debate over whether physician-assisted suicide should be supported by the state or criminalized, with many diverse viewpoints on the subject. When social conservatives argued primarily against the establishment of regimes such as Oregon's, they often infused their arguments with statements deriving from the "pro-life" movement, which was concerned with criminalizing abortion throughout the nation. Their criticisms focused on the effect that Oregon's statute might have on devaluing respect for life itself both in law and policy, and took a stand against the very notion of what they saw as state-sanctioned murder. American social liberals and libertarians typically supported the passage of acts similar to Oregon's, arguing for a commitment to personal autonomy and the right to decide the course of the end of one's life without criminalization.

Practical Results of the Act

More pragmatically, issue has been taken over whether statutes such as Oregon's would lead to rampant elder suicides, abuse by physicians who conceivably might care less about a terminal patient who has the alternative of suicide, and the corresponding deterioration of care and respect for those who are terminally ill.

However, publicly available studies by the Oregon government and other nonpartisan institutions show that the act has apparently increased the quality of care for the terminally ill, and has brought new saliency to issues of elder care in the state. To date, records do not show that the act has been found to have been used in any improper way. Pursuant to the text of the statute, records of the activities under its provisions are permanently recorded and issued in annual reports by the Oregon government, and made available to the general public on the Internet.

Federal Government Activity

From the time of its passage to the present day, socially conservative politicians have sought to use federal power to prohibit Oregon from enforcing the ODWDA. In both 1998 and 1999, pending legislation in Congress would have preempted the law federally and eliminated its validity. These laws either never made it to the House or Senate floor (in the former instance), or passed the House but never made it to the Senate floor (in the latter instance).

In 1996, Senator Orrin Hatch of Utah and Representative Henry Hyde of Missouri, along with many other federal lawmakers, wrote to the Drug Enforcement Agency requesting that the U.S. Department of Justice bar enforcement of the ODWDA, threatening to take away the medical license of Oregon doctors who continued to write prescriptions under the act. They cited the Controlled Substances Act (CSA) as being the federal statute potentially violated by the doctors. This tactic flowed from the provisions of the ODWDA requiring the use of prescribed medicine to hasten the death of the patient, which Hatch and Hyde argued was an illegitimate reason for prescribing otherwise controlled medications. Attorney General Janet Reno denied the request, stating in a memorandum in June 1998 that Oregon and the rest of the states were entitled to write their own laws regarding end-of-life options for the terminally ill. Reno's decision came on the heels of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Washington v. Glucksberg (1997), which held, among other things, that the states were the appropriate levels of government for such experimental legislative enactments.

During the first term of Republican President George W. Bush in 2001, Attorney General John Ashcroft renewed the attempts to stymie the Oregon Act, reversing Attorney General Reno's previous decision. On November 9, 2001, Ashcroft issued a memorandum generally referred to as the "Ashcroft directive" that essentially threatened to strip doctors of their licenses if they acted under the color of the ODWDA, and labeled the Oregon law itself as violating the CSA.

These threats were halted by Judge Robert E. Jones of the U.S. District Court for the District of Oregon, pursuant to a lawsuit filed by the State of Oregon, and various physicians and patients against Attorney General Ashcroft. Judge Jones enjoined enforcement of the Ashcroft directive against Oregon physicians, ruling that the Ashcroft directive exceeded the scope of the CSA as it was drafted by Congress. Judge Jones's reasoning and decision were affirmed by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit on appeal, and was subsequently appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which heard oral argument in the case on October 5, 2005. The Ninth Circuit affirmed on the ground that there was no sign of an "unmistakably clear" intent behind the CSA to abrogate the traditional state-level regulation of medical practice. At the time of this writing, the outcome of the case in the Supreme Court appeared to be in limbo. Retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was considered a swing vote on end-of-life issues such as this one; her replacement Samuel Alito, a conservative, is less likely to be a swing vote on such issues.

MITCHELL A. MOSVICK

References and Further Reading

- Gonzalez v. Oregon*, No. 04-623, 125 S. Ct. 1299 (2005) (granting certiorari).
- Oregon Department of Human Services. Website for Physician-Assisted Suicide. <http://egov.oregon.gov/DHS/ph/pas/index.shtml>.
- Oregon v. Ashcroft*, 192 F.Supp. 2d 1077 (D. Or. 2002).
- Oregon v. Ashcroft*, 368 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2004).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- "Ashcroft Directive," 66 Fed. Reg. 56,607 (AG Order No. 2534-2001)
- Oregon Revised Statutes 127.800-897 (2003)
- Washington v. Glucksberg*, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)
- See also Assisted Suicide; Washington v. Glucksberg*, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)

OROZCO v. TEXAS, 394 U.S. 324 (1969)

Four armed police officers arrived at Orozco's home at 4 A.M. to question him about a murder. The officers entered Orozco's bedroom, woke him up, and questioned him without reading Miranda warnings. Orozco admitted to being present at the murder scene, owning a firearm, and told the officers its whereabouts. Tests revealed that the firearm was the gun that fired the fatal shot.

At trial, an officer testified that from the moment questioning began, Orozco was under arrest and not free to leave. Orozco's statements were admitted and he was found guilty. Orozco appealed, arguing that his statements were given while he was "in custody," thus violating Miranda v. Arizona (1966).

When is a suspect in custody? According to Miranda, custody takes place when a suspect is deprived of freedom of movement in any significant way.

To elucidate this standard, the Orozco Court looked at a variety of situational factors, including the time of day, the number of officers present, and the officers' intent. Because the questioning took place at 4 A.M. with four armed officers, and an officer testified that Orozco was under arrest, the Court held that Orozco was in custody.

The Orozco decision clarifies the definition of "custody" by elaborating on when and how a suspect's freedom of movement is deprived in a significant way. The decision illustrates how custody can take place in a suspect's home. Finally, it provides criteria for determining whether a suspect is in custody for purposes of Miranda.

STEPHEN L. SARAZIN

References and Further Reading

Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U.S. 719 (1966).
LaFave, Wayne, Jerold Israel, and Nancy King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2004.
Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 (1968).
Saltzburg, Stephen, and Donald Capra. Constitutional Criminal Procedure. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Arrest; Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation; Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 (1968); Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Miranda Warning

OSBORNE v. OHIO, 495 U.S. 103 (1990)

The Supreme Court in Stanley v. Georgia (1969) constitutionally protected the private possession of obscene materials by individuals in their residences. New York v. Ferber (1982) declared that sexually explicit materials or performances involving minors, regardless of whether they were obscene or not, had "exceedingly modest, if not de minimus" social value compared to compelling state interests in the welfare of minors, and thus did not warrant First Amendment protections.

Osborne's appeal asked whether Stanley trumped Ferber: Was the private possession of sexually explicit photographs of minors constitutionally protected? Osborne was convicted of violating Ohio's law, which stated: "No person shall ... [p]ossess or view any material or performance that shows a minor who is not the person's child or ward in a state of nudity." The police armed with a search warrant found four photographs of nude male adolescents in sexually explicit positions in Osborne's house. His trial conviction was affirmed by Ohio's appellate courts.

The Supreme Court reversed Pope's conviction and remanded the case for further consideration. This ruling, however, did not rest on Osborne's First Amendment arguments, which the majority found "unpersuasive," but on due process grounds; the jury was not properly instructed on the elements of Ohio's law that had to be proved. The vote was six to three, with White writing for Rehnquist, Blackmun, O'Connor, Scalia, and Kennedy. Brennan wrote a dissent that Marshall and Stevens joined.

White argues that Stanley does not extend to Pope's possession of photographs of nude minors by distinguishing Ohio's law from Georgia's law. The latter prohibited the private possession of obscenity because of Georgia's concerns that obscenity "would poison the minds of its viewers," and accordingly was unconstitutional since the law sought to control a person's private thoughts. Ohio's law, in contrast, in order to protect the victims of child pornography was designed to "destroy a market for the exploitative use of children" by making it a crime to possess and view photographs of nude adolescents. As White notes, Ferber made Ohio's law necessary because the Court's decision drove the market for child pornography underground; nineteen other states as a consequence passed laws similar to Ohio's.

White also dismissed Pope's argument that the law was overbroad. Ohio's Supreme Court had interpreted the law as limited to the lewd exhibition of or graphic attention to the genitals of nude minors who were neither the children nor wards of the persons charged with violating the law. Persons viewing or possessing "innocuous photographs of naked children," White emphasized, would not be penalized under the law.

ROY B. FLEMMING

Cases and Statutes Cited

New York v. Ferber, 438 U.S. 747 (1982)
Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)

OTIS, JAMES (1725–1783)

James Otis was a leading defender of individual and charter rights in the American colonies, and an opponent of general search warrants and parliamentary taxation. The son of a prominent Massachusetts assemblyman, Otis was born in Barnstable, educated at Harvard and trained as a lawyer. He became both an attorney for Boston's merchant community and the advocate general of the Boston Vice-Admiralty Court, which adjudicated customs violations. In 1760, Otis resigned his official post to petition the Massachusetts Assembly for the relief of ship owners whose cargoes had been seized and sold as contraband. He argued that customs collectors had illegally used writs of assistance as general warrants to search suspects' property at will. In February 1761, after King George II died and the surveyor of customs applied to the Massachusetts Superior Court for renewal of the writs, Otis testified against the law itself, arguing that writs of assistance were arbitrary extensions of royal power over British subjects' property and violated both the British constitution and natural law. Chief Justice Thomas Hutchinson upheld the constitutionality of the statute and the legality of the writs, but Otis's address did help him win election to the provincial Assembly, where he became a leader of the faction opposed to Hutchinson.

In 1762 Otis drafted a legislative report criticizing Massachusetts's royal governor, Francis Bernard, for spending provincial funds without legislative approval, arguing that not even the king could arbitrarily transgress the colony's laws. In 1764, after passage of the Sugar Act, Otis published The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved, an influential pamphlet arguing that Parliament had no right to deprive men of their property without their consent, and therefore could not legitimately tax colonists who were not represented in that body. Otis helped organize an intercolonial congress in response to the 1765 Stamp Act, and there helped write a remonstrance to Parliament that proclaimed the stamp tax unconstitutional. In 1768 he supported Samuel Adams's circular letter calling for united colonial resistance to new parliamentary taxes, and joined ninety-one other legislators in defying Governor Bernard's order to rescind it.

In 1769 a customs commissioner whom Otis had criticized in the press, James Robinson, confronted Otis in a Boston coffeehouse and administered a caning from which the victim never fully recovered. Increasingly wracked by mental illness, Otis became a recluse, and died in Andover in 1783. Meanwhile, Whig essayists made Otis's denunciation of taxation without representation into one of the main colonial grievances against the British government, and judges in other colonies, following Otis's arguments against writs of assistance, refused to issue them. Commenting on Otis's speech against the writs, John Adams asserted that it was "then and there the child independence was born."

DAVID A. NICHOLS

References and Further Reading

Adams, Adams, ed. The Works of John Adams. 10 vols. Boston: Little, Brown, 1850–1856.

Galvin, John. Three Men of Boston. New York: Thomas R. Crowell Co., 1976.

Tudor, William. Life of James Otis, of Massachusetts. New York: Da Capo Press, 1970.

See also General Warrants; Writs of Assistance Act

OVERBREADTH DOCTRINE

Under the overbreadth doctrine, a litigant may challenge the constitutionality of a law, even if the law could be properly applied to him or her. This is an important exception to normal principles of constitutional litigation.

The Court allows overbreadth challenges to laws impacting free speech "[b]ecause overbroad laws ... deter privileged activit[ies]" (Grayned v. City of Rockford [1972]). As Justice Brennan famously wrote for the Court in NAACP v. Button (1963), "[Free speech is] delicate and vulnerable, as well as supremely precious in our society." Thus, judges will assume "that the statute's very existence may cause others not before the court to refrain from constitutionally protected speech or expression" (Broadrick v. Oklahoma [1973]).

To bring a successful overbreadth challenge, the litigant must show that the law is substantially overbroad, which means that it "prohibits a significant amount of protected expression" (Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition [2002]), when judged in relation to the law's legitimate coverage (and as it has been interpreted by a state's highest court) (Osborne v. Ohio [1990]). That is, "the mere fact that one can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge" (Members of City Council of City of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent [1984]). Generally, if the law covers a substantial amount of protected expression, it must usually pass strict scrutiny.

However, Professor Richard Fallon argued in Making Sense of Overbreadth, that a statute's overbreadth should be measured in relation to the type of speech harmed. Under his approach, courts should require less overbreadth in laws impacting especially important speech, such as political dissent, than would be required in laws impacting low-value speech.

Schad v. Borough of Mt. Ephraim (1981) best illustrates the overbreadth doctrine. In Schad, owners of an adult bookstore that offered live nude dancing brought a free speech-based challenge to a law that banned all live entertainment. Although nude dancing was not, at the time of Schad, protected expression, a seven-to-two Court nonetheless invalidated the law because its coverage would have prohibited protected expression. Justice White noted that since the law disallowed “plays, concerts, musicals, dance, or any other form of live entertainment,” all of which is protected speech, the adult bookstore owners were “entitled to rely on the impact of the ordinance on the expressive activities of others as well as their own.” Since there was an insufficient justification for banning all forms of expression.

OVERBREADTH DOCTRINE

In New York v. Ferber (1983), the Court declined to invalidate a criminal prohibition of the production or possession of child pornography even though the scope of the law might have encompassed some protected speech, namely, material that would otherwise have serious literary, artistic, or educational value under Miller v. California (1973). The Court held that law in Ferber was not overbroad in relation to its legitimate prohibition of child pornography.

The overbreadth doctrine, although infrequently used to invalidate a law, gives courts a powerful way to invalidate laws restricting speech. But by requiring substantial overbreadth, the doctrine ensures that duly enacted laws are only rarely invalidated.

MICHAEL C. CERNOVICH

References and Further Reading

Fallon, Richard, Making Sense of Overbreadth, Yale Law Journal 100 (1991): 853.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)
Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 403 U.S. 601, 610 (1973)
Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 11 (1972)
Members of City Council of City of Los Angeles v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789 (1984)
Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 433 (1963)
New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1983)
Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990)
Schad v. Borough of Mt. Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981)

See also Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002); Standing in Free Speech Cases; Vagueness Doctrine

P

PACIFISTS AND NATURALIZATION

Federal law, as codified in the Naturalization Act of 1952, exempts pacifist applicants for citizenship from pledging to bear arms on behalf of the United States if their conscientious objection to war is based upon “religious training and belief.” The present statute was enacted after a lengthy political and legal struggle by pacifists to obtain exemption from earlier statutes which omitted any specific dispensation for conscientious objectors.

The Naturalization Act of 1906 required an applicant for citizenship to declare under oath that he or she would “support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic ...” During the First World War, the Naturalization Service began to ask all applicants for citizenship whether they were willing, if necessary, “to take up arms” in defense of the nation.

The constitutionality of these measures was first challenged in a lawsuit by Rosika Schwimmer, a Hungarian refugee who was a pacifist activist and former Hungarian ambassador to Switzerland. In her application for naturalization, Schwimmer stated that she could not in good conscience take up arms to defend the United States, although she was willing to take the oath of allegiance. In his opinion for the Court in Schwimmer v. United States, 279 U.S. 644 (1929), Justice Pierce Butler explained that “it is the duty of citizens by force of arms to defend our government against all enemies whenever necessity arises” and that “[w]hatever tends to lessen the willingness of citizens to discharge their duty to bear arms in the country’s defense detracts from the strength and safety of the government.”

In a pungent dissent, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes pointed out that Schwimmer, a fifty-two-year-old woman, “would not be allowed to bear arms if she wanted to” and that she did not subscribe to subversive political views. Although Holmes acknowledged that some of Schwimmer’s opinions “might excite popular prejudice,” he declared that “if there is any principle of the Constitution that more imperatively calls for attachment than any other it is the principle of free thought—not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought that we hate.” Holmes also observed that pacifists had made significant contributions to the nation and expressed bemusement over the expulsion of persons who “believed more than some of us do in the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount.”

The Court reaffirmed its decision in Schwimmer two years later in five-to-four decisions in United States v. Bland, 283 U.S. 636 (1931), and United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605 (1931). In those cases, the Court upheld the denial of naturalization to Canadians who were willing to bear arms for national defense only if they felt that a war was morally justified. Emphasizing that naturalization is a privilege rather than a right, Justice George W. Sutherland’s opinion explained that the petitioners had failed to meet their burden of demonstrating that the naturalization permitted any exception for pacifists. Treating the issue primarily as a question of statutory interpretation, Sutherland gave short shrift to claims of religious liberty. The nation, he wrote, had a right to temper religious freedom with its "duty to survive."

These decisions were at odds with the Court's general tendency during this period to demonstrate solicitude for the civil liberties of those who were not political radicals because neither petitioner lacked patriotism or presented any apparent threat to the political order. Douglas Clyde Macintosh, a Baptist minister and professor of theology at Yale, had made wartime speeches in favor of the Allies, and Marie Bland, a devout Anglican, had nursed American soldiers in France during World War I.

The Court's opinion in Macintosh inspired what was perhaps the most impassioned dissent written by Charles Evans Hughes during his eleven years as chief justice. Perhaps recalling the steadfast moral principles of another Baptist minister, his father, Hughes argued for a statutory exception that would protect religious liberty. In his dissent, joined by Justices Holmes, Brandeis, and Stone, Justice Hughes pointed out that Congress had made exemptions for conscientious objectors in selective service statutes, and he observed that there were "other and most important methods of defense, even in time of war, apart from the personal bearing of arms" that would satisfy the statutory requirement of support for the Constitution against its foes. Emphasizing that liberty of conscience was central to religious liberty, Hughes found no evidence that Congress had intended to depart from its long-standing policy of "avoiding unnecessary clashes with the dictates of conscience." In discussing the importance of religious liberty, Hughes declared that the "essence of religion is belief in a relation to God involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation."

MacIntosh provoked considerable criticism. In avowed defiance of it, an Ohio county judge in 1933 granted citizenship to a pacifist in a ruling that won widespread acclaim. Despite these protests, Congress re-enacted the 1906 naturalization act in 1940 without making specific exemptions for conscientious objectors. Hughes's dissent became the law, however, when the Court overruled its three earlier decisions in Girouard v. United States, 328 U.S. 61 (1946). In that case, the Court held that the U.S. Court of Appeals had improperly denied naturalization to James Girouard, a Seventh-Day Adventist who had stated in his application for naturalization that he would not be willing to bear arms to defend the United States. Although Girouard contended that combatant military duty would violate his religious scruples, he had not claimed exemption from all military service, and he was willing to take the requisite oath of allegiance.

In a decision by Justice William O. Douglas, the Court ruled that neither the text nor the legislative history of the 1940 naturalization statute indicated that Congress intended to preclude the citizenship of persons whose religious scruples prevented them from promising to bear arms in the nation's defense. The Court pointed out that the naturalization oath did not specifically require that naturalization applicants promise to bear arms and that the bearing of arms was not the only manner in which a naturalized person could fulfill the oath to defend the nation against its enemies. The Court explained that "those whose religious scruples prevent them from killing are no less patriots than those whose specific traits or handicaps result in their assignment to duties far behind the fighting front."

Pointing out that Congress had traditionally attempted to accommodate the rights of conscientious objectors, Douglas also declared that the First Amendment's guarantee of religious freedom was the product of age-old struggles in which "men have suffered death rather than subordinate their allegiance to God to the authority of the State." In dissent, Justice Stone argued that Congress intended to prevent the naturalization of aliens who refused to promise to bear arms because Congress had failed to make exemptions for conscientious objectors after the Court, in its previous decisions, had found no such exemption.

Although the Court in Girouard based its decision on statutory interpretation, the Court suggested that the statute would violate the First Amendment's guarantee of religious freedom if it denied naturalization to persons who refused for religious reasons to bear arms. Girouard was consistent with other decisions of the same period in which the Court was expanding the scope of the First Amendment's religion clauses. In 1952, Congress eliminated the ambiguity of the earlier statutes by making clear that conscientious objectors are not required to pledge that they will bear arms. The statute (Title 8, Section 1448, of the United States Code) presently provides that a conscientious objector who can prove "by clear and convincing evidence ... that he is opposed to the bearing of arms in the Armed Forces ... by reason of religious training and belief" is not required to take the oath required of other applicants "to bear arms on behalf of the United States when required by the law."

Such a person is required only to swear that he or she would be willing to perform noncombatant duty in the armed forces or "to perform work of national importance under civilian direction when required by the law." The statute states that the phrase "religious training and belief" means "an individual's belief in relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation, but does not include essentially political, sociological, or philosophical views or a merely personal moral code."

The limitation of the statute's exemptions to conscientious objection based upon religious belief remains controversial, particularly because the statute's exemption does not appear to embrace all forms of religious objections to war. In a 1992 decision, for example, a federal court denied naturalization to a Syrian Muslim, Mahmoud Kassas, who declared that he would not participate in any war against fellow Muslims. The court based its decision upon the Supreme Court's decision in Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437 (1971), in which the Court held that persons who had religiously based objections to the Vietnam War, rather than war in general, were not exempt from military service under the Selective Service Act's exemption for persons whose objections to war were based on "religious training and belief."

WILLIAM G. ROSS

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Jeffrey M., Conscience in the Court, 1931–1946: Religion as Duty and Choice, Journal of Supreme Court History 26 (2001): 1:25–52.
 Flowers, Ronald B. To Defend the Constitution: Religion, Conscientious Objection, Naturalization, and the Supreme Court. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gillette v. United States*, 401 U.S. 437 (1971)
Girouard v. United States, 328 U.S. 61 (1946)
Petition for Naturalization of Mahmoud Kassas, 788 F.Supp. 993 (M.D.Tenn. 1992)
United States v. Bland, 283 U.S. 636 (1931)
United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605 (1931)
United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U.S. 644 (1929)
 8 U.S.C. sec. 1448 (2000)

PAINE, THOMAS (1737–1809)

Born in Norfolk, England, into a working-class Quaker family, Thomas Paine left home at age seventeen and by twenty-two had opened his own stay-making business. A few years later, however, he secured a post as an excise officer, assessing and collecting import taxes. After he was fired from his post, he took up a new customs post in Sussex. He quickly came to believe that customs officers were unfairly treated and poorly paid, so he wrote the first of many activist pamphlets, Case of the Officers of Excise. The booklet suggested substantial reform in the customs department, but when Paine tried to have the matter heard before Parliament, they refused and he was fired. It was merely the first of many occasions when Paine was punished for speaking his mind.

After his wife died, Paine sailed to America, encouraged by a meeting in England with Benjamin Franklin. Upon Franklin's recommendation, a Philadelphia publisher hired Paine as an editor. By January 1776, Paine had observed the growing tension between American colonies and Parliamentary assertions of authority, and he wrote Common Sense, a logical rejection of monarchical government and a call for colonial independence. Some 150 thousand copies were printed and sold in America alone, and the document is credited with the arousal of patriotic fervor leading to increased enlistments in Washington's Continental Army. It also led, a few months later, to the colonies' decision to declare independence.

In 1787, Paine returned to England, where he continued his political agitation. He wrote Rights of Man, an even more explicit attack on the monarchy and a call for revolution in England like the one in America. For his ideas, he was convicted of sedition, then branded an outlaw. He fled to France in 1792, where he was elected to the National Assembly. Upon taking his seat in the assembly, Paine spoke out in favor of banishment, not execution, of Louis XVI. Decidedly in the minority, Paine was again arrested and imprisoned and spent the next year in jail. Before leaving France, Paine wrote The Age of Reason, a critical attack on religion, revelation, and the divinity of Jesus Christ.

Arriving in America, Paine found that public opinion had turned against him as a result of his attack on religion. Common Sense had made him a hero to many, but The Age of Reason had severely damaged his reputation and made him nearly an outcast. When Paine died in 1809, the local Quaker cemetery, where Paine had expressed his wish to be buried, refused to allow it, and he was interred on the ground of his farm in New York. Profoundly gifted rhetorically, Paine spent most of his life attacking those institutions that violated natural law by oppression or tyranny. In America, he was applauded, then vilified; in England and France he was persecuted.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Aldridge, Alfred Owen. Man of Reason: The Life of Thomas Paine. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company, 1959.
 Foner, Eric. Tom Paine and Revolutionary America. London: Oxford University Press, 1976.
 Wilson, Jerome D., and William F. Ricketson. Thomas Paine. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1978.

PALMER, A. MITCHELL (1872–1936)

A. Mitchell Palmer, U.S. attorney general in 1920, is generally credited with engineering the first major “red scare” in the United States and setting the pattern for anticommunist crusades of the twentieth century. A lifelong Democratic activist, Mitchell began his career as an attorney in Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania, and was elected to the Congress in 1908, where he functioned as Woodrow Wilson’s man in the House of Representatives. During World War I Wilson appointed Mitchell alien property custodian and then, in 1919, attorney general.

The postwar environment in the United States reflected the xenophobia of the war years, connecting fear of aliens with radical threats to national security. In 1919, Russian Communists organized the Comintern, the purpose of which was to export the Bolshevik Revolution around the world. As a result Socialist Party radicals, many of whom were alien workers, organized Communist parties in the United States. All this occurred against a background of labor unrest that peaked with a wave of strikes in 1919 and included a general strike in Seattle in January and a nationwide steel strike.

Public fears of alien radicalism were further exacerbated during the spring of 1919 when a series of bombs were sent to prominent public officials, including one on June 2 that destroyed the entrance to the Palmer home. The new Communist Party was blamed and inflamed public sentiment called for stronger measures against the radicals. Much of this pressure fell upon Attorney General Palmer, who was ordered in October to report on the Justice Department’s progress against the bombers and other radicals.

Palmer first organized the Radical Division in the department, headed by energetic young attorney J. Edgar Hoover, who was tasked with assessing and dealing with the radical threat. Then, with the wartime Alien and Espionage Acts about to expire, Mitchell set about dealing with the radical problem under the auspices of the Immigration Act of 1918, which allowed for the deportation of aliens because of membership in suspicious organizations. In November of 1919, raids were launched in a number of major U.S. cities against the Union of Russian Workers, rounding up suspects and documentary evidence. Setting the model for subsequent operations, detainees were treated roughly and often held without hearings for long periods of time. Although the majority of those arrested were ultimately released, almost two hundred, as well as some previously detained radicals, including anarchist Emma Goldman, were deported. The U.S.S. Buford, dubbed by the press, “the Soviet Ark,” transported 249 undesirables to Russia in December of 1919.

By the end of the year, Palmer was lauded as the savior of the American republic and enjoyed overwhelming public admiration, further boosting his interest in entering the presidential race in 1920. Thus encouraged, Palmer staged the most spectacular of his antiradical operations. On January 2, 1920, thousands of government agents, assisted by state deputies and zealous volunteers, raided Communist headquarters in thirty-eight cities in thirty-three cities. Over five thousand radicals were herded, without warrants, into detention centers that offered intolerable conditions. Detainees were physically abused, held incommunicado, and denied legal counsel. The dragnet nature of the raids brought the detention of many who had little association with radicalism, much less being a danger to American security. The widespread violation of civil liberties did not go unnoticed, and the acting labor secretary, who was responsible for deportation hearings, ultimately engineered the release of most of the detainees.

The public hysteria, as well as Palmer’s political prospects fizzled out as the traditional “red” May Day celebration came and went without the predicted Communist revolutionary uprising. A number of prominent American attorneys issued a report criticizing Palmer’s abuse of civil liberties, while Democratic politicians bypassed him in selecting the Democratic presidential nominee. Palmer did remain active in political activities. He wrote the Democratic platform of 1932 and was working on the 1936 platform when he died in Washington, D.C., in 1936.

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

- Coben, Stanley. A. Mitchell Palmer, Politician. New York: Columbia University Press, 1963.
- Morgan, Ted. Reds: McCarthyism in Twentieth-Century America. New York: Random House, 2003.
- Murray, Robert K. Red Scare: A Study in National Hysteria, 1919–1920. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1954.
- Schrecker, Ellen. Many Are the Crimes: McCarthyism in America. New York: Little, Brown and Company, 1998.

PAPACHRISTOU v. CITY OF JACKSONVILLE, 405 U.S. 156 (1972)

In Papachristou, the Supreme Court struck down a city ordinance against vagrancy. Justice William O. Douglas’s opinion is memorable as a paean to non-conformity and for its defense of liberty at the most basic level: the citizen's freedom to walk the streets and to live the life he or she chooses.

As a matter of law, Papachristou held that under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process guarantee, the Jacksonville ordinance was impermissibly vague. The Court said that the measure, which targeted "rogues," "vagabonds," and "loafers," was unconstitutional because it failed "to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that his contemplated conduct is forbidden" and "because it encourages arbitrary and erratic arrests and convictions."

Justice Douglas, himself an inveterate rambler and proud nonconformist, observed that the behavior the ordinance sought to criminalize, such as "night-walking" and loitering, can be perfectly innocent. "Persons 'wandering or strolling' from place to place," he wrote, "have been extolled by Walt Whitman and Vachel Lindsay." Such activities "are historically part of the amenities of life.... They are not mentioned in the Constitution or in the Bill of Rights. These unwritten amenities have been in part responsible for giving our people the feeling of independence and self-confidence, the feeling of creativity.... They have encouraged lives of high spirits rather than hushed, suffocating silence."

Laws must not arbitrarily target disfavored groups, Douglas cautioned, because "[t]he rule of law, evenly applied to minorities as well as majorities, to the poor as well as the rich, is the great mucilage that holds society together."

STEVE SANDERS

See also Vagrancy Laws; Vagueness and Overbreadth in Criminal Statutes

PARDON AND COMMUTATION

Pardons and commutations are distinct varieties of clemency available in nearly every American jurisdiction. Both are official acts that usually originate in the executive branch of government. To varying degrees, pardons and commutations remit punishment for crimes. Although the term "pardon" is sometimes used to refer generally to all nonjudicial reductions in punishment, it is more accurate to think of pardon, like commutation, as a discrete aspect of the executive clemency authority. A pardon is the broadest type of clemency recognized under American law. It releases the offender from punishment and is generally understood to eliminate moral guilt for the offense. By contrast, a commutation simply substitutes a lesser punishment for a greater one. Pardons and commutations protect individual civil liberties by curtailing governmental power when it has been employed mistakenly or harshly.

The authority to grant pardons and commutations in the United States can be traced directly to the prerogative of the British monarch. Historically, the English Crown used pardons to soften penalties imposed under the common law, to garner the support of key nobles and clerics, and even to provide cheap labor for the American colonies through the use of conditional pardons. Pardons were also used as incentives to persuade accomplices to incriminate codefendants.

Federal Pardons and Commutations

Although legal theorists such as Blackstone asserted that the clemency power could not exist in a democracy because there was no official who was "above" the law, the drafters of the U.S. Constitution vested in the president the authority "to Grant Reprieves and Pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of Impeachment" (Article II, Section 2). As Alexander Hamilton observed in Federalist No. 74, this power was intended to be expansive so that exceptions in favor of "unfortunate guilt" could readily be made. Presidential pardons may be granted before or after conviction, or with conditions attached. Although the Constitution only mentions pardons and reprieves, the U.S. Supreme Court has confirmed that the president also has the power to grant commutations (Biddle v. Perovich, 274 U.S. 480, 1927).

Despite a decline in the number of pardons and commutations granted in recent decades, the clemency power historically has been employed in a variety of ways. In 1795, President Washington granted unconditional pardons to many of the participants in the Pennsylvania Whiskey Rebellion. The clemency power was also used freely after the Civil War to heal the wounds of a divided nation. President Lincoln, and his successor, Andrew Johnson, pardoned many who had fought against the Union, conditioned on their swearing to uphold the Constitution. In response, Congress sought to limit the clemency power through legislation. However, Congress's efforts to restrict the clemency authority were frustrated in cases such as Ex parte Garland, 71 U.S. 333 (1866), in which the U.S. Supreme Court held that the pardon power "is not subject to legislative control."

As a practical matter, the issuance of pardons and commutations is subject only to the constraints that each president chooses to recognize, which has led to some controversial uses of the power. The most famous of these was President Gerald Ford's pardon, prior to prosecution and conviction, of former President Richard Nixon for all federal crimes he had committed in connection with the Watergate scandal. However, the federal clemency power is seldom used. Indeed, the Code of Federal Regulations specifies that a request for pardon typically may not be filed until “at least five years after the date of the release of the petitioner from confinement.” Commutations are granted even more rarely and may be sought only in exceptional circumstances.

State Pardons and Commutations

After the Revolution, states initially rejected the British model of vesting the pardon and commutation power solely in an executive. Eight of the first thirteen states placed the authority to remit punishment for state law violations in a legislative council and the governor jointly, or in the legislature alone. However, perhaps influenced by the federal Constitution, most states that thereafter joined the union allocated the clemency authority to the governor.

Today, the governor retains the clemency power in a majority of jurisdictions, typically pursuant to state constitutions. Many of these states, while granting primary clemency authority to the governor, have established advisory boards that process pardon and commutation applications and make nonbinding recommendations. In the remaining states, the governor shares the power to pardon and commute with an administrative board, or it is placed in the hands of an administrative body alone.

Few formal constraints are imposed on the issuance of pardons apart from limitations on the types of offenses for which clemency can be granted (treason and impeachable crimes are often excluded) and the timing of pardons (some states permit clemency only after conviction). Notwithstanding this wide latitude, in recent years the number of pardons and commutations issued has declined steeply, particularly in controversial cases such as those involving the death penalty. Former Governor George H. Ryan of Illinois proved a notable exception to this trend when he issued four pardons and 167 commutations to prisoners on Death Row shortly before he left office in 2003.

Pardons and Commutations in Practice

Pardons at the state and federal level are usually sought by persons who have completed their punishment, have proved to be law-abiding citizens for a substantial period of time, and desire to be free of the civil disabilities that often accompany a criminal conviction. The disabilities typically imposed on those who have been convicted of a crime include prohibitions against voting, serving on juries, holding public office, and owning firearms. Though local laws vary widely, in most jurisdictions a pardon is an effective means for restoring these privileges. Because of the political repercussions that sometimes attend the granting of pardons, the manifestation of broad community support for a pardon—especially from the victim, prosecutor, or sentencing judge—can be crucial in obtaining relief. However, because pardons are usually seen as wiping out guilt entirely, they are seldom used to release prisoners from incarceration apart from rare situations when there is a compelling show of innocence.

Commutations are most often used to remit ongoing punishment. Typical grounds for commuting sentences include the existence of extreme sentence disparities, pervasive doubts about guilt or the fairness of judicial proceedings, or changes in the law that render a punishment suspect. Because a commutation sets aside punishment imposed through a legal system replete with procedural protections and other safeguards against error, such grants of clemency are highly unusual in most jurisdictions. However, a few states have used commutations with some frequency in order to meet exigencies unrelated to the situations of individual defendants. For example, Oklahoma and Kentucky recently sought to reduce spiraling prison costs by commuting the sentences of large numbers of nonviolent offenders, and South Dakota issued numerous commutations to prisoners who performed work for the state.

Procedures to be followed when applying for pardons and commutations vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Applicants who seek a presidential pardon or commutation must complete an FBI background check before the Justice Department will consider their application and make a nonbinding recommendation to the president. Various states likewise require that clemency requests be investigated and also mandate that specified individuals, such as the prosecuting attorney, the sentencing judge, or the victim, be notified before a pardon or commutation can be granted.

In certain cases, particularly when minor offenses are involved and the punishment has been completed, it may be possible to prepare a request for pardon without the assistance of an attorney. In more complicated cases or when a commutation is sought, employing a professional advocate to assist in making the argument for clemency is desirable.

Conclusion

Pardons and commutations are the official embodiment of mercy and flexibility in our systems of justice, but they currently play a limited role in the remission of punishment. However, given the fallibility of judges, juries, and attorneys, as well as the modern tendency to punish harshly, pardons and commutations will no doubt remain an important tool in restoring civil rights and safeguarding liberty in individual cases.

DANIEL T. KOBIL

References and Further Reading

- Duker, William F., The President's Power to Pardon: A Constitutional History, William and Mary Law Review 18 (1977): 475–538.
- Humbert, W. H. The Pardoning Power of the President. Washington D.C.: American Council on Public Affairs, 1941.
- Kobil, Daniel T., The Quality of Mercy Strained: Wrestling the Pardoning Power from the King, Texas Law Review 69 (1991): 569–641.
- Moore, Kathleen D. Pardons: Justice, Mercy, and the Public Interest. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Sarat, Austin. Mercy on Trial: What it Means to Stop an Execution. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Biddle v. Perovich*, 274 U.S. 480 (1927)
- Ex parte Garland*, 71 U.S. 333 (1866)
- 28 Code of Federal Regulations §1.2 (2005)

PARIS ADULT THEATRE v. SLATON, 413 U.S. 49 (1973)

Obscenity has been regulated by the states since the early history of our country. The origins of these laws are primarily religious and designed to maintain some level of public morality. However, it was not until 1957 in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), that the U.S. Supreme Court addressed the issue of whether obscenity was protected by the First Amendment and subsequently determined that it was not. The Court in Paris Adult Theatre I affirmed the Roth conclusion that obscenity can be regulated without regard to First Amendment concerns of censorship, although it was the Miller v. California case (Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 1973), decided the same day, that attempted to establish a definition of obscenity to distinguish it from constitutionally protected pornography.

Two adult movie theaters and their owners and managers were subject to civil complaints in Atlanta, Georgia, in 1971 for violating a state law prohibiting the distribution of obscene materials. For purposes of the litigation it was assumed that the obscene films were exhibited to paying adults only and that the public was given ample warning of the nature of the films. However, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the showing of these films should have been enjoined because the First Amendment does not protect hardcore pornography. The U.S. Supreme Court agreed with Georgia that obscene materials are not protected by the First Amendment, but vacated and remanded the case for reconsideration of whether the two films at issue were actually obscene under the constitutional definition adopted by the Court that same day in the Miller decision. Expert testimony is not required to decide whether the films are obscene under this standard because the materials are sufficient evidence by which to make this determination.

The Court made it clear that even though the films were shown only to consenting adults, states retain a legitimate interest in regulating obscene material for reasons other than keeping juveniles and unconsenting adults from being exposed to such material. The states have an interest in preserving “the quality of life and the total community environment, the tone of commerce in the great city centers, and, possibly, the public safety itself.” Thus, states are allowed to use their police power to regulate obscene expression to protect the health, safety, morals, and welfare of the community. Defending public morality is justified as necessary to preserve a decent society and to guard against secondary effects, such as sex crimes and other antisocial behavior, which may result from exposure to obscene material.

Proof of a scientific correlation between the exhibiting of obscene films and antisocial behavior was unnecessary and instead the Court accepted the state legislature’s reasonable conclusion that such a link might exist and it allowed Georgia to act to preserve public morality. The Court found ample evidence to support a legislative conclusion “that a sensitive, key relationship of human existence, central to family life, community welfare, and the development of human personality, can be debased and distorted by crass commercial exploitation of sex.”

There is no fundamental privacy interest of a consenting adult to publicly view obscene material. Even though the Court in Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), recognized an individual’s right to view obscene material in the privacy of the home, the Paris Adult Theatre I Court refused to extend this privacy right into a place of public accommodation. Preventing the public showing of the obscene films was not deemed to be the state’s attempt to control the thoughts or intellect of a person interested in viewing this material. The state may regulate the constitutionally unprotected display of obscene material despite the fact that the regulation incidentally has an impact on some human thought.

In conclusion, the Court reaffirmed Roth's holding that obscene material is not protected by the first amendment and that states may regulate obscene material, defined according to the standards established in Miller, even though the material is shown to consenting adults only. The Miller standards continue to be used to determine whether material is protected under the first amendment or is obscene and not protected.

The Paris Adult Theatre I decision supports state regulation of certain conduct to preserve public morality. For example, the Court in Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991), cited Paris Adult Theatre I as authority for upholding an Indiana public indecency statute, legitimately designed to protect public morality. Although a plurality in Barnes recognized that nude dancing is expressive conduct under the First Amendment, the Court upheld the state statute requiring dancers to wear pasties and G-strings to achieve the state purpose of prohibiting public nudity. Indiana was justified in regulating public nudity based upon the Court's conclusion in Paris Adult Theatre I that the state has a legitimate interest in regulating public morality. The Court in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), also upheld Georgia's legislative decision to prohibit homosexual sodomy based on a moral choice and noted that the law is "constantly based on notions of morality, and if all laws representing essentially moral choices are to be invalidated under the due process clause, the courts will be very busy indeed."

The Paris Adult Theatre I, Miller, and Barnes cases were all five-to-four decisions. With the recognition of the right of privacy in decisions such as Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), and Roe v. Wade, 93 410 U.S. 113 (1973), and the overruling of Bowers v. Hardwick by Lawrence v. Texas, U.S. 123 S.Ct. 2472, 2003), the viability of the Paris Adult Theatre I pronouncement that states have a legitimate interest in regulating public morality remains valid but is prudently qualified when public morality is sought to be enforced in the home. The Court in Lawrence, quoting Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992), recognized a "realm of personal liberty which the government may not enter" and determined that the Texas ban on same-sex sodomy when applied to behavior in private did not further a legitimate state interest sufficient to "justify its intrusion into the personal and private life of the individual."

SHELLEY SAXON

References and Further Reading

- Leading Cases I. Constitutional Law, D. Freedom of Speech and Expression*, Harvard Law Review 116 (2002): 262.
 Richards, David A. J., Free Speech and Obscenity Law: Toward a Moral Theory of the First Amendment, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 123 (1974): 45.
 Robbins, H. Franklin, Jr., and Steven G. Mason, The Law of Obscenity—or Absurdity? St. Thomas Law Review 15 (2003): 517.
 Tribe, Laurence. American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. 1988, §§ 12-16 to 12-18.
 Wolfe, Christopher, Public Morality and the Modern Supreme Court, American Journal of Jurisprudence 45 (2000): 65.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barnes v. Glen Theatre*, 501 U.S. 560 (1991)
Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
Roe v. Wade, 93 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)

PATRIOT ACT

The Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act (USA PATRIOT Act) was signed into law just weeks after the September 11, 2001, attacks on America and letters laced with weaponized anthrax powder were sent to several media and congressional offices. Although at the time the act enjoyed broad bipartisan support (98–1 in the Senate and 357–66 in the House), some of its provisions have since been criticized by civil liberties groups. The 2001 act incorporated a "sunset" provision, under which sixteen sections of the act were to expire on December 31, 2005, unless renewed by Congress. The merits of those sections (and others) and their effect on civil liberties will likely be a subject of an ongoing national debate over the appropriate balance between liberty and security interests.

The USA PATRIOT Act's ten titles span some 131 pages in the Statutes at Large. It builds on the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 and the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Antiterrorism Act of 1986.

Title I ("Enhancing Domestic Security Against Terrorism") creates a counterterrorism fund and expands the National Electronic Task Force Initiative.

Title II (“Enhanced Surveillance Procedures”), which contains the several controversial sections, establishes new authority and procedures for electronic surveillance.

Title III contains the International Money Laundering Abatement and Anti-Terrorist Financing Act of 2001.

Title IV (“Protecting the Border”) was later supplemented by the Homeland Security Act of 2002.

Title V (“Removing Obstacles to Investigating Terrorism”) raises the limits on monetary rewards the government may pay to combat terrorism.

Title VI (“Providing for Victims of Terrorism, Public Safety Officers and Their Families”) amends the 1994 Victims of Crime Act and provides a fund for compensating victims of terrorist attacks.

Title VII (“Increased Information Sharing for Critical Infrastructure Protection”) expands regional federal–state–local law enforcement information sharing in responses to terrorist attacks.

Title VIII (“Strengthening the Criminal Laws Against Terrorism”) adds a definition of “domestic terrorism” to the existing definition of “international terrorism,” defines several new crimes of terrorism, enhances penalties for acts of terrorism, amends the related property forfeiture laws, and extends the statutes of limitations for terrorism crimes.

Title IX (“Improved Intelligence”) brings international terrorist activities within the scope of the National Security Act of 1947.

Anticipating recommendations from the 9/11 Commission, it calls for better intelligence and information sharing. Its provisions were supplemented by the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004.

To appreciate the meaning and effect of the USA PATRIOT Act, at least two other statutes must be considered. Electronic surveillance by federal law enforcement personnel investigating general criminal activity is generally controlled by Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (“Title III”) and the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986. Title III prohibits electronic eavesdropping without a warrant. Title III warrants for wiretaps to record conversations may be issued by a federal court only upon a showing of probable cause. Court orders for less intrusive measures, such as pen registers and trap and trace devices (which record the phone numbers of outgoing and incoming calls, but not the content of those calls) do not present similar Fourth Amendment concerns and are issued under a less demanding standard. Those orders can extend to e-mail and other Internet activity. Warrants for physical searches in criminal investigations are governed by other rules, including FRCrP 41. The USA PATRIOT Act amended FRCrP 41 to permit federal courts to issue search warrants that may be exercised beyond the district court’s jurisdiction (that is, nationwide warrants) in cases involving terrorist activities.

By contrast, federal electronic surveillance and physical searches in the United States designed to gather foreign intelligence information on foreign powers (including international terrorist organizations) and their agents, to protect against national security threats, espionage, sabotage and terrorism, are controlled by the procedures set out in the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) of 1978. Warrants for electronic or physical searches in such cases are issued by a special court established under FISA. The differing standards, procedures, and courts in national security and criminal investigations sometimes raise questions regarding the extent to which information gathered pursuant to a FISA warrant may be used in a criminal prosecution.

The USA PATRIOT Act and Civil Liberties

Provisions of the USA PATRIOT Act that raise concerns for civil liberties include:

Section 206 grants the FISA court authority, in cases involving foreign intelligence investigations, to authorize wiretaps that are not limited to a single phone or device.

Section 213 permits judges issuing warrants for searches of property to authorize a reasonable delay in notifying the person whose property was searched.

Section 215 authorizes the FISA court to issue orders compelling certain businesses to turn over business records concerning suspected terrorists or foreign agents.

Section 218 relaxes restrictions on information sharing on terrorism activities between U.S. law enforcement and foreign intelligence officers.

Section 505 allows law enforcement officials greater access to electronic mail records of terrorist suspects.

Other provisions, such as those allowing the federal government to detain non-U.S. citizens suspected of terrorism or relaxing the restrictions on disclosing grand jury testimony, raise additional concerns.

In examining the effect of the USA PATRIOT Act on civil liberties, it is important to bear in mind that no act of Congress can abrogate rights protected by the U.S. Constitution. With few exceptions, therefore, the debate is not over whether the act denies constitutional rights but rather the extent to which it alters protective provisions in other federal statutes and court rules or otherwise fails, from a policy perspective, to strike an appropriate balance between security and civil liberties.

CRAIG H. ALLEN

References and Further Reading

- Etzioni, Amitai. How Patriotic Is the Patriot Act? Freedom Versus Security in the Age of Terrorism. New York: Routledge Group, 2004.
- U.S. Congressional Research Service. The USA PATRIOT Act: A Legal Analysis, CRS Rep. No. RL31377. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government, 2002.
- U.S. Department of Justice. Report from the Field: The USA PATRIOT Act at Work. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government, 2004, available at: http://www.lifeandliberty.gov/docs/071304_report_from_the_field.pdf.

See also 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Privacy; Search (General Definition)

PATTERSON v. NEW YORK, 432 U.S. 197 (1977)

Observing his wife partially undressed with a man, the defendant killed him. The defendant was charged with murder, which contains the two elements of intending to cause the death of another and causing the death of another. The trial court instructed the jury that to hold the defendant guilty of murder it must find that the prosecution established every element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. The jury was also instructed that if it believed that the defendant established, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he killed under an extreme emotional disturbance (EED), then it could only find the defendant guilty of the lesser offense of manslaughter. The jury returned a guilty verdict for murder, which two state appellate courts affirmed.

Upon appeal to the Supreme Court, the defendant argued that the trial court's jury instruction was an unconstitutional violation of due process by requiring the defendant to disprove his guilt. Affirming the conviction, the Court ruled that, constitutionally, the prosecution need only bear the burden of persuasion to establish every element of the offense but need not disprove a defense unless the defense negates an element of the offense. Because EED negates neither element of murder, the defendant bears the burden of persuasion on the defense. The danger Patterson poses to a defendant's presumption of innocence is that a state might choose to reclassify traditional elements of an offense as defenses and thereby allocate the burden of persuasion on those elements to the defendant.

RUSSELL L. CHRISTOPHER

References and Further Reading

- Fletcher, George P. Basic Concepts of Criminal Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Robinson, Paul H. Criminal Law Defenses. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing Co., 1984.

See also Martin v. Ohio*, 480 U.S. 228 (1987); Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt; Self-Defense; Ulster County Court v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140 (1979)

PAUL v. DAVIS, 424 U.S. 693 (1976)

Title 42 U.S.C. § 1983 provides a federal cause of action against governmental officials who subject another to the deprivation of rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The plaintiff filed a claim against a chief of police for the distribution of an "active shoppers" flyer. The plaintiff claimed a Fourteenth Amendment due-process violation in that the flyer defamed his reputation and deprived him of a "liberty" as well as invaded his privacy. Although the plaintiff had been arrested for shoplifting, thus leading to the distribution of the flyer with his name and picture, the shoplifting charges were subsequently dismissed without any conviction.

The U.S. Supreme Court rejected the plaintiff's claim, holding that damage to reputation as alleged in the complaint was not a violation of any liberty or privacy interest protected by the due process clause. Noting that damage to reputation claims are generally state defamation actions, the Court's majority reasoned that damage to reputation alone, without any other tangible loss, simply did not rise to the level of constitutional protection. The dissenters argued that a person's interest in a good name and reputation qualifies as a liberty interest under the Constitution and statute.

This case is significant on two levels. It is an example of the Court's efforts to find a limit to constitutionally protected interests. Also, as noted in the recent decision in Conn. DPS v. Doe, 538 U.S. 1 (2003), regarding sex offender reporting, the Davis case stands for the proposition that reputation is not a protected interest.

RONALD L. NELSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Connecticut Department of Public Safety v. Doe, 538 U.S. 1 (2003)

Title 42 § 1983. Civil action for deprivation of rights (R. S. § 1979; Dec. 29, 1979, P.L. 96-170, § 1, 93 Stat. 1284)

See also Due Process; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Fourteenth Amendment; Privacy

PAYTON v. NEW YORK, 445 U.S. 573 (1980)

Payton consists of two appeals challenging the constitutionality of a New York statute authorizing police to enter a suspect's home to make routine felony arrests without a warrant. In both cases, the police entered the suspects' homes with probable cause, but without consent, to make warrantless arrests and discovered incriminating evidence. Both defendants argued that the evidence should be suppressed because the statute authorizing the search was unconstitutional. The trial court upheld the statute, and the appellate court agreed, distinguishing between the intrusions posed by warrantless home searches and warrantless home arrests. The Supreme Court reversed (five to three), holding that the statute violated the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness requirement.

Writing for the majority, Justice Stevens stated, "In terms that apply equally to seizures of property and to seizures of persons, the Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house." He examined the historical treatment of warrantless home arrests, noting that only one state other than New York had found such arrests constitutional. He reasoned that the same concerns present in warrantless home searches apply to warrantless home arrests, and they should therefore receive the same Fourth Amendment protections. The dissents disagreed with the majority's analysis of the Fourth Amendment's text and history and questioned the Court's elevation of the form of warrants over the substance of probable cause. Payton's holding was expanded in Steagald v. U.S., 451 U.S. 204 (1981) to require arrest warrants for arrests at third-party residences when the police have reason to believe the suspect is there.

SARA E. LINDENBAUM

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R., Seizures Typology: Classifying Detentions of the Person to Resolve Warrant, Grounds, and Search Issues, Symposium: Fourth Amendment Reform, University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 17 (1984): 417-463.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Steagald v. U.S., 451 U.S. 204 (1981)

See also Arrest; Arrest Warrants; Arrest without a Warrant; Privacy; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Warrant Clause (IV); Warrantless Searches

PELL v. PROCUNIER, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)

In Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974), the U.S. Supreme Court held that a California prison regulation prohibiting interviews between journalists and specifically identified prisoners did not violate the First or Fourteenth Amendment rights of either prisoners or journalists. Analyzing the issue for the majority, Justice Stewart (joined by Justices Burger, White, Blackmun, and Rehnquist) balanced the interests of the prisoners and journalists against the legitimate penological objectives of the prison.

Although prisoners retain those rights not inconsistent with their status as prisoners, the fundamental necessity of maintaining secure prisons outweighed the prisoners' First Amendment rights, especially because the prisoners enjoyed other forms of communication. They could communicate—even with the press—by mail and could meet with family, clergy, attorneys, or friends, communicating with the press through these visitors. Because journalists could visit minimum and maximum security wings, interviewing the prisoners encountered there, and because they could also interview randomly selected prisoners, the regulation did not amount to state interference with a free press.

Justice Powell agreed that the prisoners' rights were not violated, but distinguished the journalists' rights, concluding that the regulation did abridge these unconstitutionally. In his dissent, Justice Douglas (joined by Justices Brennan and Marshall) acknowledged that prison security is essential, but condemned the prison regulation as unconstitutionally overbroad and as violating the guarantee of a free press.

Pell suggests that legitimate penological interests may trump fundamental constitutional rights, a conclusion further articulated in the seminal prisoner rights case, Turner v. Safley (482 U.S. 78, 1987).

J. C. OLESON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

See also Access to Prisons; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Media Access to Information; Prisoners and Freedom of Speech

PENN, WILLIAM (1644–1718)

William Penn, a champion of liberty in the Old and New Worlds, is often held up as an exemplary figure of the Enlightenment views of equality and limited government. His upbringing in England, along with his religious views, created a desire within him to change the world. Penn received the opportunity to make real changes in the world when he became the absolute proprietor of a territory nearly as large as England, in 1681.

William Penn was born October 16, 1644, in London. Penn was raised by his mother and father, who served as an admiral in the British Navy. Penn's father was a very influential naval officer and served the Stuart kings, as well as their bitter enemy, Oliver Cromwell. With his father's hectic life in the British Navy, young Penn was often left to himself, and during this time he became very interested in religion. Penn was especially attracted to a mystical Protestant sect known as the Quakers that emphasized a direct relationship with God and believed that an individual's conscience, not the Bible, was man's greatest moral authority. His relationship with the Quakers caused Penn to question many of the authorities around him, including the officials at Oxford University, which led to his expulsion in 1641. Penn's quest for spiritual peace continued to cause him a great deal of trouble. He was arrested in 1667 while attending an illegal meeting of the Quakers. While in prison, Penn wrote many pamphlets that became staples in the underground Quaker church. Many of these pamphlets centered around religious toleration and the most famous of these was entitled, No Cross, No Crown.

The quest for religious toleration consumed much of Penn's early life. He traveled extensively through England, Germany, and Holland examining various Quaker groups. He eventually brought his ideas to Parliament, asking for religious toleration, but his views were not considered. Penn realized that his quest for religious toleration in England was fruitless, so he approached King Charles II and asked for a charter to establish an American colony. Charles II agreed to grant him the charter to cancel a substantial debt he owed Penn's father. Penn was granted land west of the Delaware River and north of Maryland in exchange for a percentage of potential mineral rights mined in the colony.

The new colony of Pennsylvania was governed by Penn's vision of limited government that protected the rights of the individual. The first government document adopted in the colony, called the First Frame of Government, guaranteed that a person could not be forced from his estate without his consent. In Pennsylvania, Penn established a colony that promoted morality, virtue, and Christian values; unlike the majority of New England colonies, it supported the complete separation of church and state.

By the time of Penn's death in 1718, Pennsylvania was no longer a Quaker haven, but had turned into America's first melting pot. Many different European groups flocked to this colony as a place to escape persecution of all kinds. Pennsylvania became a place that embodied most of the same values that would be adopted by the new U.S. government in 1776.

CHRISTOPHER R. TINGLE

References and Further Reading

- Hull, William I. William Penn. New York: Ayer Publishing Company, 1937.
- Soderlund, Jean. William Penn and the Founding of Pennsylvania, 1680–1684. Philadelphia: The University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982.

PENNSYLVANIA v. SCOTT, 524 U.S. 357 (1998)

In a case with significant implications for law enforcement and corrections personnel, the Supreme Court held that the exclusionary rule does not apply in parole revocation hearings. Scott was on parole after serving ten years in prison. Five months after his release, probation officers received information that he had weapons in his possession, which would constitute a violation of the terms of his parole. Probation officers searched Scott's residence without probable cause or a warrant and found several weapons.

At his parole revocation hearing Scott sought to have the weapons excluded as the product of an unlawful search. The parole board and the district court refused, but the state court of appeals ordered the evidence excluded. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court, however, ordered the weapons suppressed, on the ground that the exclusionary rule should apply in parole revocation hearings whenever probation officers conduct searches of known parolees without at least “reasonable suspicion” of criminal activity. Application of the exclusionary rule in these cases, the court felt, would deter probation officers from engaging in illegal searches.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the state court and held that the exclusionary rule does not apply to parole revocation hearings. The majority opinion written by Justice Thomas stressed the Court’s traditional reluctance to extend the judicially created remedy to nontrial proceedings and the limited deterrent value of the rule in such proceedings. The Court felt suppression would have only a minimal deterrent effect on parole officers, while having the effect of turning revocation hearings into minitrials. The Court also noted that applying the exclusionary rule to parole revocation hearings would unnecessarily hamper the state’s legitimate interest in ensuring parolees do not violate the terms of their parole.

The dissent argued that the effect of the ruling was to leave probation officers with virtually unchecked power to interfere in the lives of parolees, absent any individualized suspicion of wrongdoing. Nothing in the decision limits it to parole revocation hearings, so it is likely that the Court would hold similarly regarding probation revocation hearings. This is a significant decision because more than three million people are currently on probation or parole, all of whom potentially face revocation hearings.

CRAIG HEMMENS

References and Further Reading

Hemmens, Craig, Katherine Bennett, and Rolando V. del Carmen. “The Exclusionary Rule and Parole Revocation Hearings: The Supreme Court Says No.” Perspectives 23 (1999): 36–42.

See also Exclusionary Rule; Search (General Definition); Warrantless Searches

PENTAGON PAPERS CASE

See New York Times v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971)

PENUMBRAS

A penumbra is normally understood as a partial or imperfect shadow surrounding a complete shadow cast by a solid body, but it has taken on a different meaning in U.S. constitutional law. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes referred to a penumbra of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments in his 1928 dissent in the case of Olmstead v. U.S., 277 U.S. 438 (1928). The concept of penumbras extending from some of the provisions of the Bill of Rights was given its place in the canon of constitutional law in the majority decision of Justice William Douglas in Griswold v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 145 (1965).

The Court had grappled with the meaning of due process in Amendment Fourteen since 1873, when it first decided the Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1873). Various formulae had been proposed to capture precisely what was meant by the statement “nor shall any state deprive a person of life, liberty or property without due process of law.” The proper interpretation was complicated by the use of the exact same language with reference to the national government in Amendment Five. In his dissent in Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884), Justice John Marshall Harlan, Sr. had argued that the due process clause in Amendment Four referred to all of the provisions in the first eight amendments or a system of total incorporation. Justice Benjamin Cardozo had proposed in Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937) that due process referred to those portions of the first eight amendments to the Constitution that “were fundamental of a scheme of ordered liberty and justice.” Application of Cardozo’s formula has been labeled “selective incorporation” and permitted inclusion of only those truly important rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights.

When Douglas approached his opinion in Griswold, neither of those tests would apply to intrusions into the intimacies of marriage, specifically the decision to use contraceptive devices. He proposed that “specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance.” To buttress his argument, Justice Douglas noted that the Court had found the right to educate one’s children as one chooses in Pierce v. Society of Sisters (268 U.S. 510, 1925), a right to study the German language in Meyer v. State of Nebraska (262 U.S. 390, 1923), a right to association and privacy of those associations in NAACP v. Alabama (357 U.S. 44, 1958), and a right of belief in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (319 U.S. 624, 1943).

Those earlier decisions led Justice Douglas to the conclusion penumbras for other parts of the first eight amendments created a right to privacy. The right of association, derived from Amendment One, implies a zone of privacy, as does the provision in Amendment Three against quartering soldiers in homes during peacetime. Amendment Four guarantees that one’s person, house, papers, and effects are safe from unlawful searches and seizures and thus created a zone of privacy, as did the guarantee in Amendment Five against self-incrimination. To complete the argument, Justice Douglas relied on Amendment Nine, which provides that “the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.” Those guarantees, taken together, protected the marriage relationship, which lies within the zone of privacy created by these various rights.

Justice Douglas concluded that the Connecticut law forbidding the use of contraceptives by married couples was unconstitutional. Nonetheless, his formulation did not carry the full weight of the Court; five justices concurred in the result, but not with the reasoning in the majority opinion, and two others dissented. That left the value of the penumbras argument somewhat in question, but the term and its related meaning have passed into our understanding of constitutional law. The concept that enumerated rights in the first eight amendments are not the only ones encompassed by due process in Amendment Four has come to be known as the theory of total incorporation plus. Since no single theory of incorporation beyond a flexible case-by-case “fairness” approach has yet won the backing of a majority Court, the concept of penumbras emanating from the enumerated rights remains one viable theory.

MARY L. VOLCANSEK

Cases and Statutes Cited

Griswold v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 145 (1965)
Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 44 (1958)
Olmstead v. U.S., 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1873)
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

PERSONAL LIBERTY LAWS

Personal liberty laws were extant in New England and in some other northern states prior to the Civil War to prevent runaway slaves from being kidnapped by slave catchers and taken back to southern bondage. These laws were also designed to frustrate the implementation of the fugitive slave clause of the Constitution, as well as the federal laws of 1793 and 1850 governing the return of runaway slaves. During the 1820s, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania all passed personal liberty laws designed to guarantee that free blacks would not be taken from the state and that fugitive slaves could not be removed without a fair hearing and clear evidence. In theory, many of these laws were declared unconstitutional in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 539 (1842), in which Justice Joseph Story declared that under the supremacy clause the federal fugitive slave laws took precedence over state personal liberty laws.

As part of the compromise of 1850, Congress enacted a new Fugitive Slave Act that gave Southerners and slave catchers even greater powers to seize runaway slaves. The act, condemned by the growing antislavery movement in the North, led to a variety of responses. All six of the New England states, as well as Ohio, Michigan, and Wisconsin, passed new personal liberty laws, making it difficult if not impossible to enforce the fugitive slave law. Massachusetts prohibited any lawyer in the state from representing a slave owner and, following Justice Story's suggestion in Prigg, prohibited any state official from cooperating with slave catchers. Since many of the federal commissioners named to help enforce the act were also state office-holders and lawyers, they could lose their jobs or their law licenses if they cooperated. Many states also closed the use of their jails to slave catchers.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Morris, Thomas D. Free Men All: The Personal Liberty Laws of the North, 1780–1861. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 539 (1842)

PETITION CAMPAIGN

The Great Petition Campaign to end slavery in the United States and its territories, which spanned the years 1833 to 1844, ranks as perhaps the most significant instance in American history of the use of the right of petition to claim and expand civil liberties. By gathering signatures to support their remonstrances to Congress, abolitionists exploited the potential of the right of petition to mobilize public opinion against the slave power. By employing the right of petition rather than the right of suffrage in their attempt to influence Congress and the American public, abolitionists circumvented moral compromises required by electoral politics and enabled the participation of significant disenfranchised sectors of the abolitionist constituency, namely, free blacks and women.

The groundwork for the abolitionists' systematic petition campaign of the 1830s was laid before the birth of the nation. Slaves submitted antislavery petitions, which emphasized the contradiction between Revolutionary ideology and the keeping of slaves. Petitioning by abolitionist organizations was begun by Quakers, who were among the earliest whites to condemn slavery as a sin. Philadelphia Quakers, for example, petitioned the Continental Congress in 1783 to end the slave trade, only to be informed that under the Articles of Confederation the central government had no power to regulate commerce. Quaker antislavery petitions met better reception in state legislatures, where during the late 1780s they led to passage of a number of laws against the foreign slave trade.

About the same time that Americans started petitioning the Continental Congress, events were occurring in Great Britain that would profoundly affect the future of antislavery petitioning in the United States. Unlike Americans, who sent a few petitions to Congress each year, as early as 1787 male British abolitionists petitioned en masse for an end to the slave trade. Petitioning allowed British abolitionists to draw on the power of the public rather than having to rely on private attempts to influence individual political leaders. By the 1830s in England, the process of gathering signatures and presenting petitions demanding parliamentary action had developed into an elaborate ceremony, wherein the petitions symbolized a mobilized people and provided a tangible measure of public opinion.

In the United States, however, antislavery petitioning remained intermittent until 1819 when there was a burst of petitioning against admission of the Missouri Territory to the Union as a slave state. Admission of Missouri as a slave state would have upset the balance of power between slave and free states in Congress; because it would have created the first new state from Louisiana Purchase land, its status as slave or free carried considerable symbolic importance. Former Tennessee slaveholder Charles Osborn, a Quaker, organized a petition campaign and used his reform newspaper, The Philanthropist, to rally Ohioans to hold public meetings to draw up petitions against admitting Missouri as a slave state. In New York, some two thousand people met in a hotel to exercise their conjoined First Amendment rights of assembly, speech, and petition to denounce permitting slavery in new states and to compose a petition to Congress. Similar petitions were sent from Pennsylvania, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, and Vermont.

Further groundwork for mass antislavery petitioning was laid in 1827 when Benjamin Lundy organized a campaign in Baltimore that asked Congress to pass a law providing that all children thereafter born to slaves in the District of Columbia be declared free at a certain age. The House of Representatives tabled the petition, but Lundy was undeterred. In 1828, he launched a lecture tour through the North to encourage further antislavery petitioning. Lundy succeeded in encouraging a young newspaper reporter named William Lloyd Garrison to adopt the strategy of petitioning. In October 1828, Garrison sent petition forms to Vermont postmasters, who paid nothing for their mail, requesting them to gather signatures and send the petitions to Congress.

Garrison and other opponents of slavery submitted enough petitions in 1828 to stir debate in Congress. Petitions for abolition in the District also flowed from citizens of Washington, D.C., as well as New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. Free blacks, such as those in Adams County, Pennsylvania, lent their names to petitions, and the free black press praised the signature-gathering efforts of the predominantly white antislavery societies. When Garrison published the first edition of his antislavery newspaper, The Liberator, on January 1, 1831, he urged readers to petition Congress to rid the nation's capital of the "rotten plague" of slavery. A year later when Garrison contributed to the founding of the New England Anti-Slavery Society, he and seventy-one men (among whom about a quarter were free blacks) signed a constitution pledging "to inform and correct public opinion" through a variety of methods, including petitioning.

Many other antislavery societies formed in New England and the West during the early 1830s incorporated pledges to petition in their founding documents. Abolitionists adopted this strategy because although early in its history the right of petition was put into practice by individuals making requests of their rulers for redress of personal grievances, by the advent of the Jacksonian era, men frequently used organized mass petitioning to agitate public opinion in order to achieve their political goals. Petitioning, moreover, fit hand in glove with immediate abolitionists' strategy of moral suasion, which called for the use of moral appeals to awaken public sentiment to induce slaveholders to forsake human bondage.

Male abolitionist leaders endorsed the strategy of petitioning at the national level in December 1833 at the founding convention of the American Anti-Slavery Society. Members resolved "to urge forward without delay" a petition to Congress for abolition in the District of Columbia and named specific congressmen into whose hands the memorials should be entrusted. They also urged the president of the convention to write letters to members of Congress beseeching them to present petitions and to "fearlessly advocate" passage of abolition measures.

Calls to petition issued by the AASS and other male abolitionist organizations at the beginning of the campaign were directed at men and made no attempt to encourage women to participate in the effort. Nonetheless, inspired by the success of English women who, from 1830 to 1833 sent hundreds of thousands of signatures to Parliament requesting an end to slavery in the British dominions, by 1834 growing numbers of American women signed antislavery petitions addressed to Congress. In so doing they departed significantly from the custom of women limiting their petitioning to individual requests about private matters. By petitioning collectively on an issue of national policy women also pushed the limits of antebellum gender norms, which usually constrained them from overt political action out of fear they would be branded unwomanly or immoral. Facing such obstacles, the petition offered women an especially suitable means to participate in the abolition movement because they could use the right of petition—a right that, unlike the ballot, they were generally understood to possess—to apply the force of their supposedly superior morality to reform public opinion on the subject of slavery.

Furthermore, the supplicatory nature of the right of petition held radical potential for women, for natural law assumed that all subjects (and later citizens) possessed the right of petition and that rulers (and later representatives) were obliged to receive and respond to petitions regardless of the subject of their prayer. Abolitionist women relied on the first assumption to claim and defend their right to petition amidst an environment in which their political status, like that of free blacks, was undergoing constant renegotiation.

Women added fifteen thousand signatures to those sent by men in 1835 and 1836, swelling to a flood what was previously a trickle of memorials. As day after day the petitions continued to flow into the House, impeding legislative business, representatives became increasingly irritated. Southern members, many of them slaveholders, insisted on ridding the House of the petitions because they perceived any debate about slavery as hostile to their region. Most northern members wanted to sweep the abolition memorials under the carpet in the interest of political harmony. Because abolitionists strategically composed their petitions to focus on the District of Columbia, where Congress possessed sole authority, representatives who opposed reception of the petitions were unable to use the argument that slavery was a matter for the states to decide.

On May 18, 1836, the House adopted a gag rule to squelch abolition petitions. It stated, "Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon." The House renewed the gag rule at the beginning of each session of Congress and in 1840 made it a standing rule. From the start, Representative John Quincy Adams, elected to the House after having served as president of the United States, vehemently opposed imposition of the gag rule and waged an enduring oratorical battle against gag until it was rescinded in December 1844.

Rather than posing an obstacle, the gag rule provided just the issue abolitionists needed to expand their appeal among the public. The gag allowed abolitionists to link the popular right of petition with the unpopular cause of immediate abolitionism. Moreover, the gag provided evidence for abolitionists' claim that the South was conspiring to destroy northerners' civil rights in order to perpetuate the peculiar institution. Whether or not they were genuinely concerned about the plight of the slave, more northerners became sympathetic to abolitionism when the gag rule demonstrated that slavery threatened their civil rights. Not only did the petitions lead Congress to discuss slavery, but the debate over slavery and suppressing petitions also stirred indignation and discussion of antislavery issues among the public at large. "Wherever the reports of the proceedings in Congress are circulated and read," explained an 1836 report of the Starksborough (Vermont) Anti-Slavery Society, "there will be a knowledge of the doings in relation to those petitions extended; and this circumstance will serve to stir up the spirit of inquiry in relation to our objects, our principles, and measures, in many places where the merits of the Anti-Slavery Society have heretofore been but little known."

Petitioning also enabled abolitionists to reach people who would remain untouched by other forms of abolitionist rhetoric. Indeed, petitions were probably read by more people—congressmen, abolitionists, and members of the public to whom appeals were made for signatures—than was any other form of antislavery literature. Antislavery lectures, newspapers, and pamphlets often reached only persons already converted to the cause, when abolitionists were circulating petitions they spoke face to face with people who would never attend an antislavery lecture or read an antislavery tract. The signing of petitions, moreover, often resulted in multiple benefits because, as one abolitionist explained, a signature on a petition served a "three-fold purpose": "You not only gain the person's name, but you excite inquiry in her mind and she will excite it in others; thus the little circle imperceptibly widens until it may embrace a whole town."

The Great Petition Campaign not only played an important role in the growth of the antislavery movement, but also fostered women's social activism and the securing of their civil liberties. Due in large part to the struggles of female abolitionists, petitioning Congress had become an acceptable means of political action for women, and it continued to be a crucial and persistent outlet employed by women determined to participate in politics despite the fact that neither the Constitution nor custom recognized them as full citizens. Indeed, well before they secured the right to vote, women employed their right of petition. For example, they petitioned to demand that Congress deny a reputed polygamist a seat in the House; they also petitioned to press for federal anti-lynching laws. Ultimately, women employed the right of petition as a major means of persuading Congress and the American public to recognize their right to vote.

The Great Petition Campaign, in which abolitionists gathered hundreds of thousands of signatures on antislavery petitions to Congress from 1833 to 1844, constitutes one of the first uses of mass petitioning to force social change. It contributed, therefore, to the ongoing transformation of the right of petition from an individual request to redress a personal grievance to a tool employed collectively by organized groups to mobilize public opinion and pressure members of Congress. Moreover, this campaign sought to end the greatest abrogation of American freedom—slavery—and in the course of so doing, afforded women the opportunity to assert their right of petition and to lay claim to citizenship. The Great Petition Campaign, then, stands as a major event in the quest for civil liberties during the early nineteenth century and beyond.

SUSAN ZAESKE

References and Further Reading

- Barnes, Gilbert H. The Antislavery Impulse, 1830–1844. New York: Harcourt, Brace, and World, 1933.
- Frederick, David C., John Quincy Adams, Slavery, and the Disappearance of the Right to Petition, Law and History Review 9 (Spring 1991): 113–155.
- Higginson, Stephen A., A Short History of the Right to Petition Government for the Redress of Grievances, Yale Law Review Journal 96 (1986): 142–166.
- Ludlum, Robert P. "The Antislavery 'Gag Rule': History and Argument." Journal of Negro History 26 (April 1941): 202–243.
- Miller, William Lee. Arguing About Slavery: The Great Battle in the United States Congress. New York: Knopf, 1996.
- Nye, Russel B. Fettered Freedom: Civil Liberties and the Slavery Controversy, 1830–1860. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1949.
- Rable, George G. "Slavery, Politics, and the South: The Gag Rule as a Case Study." Capitol Studies 3 (Fall 1975): 69–87.

Zaeske, Susan. Signatures of Citizenship: Petitioning, Antislavery, & Women's Political Identity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003.

PETITION OF RIGHT (1628)

The first major English constitutional document since Magna Carta, the Petition of Right grew out of problems raised by England's war with France in 1627. The Crown, short of money, dredged up soldiers from the scum of society and then forced private citizens to quarter them in their homes. The soldiers misbehaved terribly in the homes and in the streets, and when the government, trying to restore order, imposed martial law in port towns, proud merchants appealed to their allies in Parliament for relief against Charles I.

The petition was entirely a work of Parliament, but technically it was neither a statute nor strictly legislative. Its authors, fearing a royal veto if it were presented as a bill, used the form employed by individuals seeking special royal grace for the redress of specific grievances. Its drafters also insisted that no new rights were claimed, only that old ones were recognized.

Fairly brief, it had only four sections, all of which dealt with royal power and phrased in the negative: No person should be required to pay a tax without parliamentary approval; no person should be imprisoned without cause being shown (and the royal command did not amount to sufficient cause); no troops should be quartered in private homes without the consent of and compensation to the owner; and the Crown could issue no commissions for proceedings by martial law.

Hard-strapped for cash to carry on his war, Charles I had little choice but to agree, but gave his assent in the phrase common to individual requests, "Soit droit fait," rather than the legislative "Le roi le vault." Despite this matter of form, the Petition of Right has come to be regarded as a statute and an essential part of the English Constitution.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Lovell, Colin Rhys. English Constitutional and Legal History: A Survey. New York: Oxford University Press, 1962.

PHILADELPHIA NEWSPAPERS, INC. v. HEPPS, 475 U.S. 767 (1986)

From May 1975 to May 1976, the Philadelphia Inquirer published a series of articles about Maurice Hepps, the principal stockholder of a corporation that owned a franchise of beverage and snack stores. Hepps was said to have connections to organized crime that unduly interfered with administrative and legislative state government. Hepps brought suit for defamation of character. In a five-to-four vote, the U.S. Supreme Court held that private figures, in matters of public concern, must prove that the allegedly defamatory statements are false.

In the majority opinion, written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and joined by Justices William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, Harry Blackmun and Lewis Powell, the court ruled that placing the burden of proving a statement true on a media defendant violates the U.S. Constitution. The Court, in rejecting the common-law presumption that defamatory statements are presumed to be false, held that the First Amendment protects true speech, thereby allowing discussion of public concern to be uninhibited. The court expressed concern that media defendants might be unable to prove the truth of some statements, even in cases in which the allegations are without merit. The dissent, written by Justice John Paul Stevens and joined by Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices Byron White and William Rehnquist, argued that the majority's holding would protect media defendants that act negligently or maliciously and prevent individuals from protecting their reputations. The Hepps case stands for the idea that private individuals bear the burden of proving allegedly defamatory statements false when the information is related to matters of public concern.

GILBERT D. MARTINEZ

References and Further Reading

- O'Brien, David M. Constitutional Law and Politics: Civil Rights and Civil Liberties, Volume Two. New York: W. W. Norton & Co., 2000.
- Overbeck, Wayne. Major Principles of Media Law. Belmont, CA: Thomson Wadsworth, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc., et al. v. Hepps et al.*, 475 U.S. 767 (1986)
- U.S. Const. Amend. I

PHILLIPS, WENDELL (1811–1884)

Wendell Phillips, abolitionist activist and orator, was born in 1811 into a prominent family on Boston's Beacon Hill, son of a lawyer who served as mayor and a mother who came from a wealthy background. He was educated at Harvard College and Harvard Law School, and he opened a law office in Boston.

But in 1835 he watched a mob nearly lynch abolitionist publisher William Lloyd Garrison, and he soon became deeply involved in the fight against slavery. After he married an antislavery activist, Ann Greene, he moved deeper into the abolitionist camp.

His involvement became visible in late 1837 when he spoke at a Faneuil Hall rally to protest the murder in Illinois of abolitionist Elijah Lovejoy. When the Massachusetts Attorney General spoke in defense of the mob that killed Lovejoy, Phillips defended Lovejoy's freedom of the press to publish antislavery material and assailed "the tyranny of this many-headed monster, the mob." Lovejoy, he said, "took refuge under the banner of liberty—amid its folds; and when he fell, its glorious stars and stripes, the emblem of free institutions, around which cluster so many heart-stirring memories, were blotted out in the martyr's blood."

The eloquence of his Faneuil Hall speech established Phillips as a leading orator, a skill for which he won high praise throughout his life. Some observers at the time said his oratory outdid even the more famous Daniel Webster. Although he came to lecture on a variety of subjects, his antislavery orations often were in the voice of a dissident, and audiences were sometimes thin or even hostile. But of his later years, historian James McPherson wrote that, in 1862 Phillips, whom he described as "the most radical" of the abolitionists, lectured in northern states to "packed houses" and appeared in Washington, D.C., where he was formally introduced in the U.S. Senate and met with President Abraham Lincoln.

Phillips quickly staked out an intellectual turf in the antislavery fight. With Garrison, he became a leading proponent of the view that the Constitution was a conscious proslavery document and was not entitled to respect; he even declined to vote because it was perpetuating a proslavery government structure. He outlined this view in 1844 in a pamphlet, The Constitution, a Pro-Slavery Compact, arguing that the nation could not exist as a unified country because the very existence of government under the Constitution supported slavery. His position placed him in opposition to the view that the Constitution should somehow be understood as antislavery because it was subject to the natural rights of individuals. When Massachusetts lawyer Lysander Spooner argued in an 1845 essay that slavery was unconstitutional, Phillips responded in a lengthy essay.

Phillips and Garrison remained allied for most of the period before the Civil War. But Phillips eventually criticized Lincoln's commitment to eliminating slavery, breaking ranks with Garrison. Phillips argued that the slaves needed more than freedom; they needed education, property, and full rights, measures that neither Lincoln nor Reconstruction planned to provide.

STEPHEN J. WERMIEL

References and Further Reading

- Bartlett, Irving H. Wendell Phillips, Brahmin Radical, Westport, CT: Greenwood Publishing Group, 1973.
- Ericson, David F. The Debate Over Slavery: Antislavery and Proslavery Liberalism in Antebellum America, New York, New York University Press, 2000, 62–90.
- McPherson, James M. Battle Cry of Freedom: The Civil War Era. New York, Oxford University Press, 1988, 120, 227, 495, 700–701.
- Stewart, James Brewer. Wendell Phillips: Liberty's Hero, Baton Rouge, LA, Louisiana State University Press, 1986.

See also Garrison, William Lloyd; Lincoln, Abraham; Lovejoy, Elijah; Slavery

PHILOSOPHY AND THEORY OF FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

Within the United States, free speech is perhaps the preeminent right among all of the rights included in the Bill of Rights. In many cases it may take precedence over other important constitutional or legal rights, including the constitutional right of copyright (Art. I §9), the legal protection of personal reputation, or efforts to control publicity as a means of assuring a fair trial under the Sixth Amendment. Free speech has also, at times, preempted other constitutional rights, including a tendency of the courts to protect free exercise of religion claims grounded in expressive conduct under the rubric of free speech as opposed to free exercise.

The term “free speech” is, however, a popular misnomer for a concept more properly identified under the heading of freedom of expression. Free expression, in turn, represents an extremely complex, multi-dimensional construct whose popular acceptance, under the label of free speech, masks a significant level of controversy and conceptual confusion. With the exception of those few commentators and advocates who, like Justice Hugo Black, hold an absolutist view of free expression (that is, that the Constitution’s prohibition on laws limiting free speech means that no legal restrictions can be imposed), the difficulty within the legal concept of freedom of expression resides in determining how to draw the line between protected and nonprotected expression.

In determining how to protect expression, the state will have to consider the nature and function of expression in relation to the values held by that society. That is, determining what types of expression should be protected depends not only upon the purpose for protecting free expression in a liberal democracy (that is, why), but also upon a proper understanding of the nature of free expression (that is, what it is and how it functions). These constructs are so interrelated that one could start with any of the three (that is, why, what, or how). Here, we will begin by considering what constitutes expression and how it functions. This is a descriptive task based on the nature of expression. We then explore why society should protect expression: what the social values advanced by free expression are. We then consider how these three factors relate in developing our ideas on regulating expression, along with certain pragmatic limitations imposed by the nature of regulating expression. Finally, we consider what forms of expression ought to be protected to advance those social values.

The Nature of Expression

In deciding what types of expression should be protected (that is, free), the first question is what do we mean by free expression? This determination involves describing what expression is and how it functions in a liberal democracy. That is to say, the nature and function of expression will determine what type of expression should be protected. For example, if the function of free expression is to educate, then those forms of expression that do not fulfill that function specifically (that is, education for a specific purpose) or generally (that is, provide a general quality) may not deserve protection.

One way to define expression is to describe the elements or characteristics of expressive behavior (that is, what it is). These include: communication, information, and influence or persuasion.

Communication. Expression, according to its simplest understanding, involves communication from one person to at least one other person. Thus, two elements of expression may invoke protective rights: the right to express and the right to hear that expression. The two may or may not be equally protectable or even mutually protected in the same event.

Information. The object of communication is to provide information or receive information. The most obvious form of communication is speech: the expression of ideas through words, whether written or oral. However, ideas can also be expressed in nonverbal forms: symbols, visual expressions, music, and expressive acts, though the substantive content of those ideas will be very different. Thus, the state's definition of the types of ideas protectable may define the types of expression protectable.

Persuasion. Finally, expression involves persuasion or influence, an effort to change the reality or position of the receiver of the expression. The most obvious example of persuasion is a rational argument that attempts to convince the hearer of the merits of the speaker's position (or person). However, other forms of expression such as story telling, ritual practice, or artistic practice may also be persuasive through the invocation of emotion rather than reason. For example, even at its most abstract, a great work of visual art is said to change the way a viewer sees the world.

The second way of understanding the nature of expression is to consider how it functions in the social setting. The possibilities may be divided into two broad categories: individual focused and social.

The personal function. The first function expression may serve is personal or self-centered.

Expression may constitute an essential function of self-identity: the ability to express oneself as a means of constructing the self. We may be thought of as helping to create our sense of self, self-identity, and/or self-worth through our capacity to create works of art or express our opinions in public. Efforts to restrict self-expression are, therefore, potentially damaging to the individual. Similarly, the individual interest may be in the right to be exposed to the expression of others. One develops a sense of the self out of one's engagement with the ideas of others. One's sense of self and self-identity may also emerge out of the freedom to hear and to pick and choose among the widest possible number of viewpoints. Finally, free expression in terms of the self may simply represent a fundamental liberty interest of the individual as against the state, where the state simply has no authority or right to intrude upon the individual's expressive interests.

The social function. The second possible function of expression is that it advances or supports some important social activity or function of the communities' polity. The simplest function for free expression may be that it facilitates communal living by imposing the least upon the inherent liberty of the individual, what may be referred to as the libertarian function. Second, freedom of expression supports the existence of the public square—that forum in which governmental policies and activities are discussed and debated with the goal of influencing one's fellow citizens and/or the government. Clearly, the public square cannot function without the participation of the citizens. Removing restrictions or impediments to expression encourages the widest possible participation in the public square and the greatest potential diversity of expressions. Related to this is the most popular and famous formulation of the purpose of free expression—that it creates a free marketplace for ideas. As discussed by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in Abrams v. United States (250 U.S. 616, 1919) and by John Stuart Mill, this marketplace for ideas helps to promote knowledge and truth by subjecting all ideas to the challenges of public examination and debate. Moreover, repressing expression has the perverse effect of magnifying its power because it is allowed to exist without exposure to public challenge.

The Values or Utility of Freedom of Expression

The second fundamental question regarding freedom of expression is why society should protect expression. What are the values to society embodied in the types of expression for which protection is sought? Societies protect those functions that advance their interests. The interests may be complex or multifaceted; hence, society may adopt a variety of values in conjunction one with the other or varying according to specific situations. The decision to protect certain forms of expression according to what functions they serve ultimately reflects that nature and values of that society. Here again, in analyzing the possibilities, the two broad categories of personal interests vs. social interests are helpful.

Personal interests. Each decision to protect expression because of its personal interest function reflects a particular conception of the appropriate relationship between individuals and the state chosen from among a number of options. Those conceptions (or values) range across a continuum from a minimalist, libertarian/liberal relationship to a communitarian/perfectionist one of profound engagement between the state and the individual.

Libertarian. The minimalist or libertarian social conception views the state as having limited authority over the individual. Therefore, the state would have only limited rights to intrude upon the expression rights of the individual due to social necessity (that is, to prevent violence or harm to others within society).

Liberal. The next, or liberal conception, shifts the perspective taken from a focus upon the isolated rights of the individual to be free of the state to the obligations of the state towards the individual. While still imposing a limited view of state-individual interaction, the liberal conception understands the state as standing in a position of subservience where the state has a duty to respect the individual. While still compelling a strong recognition of freedom in relation to expression, the liberal position lessens the claim of right by relativizing it to what is needed to respect the individual. Thus, while libertarianism demands that the state refrain from interfering in the liberty of the individual, liberalism would simply require procedural and/or egalitarian treatment respectful of the individual.

Communitarian. The communitarian or common good perspective posits a more interactive relationship between the individual and the state. The state and its citizens are engaged in a cooperative relationship of self-governance. The state regulates behavior according to more general concerns of creating or sustaining a specific understanding of the common good. Thus, the state may be concerned with the effect of expression upon the individual and how that advances or inhibits the creation or maintenance of a beneficial, peaceful social environment meeting the social needs of the citizens.

Perfectionist. The perfectionist understanding of the state views the individual as a product of social conditioning. As previously advocated in its most extreme form by communist revolutionaries, the goal of the state is to engineer society so as to create new, liberated individuals. Under a perfectionist conception, the state would view expression as a tool in the manipulation or character formation of its citizens as better people and/or as good citizens (for example, educated, informed, critical thinkers, etc.).

Social interests. Protecting expression according to the social interests served also covers a spectrum of state/individual interaction ranging from a minimalist, social libertarian ideal to one of strong engagement. These social interests generally reflect varying degrees of participation in social self-governance and, with the exception of the social libertarian model, all involve the creation and support of a public square as a necessary element in politics.

Social libertarian. The social libertarian ideal fundamentally segregates the individual from the state. The focus is upon protecting the autonomy of the individual independent of any association with state governance. This is a social interest, as opposed to an individual interest, insofar as this segregation is viewed as a useful tool for social organization. That is, the idea of protecting the liberty interests of individuals (including their expressive interests) may be socially useful as a method of limiting social conflict or to facilitate state interests resting upon individual initiative or action.

Political. The idea of the public square reflects a politics in which individuals and social organizations participate in the public discussion of issues of public concern with the goal to analyze, critique, shape, or influence the development, enactment, or enforcement of public policy. The range of purposes or activities that the public square serves can vary enormously. They would include, for example, serving as a counterbalance to the state (for example, by exposing corruption and inefficiencies), educating and informing the public about issues of public concern, serving as a pressure release for social pressure or anxieties, and/or creating a marketplace for ideas to establish truth and falsity of political ideas.

Application of Values

As previously noted, in determining how to protect expression, the state will have to consider the nature and function of expression in relation to the values held by that society. This will involve an assessment of the expression involved according to its nature or function and whether or not it advances the values of the society. It may also be necessary to determine whether or not the suggested function (for example, determining truth through a marketplace of ideas) is, in fact, effective overall or in relation to this specific expressive practice.

Balanced against this assessment, the state must determine what limits may be imposed due to conflicts between the free expression interest and other socially important interests. The more value given to the free expressive interest, the harder it becomes to restrict it and vice versa. Thus, when the free expressive act reflects an important social value, restricting that act would require the identification of an equally compelling value that would be harmed by the expressive act.

Determining the value of expression is, of course, difficult. Indeed, since one of the major objects of free expression is to facilitate the social determination of the good, it may not be possible for participants or regulators to make an accurate determination of value prior to the conclusion of the expressive act/transaction. Moreover, expression in the public square exists within a complex web of public discourse. The impact of one expressive act upon others may be virtually impossible to determine in advance. For example, in the latter part of the twentieth century, changes in literature contributed to changes in literary criticism that in turn influenced political theory and judicial interpretation. Finally, given the uncertainty of value and indeterminacy of effect, efforts to regulate expression may have unintended consequences in restricting expression.

When free expression is deemed an important value, these cumulative concerns often justify the development of a prophylactic policy of protecting free expression. The state may refrain from regulating expression—not because the particular expressive act advances a social value or interest—but rather out of concern that the attempt to control that expressive act may have the unintended consequence of limiting or “chilling” other expressions that would advance society’s interests.

Alternately, given the intangibility of free expression, the state may adopt the prophylactic of the “slippery slope”—an approach that resists the adoption of limitations on a right based on the fear that the first breach in the wall of protection represents the first step on a slippery slope of declining freedom. Since the virtues and harms of free expression are contestable in both specifics and general application, a principle of strong protection stands guard against inadvertent erosions that cumulatively would be extremely harmful.

Types of Protectable Expression

In identifying and analyzing the types of expression to be protected under the freedom of expression principle, it is useful to start with political expression, the type most associated with the social value identified with expression. We will then consider nonexplicitly political expression, public expression, private expression, and, finally, nonprotectable expression.

Political expression. The idea of free expression is inherently linked to politics and the ideals of self-governance. It is not only included in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, but also is a central tenet of the International Bill of Human Rights (that is, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights) and is considered by most commentators as a fundamental human right. It involves all three of the principle characteristics of expression: the communications of political ideas among the citizenry; the transfer of important political information; and its use to persuade those citizens of the merits (or demerits) of a particular political position or idea. The social function of political expression is to advance political action through the tool of the public sphere or public forum. There are four types of political expression: political speech, expressive speech, expressive conduct, and free press. Each is slightly different, involving differing characteristics and/or values. What unifies the four is that the content is explicitly concerned with political ideas, including the advocacy of state policies, criticism of state action, and promotion of political representatives.

Political speech. Political speech involves verbal expression, written or oral, of political ideas between the speaker and the audience of the speaker. This is the purest expression of the free expression ideal involving the communication of ideas from one to another.

Expressive political speech. Expressive political speech includes all forms of fictional and/or nonverbal recorded expression addressing political topics, such as paintings, music, or fictional books or movies. They differ from political speech insofar as their ability to convey information is limited by their form of expression. Thus, while Picasso’s Guernica conveys powerful ideas about the horrors of war, perhaps persuading citizens against a too ready acceptance of war, it does not provide significant information about weapon systems useful in discussing arms limitations treaties or international relations between countries facing conflict.

Expressive conduct. Expressive conduct involves actions performed by one person with the object of making a nonverbal political statement. This would include the famous examples of burning one’s draft card or the American flag to protest U.S. war policies during the Vietnam War. Expressive conduct differs from expressive political speech in that conduct is less inherently expressive (that is, less effective at communicating ideas) and it takes place in a public setting. Thus, expressive conduct frequently relies upon provocation (that is, taking something with particular symbolic meaning and emotional importance and using it in an offensive way) in the face of an audience sensitive to that provocation.

Free press. The free press concept varies from political speech in that it reflects the rights and responsibilities of the media as a conduit for the political speech of others. The media will, of course, also include political speech on its own behalf (as a corporate or individual citizen). However, what makes this type of expression difficult is determining the extent of the media's protections as an agent of the public in gathering and disseminating political ideas on behalf of the public. (This is a highly contested area.) As a general rule, because it embodies a central value for self-governance, political expression will be accorded the greatest levels of protection by the state.

Nonexplicitly political expression. Expression that is not explicitly directed towards political topics may nonetheless implicate political concerns. For example, a democratic polity requires not only a public that is informed of the issues, but also one informed about a range of nonpolitical ideas and capable of critically reflecting about political and nonexplicitly political ideas. Thus, the state may seek to protect nonexplicitly political expression to advance the values of politics and self governance. However, it may also justify protection on the individual interest grounds of communitarian interest or perfectionism of the individual. Types of nonexplicitly political speech would include the arts, education, and popular nonpolitical media.

Private expression. Private expression involves the state in protecting expression on individual or social libertarian grounds. That is, private expression is protected not for its content, but rather for its value to the individual. Thus, one may protect individual expression because it reflects the self-expression or self-creation of the individual or out of respect for the rights of the individual to be left alone by the state. A state adopting a social libertarian view would protect virtually all expression (including nonexplicitly political expression) as private expression. In terms of the general principles of freedom of expression, the greatest import of private expression is not the protections of expression but rather on the aspects of privacy.

Thus, the state may protect individuals and their expressive acts from mass media exploitation and/or from state intrusion.

Limiting expression and nonprotectable expression.

As is the case with any right, the principles of freedom of expression creates a presumption of protection whose strength varies according to how effectively a particular type of expression embodies a value important to that society. That presumption may then be overcome when it conflicts with a competing right or interest of comparable or greater value. Thus, for example, political speech (the highest valued form of expression) is protected even when it interferes with the rights of reputation accorded to individuals, whereas private speech generally would not be protected. Similarly, protecting the rights of the accused under the Sixth Amendment allows for some restrictions on the free press. There are cases where the nature of the expression is so devoid of social value that the expression is deemed nonprotectable:

Danger-creating expression. Some expression does not deserve protection because it creates palpable risks or harm. The classic example given by Justice Holmes in Schenck v. United States (249 U.S. 47, 1919) would be shouting "fire" in a crowded movie theatre. The expression creates unacceptable risks without advancing any discernable social values.

Hate speech. Throughout most of the civilized world, states do not protect speech that is intended to create or advance hatred directed towards groups based on race, ethnicity, religion, culture, or other characteristics. In those states it is generally agreed that hate speech, like danger-creating expression, creates unacceptable risks of harm without advancing any discernable social values. In the United States, the Supreme Court has adopted the approach that the best shield against hate speech is a functioning free marketplace of ideas (Abrams v. United States, 1919). Specifically, the court assumes that exposing hateful ideas to public debate will lead to their being discredited, while repressing those ideas through legal prohibition risks increasing their impact among those holding such ideas.

Obscenity. The third principal form of nonprotectable expression is obscenity. By definition, obscenity is a form of expression involving sexually explicit, prurient material totally lacking in socially redeeming characteristics. Over the years, the category of expression found to be obscene has steadily shrunk within the United States as these forms of expression have been found to involve private speech (for example, the right to view sexually explicit materials within the home) or nonexplicitly political expression in the sense of providing a social commentary on the state.

DAVID E. GUINN

References and Further Reading

- Black, Hugo L. A Constitutional Faith. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.
 Mill, John Stuart. On Liberty in Utilitarianism and Other Writings. New York: New American Library, 1962.
 Schauer, Frederick. Free Speech: A Philosophical Enquiry. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. res. 217A (III), U.N. Doc A/810 at 71 (1948)
 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, G.A. res. 2200A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 16) at 52, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966), 999 U.N.T.S. 171, entered into force Mar. 23, 1976

See also Hate Speech; Obscenity

PHYSICIAN-ASSISTED SUICIDE

In 1991, in Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health (497 U.S. 261), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the right to die was a constitutionally protected liberty interest under the Fourteenth Amendment. The case held that terminally ill patients had a right to voluntarily cease treatment; moreover, under proper safeguards, surrogates could make the decision to terminate treatment or turn off life-support equipment for patients in a permanent vegetative state.

The decision confirmed practices and procedures already adopted in most states, but it also triggered a debate over what many libertarians saw as the next phase—namely, whether patients who were not terminally ill had a right to commit suicide and to do so with the assistance of a doctor. They argued that if people suffered greatly from a physical ailment and wanted to end that suffering, they should be allowed to do so. Since many such people were physically or mentally unable to take their own lives, they should be entitled to the help of those who could most effectively and painlessly end their suffering. There should be no difference between a person who, because his or her illness had advanced to terminal stage could turn off life support or cease treatment and die, and a person who had an illness that was not immediately life threatening, but nonetheless suffered greatly from disease.

The debate was not new; historically, doctors had always practiced euthanasia, helping their patients end their lives when physical distress grew too great. But in the years after World War II the discovery of new wonder drugs as well as the development of radical new means of treating disease through surgery, radiation, and other methods meant that hitherto deadly or debilitating conditions could be remedied, giving patients hope not only of living, but also of living usefully and free of pain. The emphasis in medical schools changed, and emphasis on curing disease and saving life eclipsed the older notion of euthanasia.

But as life grew longer it did not necessarily grow better. Illnesses that would earlier have claimed lives could now be treated, but people who survived did not necessarily live well. The argument that quality of life mattered more than the simple matter of living began to pick up momentum, and advocacy groups like the Hemlock Society began lobbying for more permissive laws regarding ending of life. Although all states repealed their laws criminalizing suicide, nearly all kept statutes on the book that made assisting suicide a crime. The American Medical Association formally disapproved of physician-assisted suicide; in practice, many doctors continue to help sick and suffering patients end their lives, usually through the prescription of drugs that, if taken in sufficient quantity, would prove lethal.

Advocates of physician-assisted suicide based their arguments around the notion of autonomy—that each person should have maximum control over his or her life. If, because of physical debilitation resulting from disease or advanced age, a person no longer found life worth living or was suffering great pain, then he or she should have the right to end that life and a right to assistance in doing so. They did not make a similar claim for people suffering from mental distress, but argued that a competent person, acting without duress, enjoyed full discretion over whether he or she wished to live or not.

Opponents of physician-assisted suicide responded primarily with moral arguments. Suicide, they claimed, was condemned by God and disfavored by all Western religions. There would be pressure from family to have the elderly and infirm end their lives so as to prevent further drain on scarce resources or depletion of an inheritance. Opponents of abortion saw the general right to die as well as the more specific idea of assisted suicide as two sides of the same coin—killing the unwanted unborn and killing the unwanted elderly or sick. Advocates for disability groups argued that assisted suicide was the opening wedge in a campaign similar to that of Nazi Germany, in which the weak, helpless, disabled, and different would be killed.

During the 1990s, two developments focused the public's attention on physician-assisted suicide. One was the widely publicized example of medical practice in The Netherlands, in which doctors actively helped patients to die. The practice had long been widespread, although technically not legal. The police, however, did not enforce the law and the Dutch public widely supported the practice. Eventually, the Dutch legislature amended the law to make physician-assisted suicide legal. American media gave extensive coverage to stories about the Dutch experience.

Second, Dr. Jack Kevorkian (b. 1928) launched a one-man crusade to make assisted suicide legal and easily attainable. Between 1990 and 1998, Kevorkian helped more than one hundred people commit suicide, initially using a device he called a "Thanatron," by which patients pressed buttons that allowed lethal doses of barbiturates to enter their bodies through an intravenous hook-up. When Michigan officials managed to block his access to those drugs, he switched to a "Mercitron," which released carbon monoxide into a closed space.

Kevorkian's career as "Dr. Death" came to an end when he allowed a video tape of him administering a lethal injection to a willing patient to be shown on national television. Under state law, this constituted murder, and Michigan authorities finally managed to put Kevorkian away in prison. Nonetheless, his activities, as well as the Dutch experience, contributed to the growing national debate on physician-assisted suicide.

Advocacy groups began going to court in the mid-1990s to challenge state laws against assisting suicide. A Seattle-based group called Compassion in Dying, which counseled patients wanting to end their lives, filed suit against a Washington State law prohibiting suicide assistance; after protracted litigation, it got the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to agree that a person had a liberty interest under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to end his or her life, and if necessary to secure and have help in doing so (Compassion in Dying v. Washington, 79 F.3d 790, 9th Cir. 1996).

On the East Coast, Dr. Timothy Quill, who had gained national renown as an advocate for physician-assisted suicide, challenged a New York State law under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Quill argued, and the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit agreed, that a person who was suffering from illness but not terminally ill had as equal a right to die as did a person in the final stages of an illness or on life support, who could terminate treatment (Quill v. Vacco, 97 F.3d 708, 2nd Cir. 1996).

